On February 5 the new president-elect, Pascual Ortiz Rubio was officially inaugurated to office. Even the elements that supported him realized that the election would not have been won on legal grounds over the two opposing candidates, Jose Vasconcelos on the one hand and Pedro Rodriguez Trilana, candidate of the "Workers and Peasants Bloc" on the other. Terrorism was used to keep the enemies of Ortiz Rubio from the polls and then he was proclaimed elected by over two million votes as against a few tens of thousands for each of the opposing candidates. As an expression of the popular sentiment against this fake election Daniel Flores, a youth of liberal-patriotic tendencies, attempted to assassinate the new president on the very day of his inauguration, inflicting several serious wounds. But wild hogs and Mexican presidents oftentimes have tough hides and the incident was utilized by the governmental forces as an excuse for a whole series of repressions against the leading elements in opposition to the existing regime. Numerous Communists, syndicalists, anarchists and "Vasconcelistas," supporters of the candidate Vasconcelos (who was supported simultaneously by large elements of the workers and peasants in spite of being sympathetic towards the Catholics). Flores was tortured as were several of the other detained elements, including several Communists, to secure a declaration that the whole thing was a Communist plot. During a demonstration of the Left wing forces in Mexico City where by a great effort the C.P. could mobilize 400 workers on March 20, still more comrades were imprisoned including several leading members of the Left Communist Opposition.

Communist Oppositionists Deported

According to latest reports it appears that due to the government's inability to bring concrete charges or the holding of a trial

most of the comrades detained in the capital and also the five who had been sent to the penal colony in the "Islas Marias" have been freed again, with the exception of two foreigners, Esteban Pavletich, a Peruvian attached to the general staff of the Nicaraguan leader, C.A. Sandino, and Russel Blackwell (Rosalio Negrete) of the Left Communist Opposition, both of whom were deported from the country.

There appeared recently in the press of this country notices to the effect that the Mexican authorities had nipped in the bud a "Communist revolution" in the State of Veracruz. Although we have no definite information as yet it seems that once more the same method is being used to give an excuse to the government for continued repressions against the revolutionary movement. We do not believe that the adventurous course of the Stalinist leadership in the Mexican party can be so bad as to attempt an insurrectionary movement at this time.

The candidate of the Workers and Peasants Bloc that took part in the last presidential election in Mexico under direction of the Mexican Communist Party, in the midst of the repressions against the movement, made a public declaration congratulating Ortiz Rubio for having won at the polls (!) and pledging the elements of the Workers and Peasants Bloc to support the present regime.

MOONEY INCENSED BY LIBERTY MYSTERY YARN

SAN QUENTIN, Cal. — (FP) — Tom Mooney is incensed by falsified accounts of the San Francisco preparedness day explosion contained in a "mystery" series in Liberty, reactionary weekly. He declares the article was prepared from prosecution records and that no attempt was made to interview defense counsel or himself.

"To them," Mooney remarked, "it means money, a bit of public sensationalism, and perhaps a few extra magazine sales. To me it means vindication, freedom. Why didn't they bother to get their facts accurate and fair?" Liberty has offered $1,000 for the best solution to the Mooney-Billings "mystery", which is no mystery to those familiar with the frameup.

THE EVENTS IN INDIA

The Naval "Pact"

In recent weeks the struggle of the Indian proletariat and peasantry against the intense exploitation of British imperialism and their home bourgeoisie, and for independence has been intensified. In Calcutta 19 were killed and over 100 injured in a demonstration against the domination of British capitalism. One killed and over thirty-three injured in Karachi. Similar conditions are to be observed everywhere. Trolley cars turned over and burned, telegraph wires cut, means of communication destroyed, are evidence of the temper of the masses. The British government is using every conceivable form of repression against the Indian proletariat. Armored cars, police armed with guns, lances, and sticks, militia, and civil troops are mobilized to thwart the struggle.

Thus far the movement is under the leadership of the Swaraj Party, the organization of the national bourgeoisie and petty-bourgeoisie. Under the head of Gandhi with a policy of non-resistance, the movement is being misled into channels that will spell its death. When the Indian Nationalist Party, through the initiative of Gandhi, adopted at their congress in January, the resolution calling for "complete Indian independence" it only expressed the pressure of the masses. Gandhi's "march to the sea," with the intentions of boycotting the salt laws, and in this manner struggle for independence, carried with it elements that destroyed the original purpose. It must be remembered that the policy of Gandhi and the Party is that the independence of India can only be gained through a boycotting of the products of Great Britain and a "struggle" for independence with a policy of non-resistance (non-violence) to the British government. "Non-resistance" to the severe exploitation that the Indian masses undergo, to the shooting of striking and demonstrating workers, can only result in the betrayal of the revolutionary movement in India.

The Masses Struggle Despite Gandhi

Paradoxical as it may seem, Gandhi's mobilization of the masses, on the basis of non-resistance has already taken the form of militant struggle and RESISTANCE to the masses to the brutal regime of the British "Socialist" government. The demonstrating workers have taken the only possible course in the struggle against the domination of the British government—open struggle and resistance. It has as always overstepped the limits which the policy of Gandhi places on the movement for independence.

India is the foundation rock of the British Empire. The British investment in India today is over four billion dollars. Over fourteen percent of the British exports are sent to India. It is easy to understand, then, why the struggle of the Indian proletariat and peasantry for independence will meet the stubborn resistance of the British government. That stubborn resistance is already exhibited in the present reprisals. One can easily see how much fiercer will be the resistance of the British government when the movement for independence outstrips its present stage and reaches the point of an open conquest for power.

The British Labor Government Defends the Empire

The role of the "socialist" government of Great Britain is highly illuminating. The policy of Baldwin and the Conservative Party and MacDonald and the Labor Party alike is the use of violence against the Indian masses. Both defend the interests of British capitalism with enthusiasm. This is understandable, when we recall that one of the planks of the MacDonald administration is to save the tottering Empire. One cannot say that efforts of MacDonald and his "socialist" government in this direction have been lacking. The role of the Labor government in India is only an additional commentary to the fact that the only solution for the proletariat is the complete destruction of capitalism and the establishment of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat.

One of the sad features in the present situation in India is the almost total lack of a Communist Party. The policy of the Communist International in India calls for the organization of almost every kind of Party except that of a bona fide Communist Party. The Stalin leadership continues to carry over the same policy that was responsible for the glaring defeat suffered in China. The organization of a Workers and Peasants Party remains on the agenda of the Comintern in India. This flows from its false orientation that the revolution in India must be accomplished through and together with the national bourgeoisie. It led to the subordination of the Communist Party and its eventual collapse in China. It can have no other result in India. Neither the big bourgeoisie nor the petty bourgeoisie can lead a successful revolution for the overthrow of British imperialism. Neither can this be done by the most revolutionary trade unions. For that, the leadership of a Communist Party, which centralizes the political action of the masses, which gives it direction in the struggle, and prepares the revolution, is necessary. Without a genuine Communist Party capable of carrying out such tasks, one cannot hope for a successful struggle of the revolutionary masses in India. —A.G.

The Persecutions of the Indonesian Revolutionaries

Hundreds of comrades in Indonesia (Dutch East Indies) have been deported in recent years to the island New Guinea for their participation in the revolutionary movement of their native country.

Immediately after the revolts of November, 1926 and January, 1927 (in West Java and West Sumatra), the colonial government took revenge by the arrest of several hundred of comrades all over the Archipelago. The greatest part of them were not involved in the revolts. They were leaders of Indonesian labor unions, local leaders in the political movement. All of them have been isolated in a special camp—three hundred kilometers inland on the borders of the river Digoel at Tanah-Merah.

After some time the government split the camp and established a new one for the comrades whose mentality was "irreconcilable." At least 1500 Indonesians have been brought to Tanah-Merah, of whom some hundreds are inside the new camp at Tanah-Tinggi.

They have to stay there indefinitely; the power of the governor-general could deport them without any sentence (leure de cachet!)

In the most important daily paper of Holland, Nieuwe Rotterdamse Courant of March 7, a telegram from Batavia was published. From this telegram we know that since August 1929 many efforts have been undertaken by the deported comrades to escape from the camp. In the so-called People's Council at Batavia, the representative of the governor-general declared (March 6th) that 61 comrades disappeared. Until now, all of them except 8 have been brought back, though 41 passed the boundary and may have thought that their march of more than 600 kilometres with terrible difficulties and dangers had the result that they had regained their liberty.

Demand the Right of Asylum

The authorities of Papua territory annihilated finally their hope. They were thrown in jail because...they had acted against the regulation for immigration! The court sentenced them for this reason and decided their deportation. In this way the Dutch authorities got the chance to send a steamer to Thursday Island. We learn from the "Statesman's Year Book of 1929" that the governor of that territory, who is the responsible man, has to obey the orders of the governor-general in Australasia. Obviously, the power of the colonial department, in London counts with these colonial officials. Will the Labor Government of England, of Ramsay MacDonald respect the right of Asylum regarding coloured revolutionaries? It recently abandoned and refused this Right of Asylum for politicals in the case of comrade L. D. Trotsky who applied for admission to England.

Meanwhile, it is the duty of all workers to declare their solidarity with the Indonesian comrades. Every effort should be made to prevent the return of these coloured fighters into the hands of the Dutch government which viciously treats the political prisoners.

The final text for the Three-Power Naval agreement is being prepared for its signing. The farce in London lends additional knowledge to the fakery of the imperialists in their pretensions of disarmament. The conference could not overcome the contradictions of the powers present and resulted in a sham treaty of three nations. Even the capitalist press is forced to recognize this. E. L. James in the New York Times of April 18, cites as the shortcomings of the conference, the following:

"One, failure to achieve any radical reduction in the war fleets of the world; for limitation of the navies of America, England and Japan involves no great cuts and leaves the world facing additional construction by the other powers.

"Two, failure to limit the fleets of the five nations as proposed when the conference began.

"Three, failure to make three-power limitation absolutely definite, since the contingent clause will permit greater building by England, and consequently by America and Japan, should the French and Italian building increase.

"Four, failure to agree on the eventual abolition of battleships, as desired by the English.

"Five, failure to abolish submarines, as suggested by America and Britain."

The "Safeguard Clause"—Build Larger Navies

The "safe-guard clause" in the treaty which will permit additional naval construction tears the veil from the agreement. The "socialist" Chancellor of the Exchequer, Snowden, denies very sharply that the clause had in mind the construction of armaments by other powers thereby giving permission to further construction by those countries making up the treaty. The Americans are more blunt.

Senator David Reed, one of the leading delegates of the United States declared: "It is perfectly reasonable that we should be protected against a sudden outburst of building by some other power. . . Yes, without consultation. . . Great Britain would simply notify us and begin to build. . . Then the United States and Japan would get in touch—through diplomatic channels and not by a conference. . . Each of us would be free to build. . . I want to say again that this agreement has been reached in an atmosphere of perfect good will. . . Nobody was forced to give up anything."

And so, we have "disarmament"! The conference concludes with the greatest lessons for the working class. The proletariat must be on guard constantly against the menace of war. The conference met only to gauge the strength of the various capitalist powers; and to agree that their common enemy was the working class of the Soviet Union. The three-power treaty carries with it all the explosives for the conflict, and was a last minute resort to keep the conference from collapsing without even a show.

SOVIET-AMERICAN TRADE UP 61%

NEW YORK—Soviet purchases and sales in the U. S. from October 1929 to April amounted to $98,000,000, a gain of 61% over last year's first half figures, according to an announcement of the Amtorg Trading Corp. The purchases of American industries, agricultural and automotive equipment and supplies, totalling $56,700,000, were nearly four times those of the corresponding half-year of 1928-29. Orders for industrial and transportation equipment, totalling $24,800,000, increased 2 1-2 times, while purchases of agricultural equipment, valued at $24,700,00 increased more than six times.

PHILA. SHOE WORKERS AWAIT MILITANT UNION LEAD

PHILADELPHIA—(FP)—Shoe workers in the Quaker City are awaiting leadership to unionize their industry. The example of the Laird-Schobler strike last year has proved that cobblers can fight and stick.

Never have conditions been worse than now. Cutters are earning $18 to $25 a week, where formerly they got $40 to $50; fitters get $15 to $25 against a previous scale of $70-80.

Formerly wages averaged, year around, about $32 a week for shoe workers but now they feel fortunate to knock out an annual wage equivalent to $20 a week.

WAGE CUTS THREATEN DENVER LABOR

DENVER —(FP)—While the state industrial commission is blocking wage increases on the basis of the request of Pres. Hoover, wage cuts and layoffs continue without interruption.

Union bakery workers have just been served notice that their scale of $32 a week is to be cut to $26 a week on May 1. During a previous strike the union conducted a cooperative bakery and whipped the bosses in a strenuous fight.

Railroad shops are laying off men steadily; the tramway has just consolidated lines in such a way as to cut down its force; Montgomery Ward has fired 140 within 6 weeks; the building trades are hard hit.

MINNEAPOLIS—(FP)—Over loud and boisterous protests of the American Legion and several civic organizations, the Minneapolis Central Labor Union has obtained the city auditorium for a protest meeting on unemployment April 23.

The Bolshevik Party during the war, the first mass movements which accompanied the face of Tsarism emanated essentially from the peasants in the army and countryside. We know that the spontaneous tendency of these movements, from the political point of view, resulted in the "defensism" of Kamenev and Zinoviev, whose position was beaten down by Lenin in April, 1917, and that the proletariat was able to intervene in the course of events, to rise and conquer in the name also of the interests of the peasants.

The agrarian zone of capitalist economy is that destined to feel the first reaction of the economic crisis by virtue of its secondary position in the economic fabric. On the other hand the tentacles of the capitalist defensive apparatus on the countryside are lighter and more tenuous than in the industrial cities. Police forces are very inferior and at the same time the fascist ranks are depleted by the development of the economic situation and can no longer serve as "shock troops" of the reaction. In the cities the shock troops are recruited by the police forces and not by the fascist organization. Today Mussolini authorized the "free withdrawal" from these organizations. He remembers that in the Matteotti case, many of the forces of Fascism deserted in the face of danger.

The inferior quality of the capitalist defence in the country provides a quicker chance of explosion than the city. But if in the country, revolt is easier than in the city, resistance there is incomparably more difficult. A local movement in the country is fated to be rapidly strangled by the mobilization of another locality. In the city the local movement has far greater chances of resistance.

Unite Faenza and Milan under Communist Leadership for the Proletarian Revolution

For real results in Italy it is necessary to coordinate the movements in both town and country.

The fact that the event in Milan was separated from Faenza by only a few days, justifies us in establishing that a change is effecting itself in the fighting capacity of the Italian workers. But to organize its resistance, a force capable of leading to battle is required. At the moment when the new offensive of capitalism on the workers is opening, in a situation which compared with that of the Matteotti period, is far more favorable to revolutionary developments, we must examine recent experiences objectively and without illusions. They teach us that, bounded by the limits of social-democracy and Centrism, the anti-fascist movements in Italy are fated to result in a new success for capitalism.

These experiences confirm for us that only with a Communist program, and thanks only to Communists (and not to the Right or Centrism which have been definitely compromised in the Italian and international movement) can the liberation of the Italian proletariat be realized.

To unite Faenza and Milan, the struggle of the proletariat and peasantry, to give these movements the possibility of developing, can only be the work of the Communist program applied by Communists in their own Party.

LETTERS FROM THE MILITANTS

THE NOOSE ON THE "NEW LINE"

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

Dear Comrades:

That the sounding of a personal opinion within earshot of the caricature Communist Party of the U. S. A. has become, to the American agents of the Stalinist bureaucracy, a bugle call for loosing the terror upon the dissident voice, is surely no longer news. Nor does the unanswerable charge, levelled against the "third period" Bolsheviks, Foster, Minor, Browder and Co., of having delivered the death-blow to the International Labor Defense as a broad, non-partisan workers' organization any longer retain the ring of novelty.

But that personal initiative in the class struggle, no less than personal opinion, now opens the most "loyal" of Party members to persecution, and that the services of the I. L. D., such as they are, are refused to the worker who has displeased the Centrist drill-master, is not yet very widely known.

A sympathetic and morally exhilarating incident showing to what lengths that two-lung power revolutionist, Engdahl has "Bolshevized" his Party bureau has just been brought to our attention by the victim himself, a Philadelphia comrade. It is superfluous to state that neither the Daily Worker nor the Labor Defender has ever been moved to "Bolshevik self-criticism" of the crime perpetrated against him; nor have the responsible machine-people been taken to heel.

An Active Party Rank and Filer

Thomas Dunn, the young worker involved, was admitted to the Party two years ago and from the first was marked out as a loyal, courageous, active comrade, heart and soul in the movement. Shortly after being assigned to a unit, he took part in a Washington, D. C. demonstration, was arrested with 25 other Communists and served a 30 day sentence in a Virginian dungeon. He had been back in Philadelphia less than a week when the demonstration of solidarity with the Colombia banana strikers was staged before the United Fruit Co. pier in that city; and numbered among those who refused to break ranks despite police "persuasion", he was again hauled in and slapped with a 30 day sentence to Moyamensing, the notorious Mellon-Vare shambles.

Between vacations in the capitalist jails, comrade Dunn gave virtually all of his time to rank and file Party work, serving on half a dozen committees, distributing leaflets, assisting at open-air meetings, doing clerical jobs in the district office when unemployed, etc. Finally, he was elected secretary-organizer of his unit, located in the proletarian Kensington area.

A Strike Is Called

At this time he got a job as a food-handler in a certain warehouse and almost immediately he set about organizing a strike of the ruthlessly exploited clerks and truckmen, who had long been nursing their grievances and lacked only leadership to plunge into struggle. When the walk-out was called, Dunn found that a fink had prepared the boss for a counter-action—the "ringleaders", with himself at their head were summarily fired, notwithstanding which, a picket line was formed outside the warehouse. Running into the same fink later in the day, the young strike leader demanded an accounting. He was attacked at first with curses and, since these proved ineffective, with fists. The stoolpigeon's blows were returned in kind and with interest, whereupon the boss, probably prompting the attack from ambush, sent in a hurry call for the bulls.

Dunn was clapped into jail. Charges of conspiracy, assault and battery, inciting to riot and divers assorted crimes were lodged against him. All this occurred in April, the case coming to trial on the first of November, when the International Labor Defense covered itself with "glory" by refusing to lift a hand in the young militant's defense. So Dunn, with a state lawyer "defending" him was railroaded to Moyamensing for a six months stretch.

The Failure of the I. L. D. to Aid the Arrested Striker

What was the principal reason for this indubitably class-conscious, this laudably Leninist, this utterly revolutionary act on the part of the now thoroughly Stalinized I. L. D.? Was the comrade in question tainted with the concepts of the Left Bolshevik Opposition? On the contrary, he was a loyalist of the loyalists, against whom not a breath of suspicion had been directed. Even allowing for this insane "Third Period" ideology, under which no class-war prisoner with political beliefs running afoul of the Stalinist corkscrew "line" can expect aught but contumely from the bureaucrats; even supposing that Engdahl and his fellow jumping-jacks fight the capitalist courts only on behalf of yes-yapping Party automatons, the International Labor Defense was in duty bound to put up a struggle for comrade Dunn. It failed ignominiously.

Let it go on record that the Trotsky-eating Herbert Benjamin, then Philadelphia district organizer, and his wife, Jennie Cooper, as district head of the I. L. D., formulated the truly new Bolshevik tactic which helped to railroad a Party member in good standing to prison. The contribution of this precious pair to Stalinist "strategy", though not up to Stalin's own achievements along this line, exemplified in the cold-blooded murder of Blumkin, yet deserves signal mention.

The strike broke out so suddenly that Dunn had no time to inform Benjamin or Murdock, the T. U. U. L. organizer, even if they could have been located at the district office. Before he knew what had happened, the strike leader was in prison. He was bailed out, but not by the I. L. D. When the time for trial arrived, Cooper made it clear, that so far as the Party and I. L. D. were concerned, he could go up the river for life—because he had called the strike without orders from the Communist Party or the T. U. U. L. Consider the political implications of such a stand by these comrades.

His family got the comrade out on parole after he had spent nearly three months behind the bars. Later he brought charges against Cooper, but nothing resulted from them except a genteel vote of censure, which was hushed up at the source by the hand-picked "control-commission". The commission also "ruled" that the money expended by Dunn's fatherless family on the lawyer who obtained his release was to be replaced by the I. L. D. This little reparation has still to be made.

Isolationism is being carried out to its logical, albeit grotesque, conclusion. The American Party bureaucracy more and more isolates itself from what small measure of sanity it retains in the "third period."

COMMUNISM AND THE AMERICAN NEGRO

— III.

Dear Comrades:

One of the most important problems facing the Communist movement in America today is the Negro problem.

The dark-skinned proletarian is destined to play, along with his white comrades, an important part in the world proletarian revolution. The Negro is one of the most brutally exploited of the American proletariat. Along with this goes Jim-Crowism, peonage, concubinage of Negro women and lynching.

The task of the Leninist Opposition in dealing with the Negro problem must be a determined assault upon these evils in particular and the social caste system in general. The Negro masses must be taught that the only way to social, economic and political equality is through the gateway of proletarian revolution, the key to which is scientific communism, as embodied in the Leninist International Opposition.

The Negro "leaders" will only betray the dark masses to their imperialist masters. They are doing that very thing today. Hundreds of Negro workers are awakening to that fact. The Negro workers can now see their sorry economic plight. They can see the fruits of years of "leadership" by Negro preachers, politicians and social workers.

Negro business is failing year after year. It cannot keep pace with the mergers, chain stores and industrial monopoly. It is approaching its doom. Unemployment, that creeping paralysis of capitalist society, mercilessly squeezes and saps the very existence of the Negro workers. White chauvinism is a bed-fellow of Negro unemployment.

Now that the International Left has formed a Provisional International Secretariat, I think that more attention should be given to the Negro question and the special organizational needs and problems dealt with. The Opposition must recruit as many Negro workers and radical students as possible into its ranks; wage a determined fight against white chauvinism both inside and outside the Communist movement.

The Negro's future liberty and salvation are inextricably bound up with international Communism and its inevitable victory over world capitalism.

ON ORGANIZING THE SEAMEN

New York

Dear Comrades:

This fact has been established with all those familiar with the marine industry for years. In 1917 Andy Furuseth, speaking on the possibilities of organizing the Eastern Coast where the backbone of the industry lies, said: that even the Salvation Army, if so minded, could organize seamen. That is basically even more true today.

However, since 1917, a number of things have taken place, among which is the outstanding fact that by 1919, the International Seamen's Union claimed a membership of 115,000 out of a possible 140,000. After succeeding in this almost unprecedented manner, in knitting together this tremendous mass into a labor organization, the organization was almost completely disorganized a year later by the first test which the union was called upon to face.

Two years later, despite the defeat and disillusionment, the I. W. W. succeeded in carrying on organization work to the point where in 1923 they could count 25,000, but only soon to have their organization smashed, not by internal rottenness, as in the case of the I. S. U., but by lack of coordination and perspective. However, the sharp and significant difference between the Marine Transport Workers Union of the I. W. W. and the I. S. U. before the war was the fact that the I. W. W. for the first time brought to life a real rank and file organization. All organization work was done as a result of tremendous effort from below. It seemed as if all the latent militancy in the marine industry centered itself in Industrial Union 510 of the I. W. W.

To go into the detailed reasons for its failure would require more than the allotted space. It is sufficient to say that it was possibly the last time a real working class revolt was wrecked by the machinations of stupid bunglers in the General Office of the I. W. W. With these introductory remarks one can safely approach the convention called by the Marine Workers League.

The Narrow Line of the Marine Workers League

In the first place, to those familiar with the facts, the strong efforts to force the official Communist Party, in control of the Marine Workers League, really to permit seamen to carry through the organization of a union are, one may say, two years belated. Two years ago, the need for organization in the industry became so forcibly noticed by all members in it that elements who ordinarily would not come within smelling distance of anything remotely related to the Communist movement were drawn into the Marine Workers League or its counter-parts, whatever the names that may have been given to them in the past.

Leading elements who for years had distinguished themselves in the bitter organization battles in the I.S.U. and I.W.W., threw themselves into the organization with the question: "When do we start to organize a union?" They were told to "Wait until the the Party faction fight is over". When these new elements answered that they were not interested in Party factional fights, but interested in organizing a marine union, they found themselves attacked on all sides for being motivated by syndicalist impatience, or whatever the "third period" equivalent is termed.

However, at last the mountain has come to Mahomet or vice versa—after all the "third period" preparation—which first of all made certain that anyone who isn't simon pure in hewing to the Party line to the last degree is eliminated from any position where he may in any way have any influence. After two years of careful combing, persuading and expelling, we are told that for April 26, 1930 a convention has been called in New York City. Led by those deep-sea seamen, Mink, Sparks, the doughty Hines—there is to be launched a real revolutionary marine union under the sponsorship of and pre-arranged by the T. U. U. L. Of course, it is understood that none of the "disrupters", such as the Russells, McDonalds and many others, will be there.

Unite All Militants to Build Seamen's Union

There is serious need of a real working class approach to the problem of the marine industry. There is no basic industry that is so strategically placed in the working class scheme of struggle, especially with inevitable war developments. In the unquestioned development of the merchant marine as a naval arm, which is provided for by the Jones-White Act, an effective industrial union, having a real base among the workers in the industry, can serve as the most powerful weapon in the coming struggles of the American working class.

Adventurist speculation that may wreck the ground of appeal by militants is criminally inexcusable. Certainly, the revival of I.U. 510 of the I.W.W., though doomed to failure, is an indication that the reaction against cheap adventure has set in. The time for a real marine union is here, provided the militants who through years of struggle have established a claim to leadership, can be utilized. We must remember that in this industry that all militants have gone through the organization of the Marine Transport Workers of the I. W. W. and to imagine that one can build a militant union without these elements is to give birth to one more of the still-born unions of the official Communist Party leadership. There is still time for the genuine Communist elements to realize that there is needed a real united front of all militants in order to organize an effective union in the marine industry.—M. R.

A BIG STEP FORWARD CONFLICT SHARP IN INDIA

The International Conference of the Left Opposition

On April 6, a step of the greatest consequence for the world Communist movement was taken in Paris. In response to a call signed by the Russian Bolshevik-Leninists (Opposition), the Communist League of France (La Verite), and the Communist League of America, delegates from practically all the important groups of the Left Opposition in the Communist movement gathered for their first representative international conference. They decided to issue an international bulletin, and formed a secretariat to direct the work of our fraction and the discussion of those questions which still require clarification.

Representing the French group, were comrades Rosmer and Naville; for the United Left Opposition in Germany, comrade Oskar Selpold, Communist member of the Prussian Landtag; for the Belgian Opposition, comrade Hennaut, with comrade Lesoil from the Charleroi federation; comrade Gorkin for the Spanish Opposition; Fraenkel for the Czechoslovakian Opposition (Leonovics group); Peri for the Italian Left (Bordiga group); Szilvassy for the Hungarian group; Obin for the Jewish Opposition group in France; and Shachtman from the Communist League of America. Endorsements of the conference were received from the Russian comrades, from the group in Greece, and a second Czech Opposition group, composed of students, in Prague. Financial and other pressing difficulties prevented these latter from sending delegates, as was also the case with the Chinese, Austrian, Mexican and Argentine groups. Subsequent correspondence has already shown that virtually all these groups will collaborate in the work of the International Secretariat and the Bulletin.

The same spirit that actuated the militant groups of revolutionists that gathered at Zimmerwald and Kienthal to salvage the movement from the ruins of socialist betrayal in 1914, pervaded the Paris conference. All the comrades were motivated by the ever more urgent need of firmly uniting on a world scale the Marxist core of the Communist International. The conflict between the formation of groups in every important country on the basis of the struggle for internationalism, and the lack of organized international coordination was, to a great extent, brought to an end by the conference. The first step was taken—a big step made imperative not only by the situation in the official movement which requires our united intervention, but also by the conditions prevailing in the Left Opposition itself.

The Communist Opposition is a product of the development of the Comintern, with which it is indissolubly bound up by its whole past. The weakening of the International, therefore, could not fail to involve the Opposition, at least in the first stage. Even more: insofar as the weakening of the International was caused by a series of defeats of the revolution and a strengthening of the social democracy, that process had effect most heavily the Left wing of Communism. The moods of disillusionment and decline was directed primarily against the revolutionary tendency.

The Left Wing and the Amalgamated Convention

The national convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America is scheduled to open in Toronto on May 12. Outside of one or two sympathizers with the Left wing movement there will be no Left wing group among the delegates. The Party policy in this union has revealed its own bankruptcy by the virtual elimination of the Left wing from any influence. The only semblance of a fight at the convention may be an open struggle between the Hillman and Beckerman cliques, i. e., half a dozen of one or six of the other. With all the talk of the "third period", of very, very revolutionary action of winning the masses over night and the rest of the empty phraseology of the "new line", the Party, and the official Left wing it controls, have done nothing—absolutely nothing—to prepare for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America convention! Only at the last minute, two brief weeks before the convention, the General Executive Board of the Left wing needle trades union has appointed a sub-committee to meet with a committee of the T. U. U. L. and then bring in recommendations for a policy! With the excellent situation for the Left wing created in the A. C. W. A. by the corruption prevalent and the crude class collaboration policy of the bureaucracy—coupled with genuine dissatisfaction in the ranks—the Party controlled Left wing has neither program, nor policy, nor has it made any efforts to organize a fight.

The criminal neglect of this situation—not only of the convention, but of the union as a whole which is the only organized expression of the men tailors—stamps the Party leaders properly: Phrasemongers. Their "mass work", their "winning the masses for the new line", and all the rest of their bluff, begins and ends with manifestos and proclamations in the Party press. With or without them, or in spite of them, the Left wing must take form again in the A. C. W. A. It is up to the rank and file to speak and act. The columns of the Militant are open to them. Readers will find the first of a series of articles on the situation in the A. C. W. A. on page 6 of this issue.

The Popular Militant Spirit

So serious has the situation become in India, that the Viceroy, Lord Irwin, has found it necessary to proclaim a new ordinance to censor the press which goes further than the notorious press act of 1910. Despite the rigid censorship, sufficient news has managed to leak out to indicate that there is a genuinely revolutionary temper pervading the masses of the miserably exploited Indian masses.

Conflicts Increase

Conflicts between Indians and government forces have become a daily occurrence. Scores upon scores have already been arrested, 26 in Calcutta alone in one day, after the shooting of a British soldier. The native regiments are not being counted upon by the British imperialists as they had hoped. During the Peshawar riots last week, it was later disclosed, at least two platoons—that much is officially admitted—"were found to be unsatisfactory", that is, to do murder work for Britain's financial lords.

So serious has the feeling of the masses become that the so-called Nationalist leaders, from Gandhi down, have felt compelled to "do something again" the government" in order to retain their hold upon the millions. Gandhi, under the guise of an opposition to British rule which he will give up (as he has done in the past) at the first sign of a genuinely revolutionary force appearing on the scene, is actually conducting a reactionary campaign. He is spreading the thoroughly reactionary idea that the primitive fabrication of native cloth is not only superior to the advanced manufacture of machine cloth, but is one of the ways of unloading the burden of British rule!

The great difficulty for the Indian liberation movement is that it is still dominated by such people as Gandhi, who can lead it only into a swamp of betrayal. A substantial revolution by movement, a Communist Party, does not, or as much as does not exist and the mis-leadership of Gandhi is not yet challenged. The Indian masses are showing their militant spirit, however, and Gandhi will not be forever able to direct it into theatrical, mystic, and—to Britain—harmless channels.

ATTENTION!

Just as we go to press, the committee in charge informs us that the Labor Temple, 14th Street and 2nd Avenue, has been obtained for a mass meeting on Thursday, May 15th, to hear Max Shachtman, editor of the Militant, who has just returned from Europe. Comrade Shachtman spent a number of weeks in Paris, where he attended the International Conference of the Left Opposition as delegate from the United States, and in Berlin, at the unity conference of the German Communist Opposition. In addition, he paid a lengthy visit to comrade Leon Trotsky in Turkey, and at the meeting he will bring the American militants a greeting from the great Bolshevik leader. Shachtman will speak on the situation in Russia and the prospects of the revolutionary movement in Europe and the United States, reporting also the viewpoint of the Left Opposition in general, and especially of comrade Trotsky. All workers are invited to attend this important lecture. Questions will be asked at the end. Admission will be 25 cents.

The Marine Workers Convention

By S. M. Rose

The seamen's convention held in New York from April 26 to the 27, unquestionably represented a number of highlights in the history of the movement. The first and most significant one was that for the first time in years a real, representative convention, in the sense that genuine seamen and dock workers from all the leading ports of the country, came together to organize a real union. The first day of the convention was shot through with an evident feeling and desire really to launch a marine workers' industrial union, and all the "third period" preparations seemed to have no effect. By the end of the second day it was quite evident to any understanding observer that most of the men in the convention were satisfied that a union had not been properly organized, at least beyond the formal act of naming the result a "union".

The convention was opened with the customary blessings of the Mink, Johnstone (representing the T.U.U.L.) reading a letter of political direction penned by Foster in the Tombs, and from that point the seamen started making motions as if they seriously meant to get down to business. Suggestions were made from the floor for the organization of the usual committees to facilitate the work, only to be silenced by a "broad" proposal made by the chairman, Harvey, that the national committee of the T. U. U. L. had certain definite recommendations about a general committee which was to perform all these functions. This took most of the men unawares, and without much discussion, the committee was accepted. It consisted of hand-picked, "reliable" Party members. Not a single "outsider" was on it.

The Mink Explodes

gate, Bill Drennan, a member of the M. T. W. (I. W. W.) who raised the question of serial adoption of the constitution. This gave the great Mink an opportunity to vent all his ignorant bile against the I. W. W., Trotskyites and Lovestoneites, and all those not baptized by the proper holy water. In ignorance and vilification, there has rarely been anything like it. After the Mink got through with his illiterate explosion Jack Johnstone with a benign smile, got up and "explained" that things were not quite so bad as the Mink would have us believe; that the I.W.W., of which about half the men present had been members at one time or another, did make militant history on the waterfront. With this bit of blarney, he proceeded to exhort them to use this background as a basis for building the new union. Good; only he neglected to explain in addition why so many Wobblies or ex-Wobs who had been associated with the Marine Workers League, and dared entertain ideas or thing for himself, had been chiselled out of the organization by mechanical manipulation of Messrs. Mink, Sparks and Co.

Here it might be in place to note that one of the paradoxical occurrences was the fact that in the back of the hall sat about 15 or 20 men who, within the last ten years or so, had at one period or another played a leading role in the industry. At one time or another within the last two years, most of them had either been part of the League or very close to it. And here they sat in the back of the hall, apparently having no formal influence upon the proceedings, yet constantly being turned to by those on the floor. These men could find no place in the "third period" scheme of organization.

Printers' Privileged Position Doomed

Revolutionary developments in the printing of your newspaper may within the next decade swallow up the jobs of thousands of union printers, and within a quarter century relegate a craft dating from Gutenberg's days to the pages of history books.

Two Threats to "Labor Skill"

From two sides come mechanical threats to the army of printers who operate typesetting machines. One is the teletypesetter which substitutes John Robot for the man at the linotype. Another is the photo composing machine which entirely scraps both typesetter and typesetting machine. Both processes were reviewed before the recent publishers convention in New York by Frank E. Gannett, owner of a chain of dailies and owner of the teletypesetter process.

Gannett now boasts that his robot typesetter has been at work in a small Illinois daily newspaper for six months. "At last," he said, "it is now ready for the market. A large number of machines are now going through the factory and the complete outfit will soon be available to publishers."

The machine is operated by a perforated tape produced by a machine printer for receiving telegraphed news. The machine printer itself displaced the Morse code telegraph operator. To begin with the teletypesetter will handle stock quotations and sports bulletins, but Gannett foresees the day when the complete newspaper, including wire and local news, will be teletypeset. "The teletypesetter tape," he said, "can be transmitted with greater rapidity and the composing machine acts with greater accuracy than a hand operated machine."

The only worker left when teletypesetter gets going will be the linotype machine. But even he will lose his job if Gannett is correct in saying that "I feel confident that some day photocomposing will displace metal casting machines." This device will photograph columns of type as they are set on a machine similar to a typewriter, backed by camera apparatus. The plate will then be engraved and given to the pressmen.

May Scrap Pressmen, Too

Revolutionary departures that will scrap press room workers are also foreshadowed in the prediction of Owen D. Young of General Electric that you will read your morning or evening paper through a device in the living room, operated by wireless mechanism.

The International Typographical Union facing in the 5-day week demand its stiffest battle since 1922 when it fought out the issue of the 44-hour week in job plants, must reckon on a new type of strike-breaker in the robot designed by Gannett and now in actual operation. If the pressmen and other printing trades unions will follow the union policy of working while the printers are on strike, publishers will be able to make shift temporarily while assembling scab crews.

Meanwhile the scab recruiting goes on apace, according to reports by Chairman H. W. Flagg of the "open shop" division of the American Newspaper Publishers Assn. and Chairman Harvey J. Kelly of the special standing committee. Kelly speaks of "special defense preparations" undertaken by the committee, which are said to have caused many printers unions to relinquish 5-day week and other demands. In both Lawrence Mass. and Hamilton, Ont., these "defense preparations" were undertaken.

Discussing the 5-day week, Flagg says: "In all cases involved where the newspaper has prepared in advance to take care of its publication in any case, a new agreement has been reached with demand for the 5-day week eliminated."

STREET CAR MEN DEMAND 6-DAY WEEK
PITTSBURGH—This city is wondering whether it will walk or ride after May 1. 2,800 car men turned down a proposal of the Pittsburgh Railways Co. to replace the expiring wage agreement.

THE SEAMEN'S CONVENTION

Bureaucracy Perfected!

About 118 seamen and longshoremen, the most representative body of workers that have ever come together on South Street wound up the marine workers' convention last week after a two days' sitting.

There was no lack of enthusiasm. In fact this very enthusiasm prevented the seamen and longshoremen from taking the problem of building their industrial union into their own hands, a task which they proved, throughout the sessions, to be more than capable of handling.

Johnstone's Manipulations

But in the noise of their enthusiasm they failed to consider the manipulations of the T. U. U. L. leaders as represented mainly by Johnstone who was bent with all his "eloquence" upon preventing the seamen from taking control of the convention. This was clearly shown, for example, when a motion came from the floor in accord with procedure, for the election of a national secretary, the opposition to Mink being unanimous. A "well-trained" Party member, whom the writer knows to be in ardent opposition to Mink, took the floor and amended that this task be left to the incoming national committee. Opposition to this insincere amendment was demonstrated in the heated discussion that followed when it appeared that it was getting out of control and a few Party members made only half-hearted stands for the motion, the big gun of the convention, Johnstone, rose to explain to the delegates the meaning of "centralized democracy", a phrase with which many miners, textile workers and needle trades workers have become very well acquainted in the last few years of Party mechanical control.

The writer was very much impressed on meeting one of the Party members after the convention who, in an apologetic tone, said: "Well, we had to do it (that is, support Mink) or it would have gotten out of the hands of the Party!"

Johnstone, in pointing out why no officials should be elected from the floor, stated that it was so easy for some one to get into a position of power that he could in the course of time, with the greatest ease, divert the organization into reactionary channels. The test of this shameful proclamation of the legalized bureaucracy can be seen in what the associated Johnstones have made out of the Left wing miners, textile and needle trades unions—shadows and wrecks.

It further shows the great fear the Party leaders have of the workers, contrary to the radicalization characteristics of the period which they claim to have analyzed so thoroughly, and which says correctly enough that we are in a period of sharpening class struggle when the militant elements of the working class come to the fore. What Johnstone fears is precisely these elements. Isn't the program and constitution of the T. U. U. L. leadership strong enough and clearly applicable to the period? Isn't the functioning of Communists in the union and its leadership, organized in fractions, good enough guarantees for Johnstone? No, he has to have one million person, brass-bound, choking control. The Party, after four years, was afraid to trust leaders from the delegations like McGrath, Harvey, Morgan and Hegeny, who were popular at the convention, and had proved by their activity in the ports that they are able to work without Johnstonian wet-nursing.

Organization a la Mode

Another outstanding feature of the convention was the obvious ignorance of the industry shown by Johnstone. Instead of simplifying the enormous task with which the convention was confronted, he proceeded to complicate matters so that no delegate could conceive just how they were to set about building the new union.

He proposed as one of their main tasks to organize a Negro section, a women's section, a youth section, and repeatedly stressed their importance. This will appear good in the Daily Worker, splendid in the T. U. U. L. and Party minutes, magnificent in the Executive Committee of the C. I. and the R. T. L. U., but ridiculous on the water front. But Johnstone is superior to such little matters as the waterfront, or else he would have known much better.

The Party fraction did not do itself proud at all. Most of the comrades are inexperienced, since the older ones have been driven out or become disgusted. No attempts have been made at training or educating the comrades; none is needed, most likely in the Third Period. It was comical, if it were not so tragic, when it came to the election of delegates to the R. T. L. U. Congress. The ones in greatest opposition to Mink approved of the slate previously drawn up. Can Mink contribute anything at the Congress? It is doubtful if even Mink believes that. But the faithful must be rewarded. Nobody must be allowed to think or act independently of the Party lash, for they might begin to think of how they are being used as chess men by the Party bureaucrats, instead of the Party working in fraternal harmony with the union.

The seamen and marine workers have had an "educational" meeting, but not a convention. They could learn from the sessions that so long as the T. U. U. L. leadership oversteps the boundaries of legitimate relationships to the unions affiliated to it, by not allowing it the necessary possibilities to develop initiative and elbow room to function as a real union of workers in the industry, instead of an advertisement for the latest Party line, there will be a cancer eating away at the organization from the beginning. The further realization of its aims, the organizing of the marine workers for a fight against the ship-owners, will be seriously hindered without the establishment of these proper relations between leaders and ranks, union and Party.

200 Men Control U. S. Industry

Concentration of power over the living conditions of 120 millions of people in the hands of less than 200 men was revealed by Senator Burton K. Wheeler, Democrat, in a speech before the National Democratic club. Wheeler quoted a banker as saying:

"In my estimation about 50 or 60 large companies in this country, each controlled by two or three men, do about 80%, through their various subsidiaries, of the industrial business of this country. There are hundreds of thousands of small corporations and individual business men in this country, but taken together they do only about 20% of the country's industrial business."

Φ

ILLINOIS JOBS MUCH SCARCER THAN A YEAR AGO

CHICAGO—For every available hundred jobs in Illinois in February there were 245.6 persons ready to take them, according to the state employment office. This was a slight improvement over January when 257.2 persons wanted every available hundred jobs but it was very much worse than February 1928. At that time the ration was 169.4 applicants for every hundred jobs.

The office makes the situation look blacker by reporting that the little improvement noted since January was not due to more jobs being open but to fewer applicants, indicating that people got tired of looking in vain for a job or perhaps moved to other states in search of one. Fewer boys were looking for jobs in February than in January.

That bosses seem to have been cutting wages appears from the detailed report for Chicago where employment in factories increased 1% but payroll totals increased only a tenth as much. More than three times as many workers applied for jobs in Chicago in February than could be placed.

ON SEATTLE: A CORRECTION

A comrade writes us from Seattle, correcting an error in No. 12 of the Militant.

"We have 17 cases. Two comrades got 60 days: $50.00 fine, one got 30 days: $50.00 and all others were fined $25.00. All are out on appeal bond, their cases coming up next month. The 32 cases are the old ones from Armistice Day and are out on bonds. Now we have more cases, since they just pick up the boys for having a drink on 12th and Jackson Streets and for not working. I wonder why the Opposition is not taking a more active part in the I. L. D. We surely need them."—E.

IN OUR NEXT NUMBER

Pressure of space compelled us to omit from this issue a number of very important articles. Our promised article on the developments within the British Labor Party will surely appear in the next issue. We will also have an analysis of the new group that has been formed in the Socialist Party in New York, the "younger" elements who obtained almost half the votes at the S. P. city convention. Then there is the introduction by comrade Trotsky to the American edition of his book "The Permanent Revolution", which will appear. Further, a reply to the Chinese "specialist" who hides behind the name R. Doonping, and who has written a particularly stupid article in the Communist "The Rising Revolutionary Wave and Trotsky Liquidation in China". Also an article by Max Shachtman on his recent visit to comrade Trotsky.

The book that first told the inside story of the struggle between the Opposition and the bureaucracy in the Communist Party in Russia. The details of how the conspiracy was hatched against Leon Trotsky by Stalin, Zinoviev, Bucharin and others, was recounted originally in this excellent volume. It is invaluable for an understanding of present day events in Russian and the world Communist movement.

EXIT MONDE! EXIT HENRI BARBUSSE!

We have not hurried to give our opinion on the journal of Henri Barbusse, Monde, the darling of l'Humanité in France as well as the Daily Worker and New Masses in the United States. We wanted to wait serenely to see this journal adopt a fairly clear line of conduct. Now it seems that we have waited in vain, and that Monde continues to be what it always was, that is, a literary publication of the democratic, whining phrase-mongering petty bourgeoisie who are so well personified by Barbusse. There is no doubt that Monde is not a journal of the Communist Party, neither is it a social democratic publication; it is something worse and more inoffensive at the same time, that is, a miscellany of the swamfiest, the most confused, in short, the most anti-proletarian slops produced by the politico-literary circles of the petty bourgeoisie.

The quality of the principal editors already tells a good deal. Of course, the Directing Committee which appears under the head is only a pure front. The director, Barbusse, is already known as a notorious anti-Marxist. For some time his lucrative literary activity has been divided between works of a Christian mysticism (novels, criticisms, plays on Jesus) and crude plagiarisms from the official Soviet economic press in praise of Stalin. The politics of the journal are directed by Paul Louis, a veritable living statue to the glory of "democracy", a scribbler at the service of every political sheet which offers a trough, be they republican, radical, socialist or Communist, from Soir to Monde, traversing a multitude of sheets of every species. This venerable leader of the Socialist-Communist Party spins out a vaguely radicalizing and pacifist prose every week in Monde on international politics.

The economic questions are dealt with in the pedantic manner by Delaisi and Laurat. The first of these two authors is notoriously ignorant of the A B C of Marxist economic science. In his recent works, like "The Two Europes", amiably commented upon by Monde, he shows himself a complacent critic of some "imperfections" of imperialism, which according to him, the trusts and alliances between the capitalists can remedy. Monde publishes from time to time comic, economic controversies between Delaisi and Laurat, the one explaining himself in the liberal and free-trader's tone, and the other replying with extracts from "Das Kapital" purged of any catastrophic consequences. If we add that the other collaborators are people like Habarau, Berl, Alraud Bernard, etc., etc., the question arises as to how how, why, in what respect and in what manner Monde can really be a journal which speaks, if not to the revolutionary proletariat, at least simply to the proletariat.

The real face of Monde, its pseudo-theoretical countenance, appeared at the time it undertook a so-called inquiry "On the Doctrinal Crisis of Socialism". The manner in which this inquiry was presented and the replies that were made to it, put Monde in its precise place. In the introduction, one could read: "In speaking of the doctrinal crisis of socialism, we understand the term in its vastest conception, detaching it from the daily struggles to which the various proletarian organizations devote themselves in the name of their respective doctrine". This phrase has only one meaning: The doctrinal crisis of socialism is above the class struggle. We are therefore not wrong in saying that Monde placed itself outside of revolutionary Marxism, outside of the proletarian struggle, in order to take refuge in the nebulous world of literary discussions. This does not prevent the editor of the introduction to the inquiry, who is no longer a Marxist—if he ever was one—from writing: "The doctrine (socialist) is passing through a crisis because it is in fact or in appearance—our inquiry will enable us to judge—in conflict with reality on a goodly number of points." What reality? We ask because it is not a question of the reality of political parties, nor consequently of classes, nor, finally, of the principal elements of capitalist society in which we are now living. That is to say that we, the Marxists and Communists, who ask it, for evidently the editor of Monde, lost in his abstractions, does not. Doesn't he write further that he intended to submit to his readers "the opinions of the most qualified representatives of the tendencies confronting each other in contemporaneous socialism, right as well as left, in the second and third international"?

For Monde, then, the only difference between social democracy and Communism is that of being the right and left wings of "socialism". This statement would be quite in place from the pen of an editor of Temps. But one wonders what it is doing in the pages of a journal which speaks in the name of Communism and the teachings of the Russian revolution. Moreover Monde has not been able up to now to publish anything but propaganda texts from Vandervelde, De Man, Renner, Deat and a few others, that is, of the theoretical screens for the bankruptcy of the second international and its irrevocable passage to the side of the democratic bourgeoisie. The opinions of the theoreticians of the Communist movement are still forthcoming. This could only be the consequence of the fact that the best leaders and theoreticians of the Communist movement are today expelled from the International by the Stalinist apparatus, in which M. Barbusse participates directly, while only the perverters of Marxist thought have the right to speak there today. But such is not the case, for no Communist belonging to the Left Opposition movement would want to soil himself in the Barbussean pot.

It is in reality the result of another fact whose developments we shall soon see: it is that the bureaucracy of the International is beginning to tire of the lucubrations of M. Barbusse, of the hotch-potch of slops of the revolutionary movement which he has made of Monde, and that it has begun the rupture with this journal. We are not afraid of any denial. The Soviet bureaucracy of the C. I. has despised Barbusse for a long time. This contempt reared at the time when Lenin was astounded because the French Communist Party distributed so idiotic a pamphlet as "The Knife between the Teeth". But now this contempt for the man it utilized has taken on a new form.

In the Vestnik Inostranoy Literatury (No. 5, December, 1929), Bruno Jazhinsky administers a superb bureaucratic reproof to the director of Monde. This reproof is naturally accompanied by organizational measures: The sale of Monde is prohibited on the news-stands and the book-stores in Russia and the journal no longer comes to the subscribers in the U. S. S. R. Mezhrupom has even offered to reimburse the subscribers for their money. This time it is clear: Molotov has had enough of the journal of Paul Louis and Delaisi. With the same gracefulness he excoriated in supporting Monde when it was first established he is preparing today to issue a bull against it.

It is likely that our new Christ Barbusse will suddenly cry out at dictatorship, bureaucracy, dogmatism. After having held his tongue till 1930, he will denounce the sectarian spirit of the leaders of the Communist Party, etc. Under such conditions, it is also likely that Monatte will be astounded that we are repulsing an eventual ally, an "Opposition to the Party". But for us the matter stands differently. We are not with everyone who is against the Party or against the International and the Soviet Union. We are not with those who desert the sinking ship, with those who abandon a freely embraced cause when it no longer profits them. We repulse and fight against those who, after having wholly approved up till now the methods and the action of the C. I., turn sharply upon it without seriously founded political reason. For we know that this type of capers always conceals a retreat fixed long ago, and a more or less bashful return into the petty bourgeois democratic ring. We know that the whole evolution in this sense of Barbusse and his journal will not signify an evolution beyond the domain of the C. I. apparatus towards a more consistent revolutionary activity, but quite simply the removal of a veil which concealed from the eyes of a pretty numerous public the essentially retrogressive, petty bourgeois and confusionist nature of Barbusse and his enterprises. Today only one mask gives them a proletarian revolutionary aspect and that is the Stalinist bureaucracy which itself is about to undertake the unmasking.

Unfortunately, a certain working class public lets itself be taken in by the phrases and the literary jargon of Monde. Doubtless this corresponds to their very comprehensible need to read something besides their ordinary political press, to educate themselves while being amused. A journal with such a goal cannot be a bad thing. But it must be realized seriously and with sincerity. It is these two qualities that are lacking in Monde. At present it is necessary that the revolutionary workers know that Monde is an organ of petty bourgeois literature and education and that, if it can sometimes divert them, it can aid and support them in no wise in their struggle. The bureaucrats of the Party who supported and encouraged Monde know this as well as we. And perhaps they are now preparing to say so. For they must certainly answer this question: Why is Monde, prohibited in the U. S. S. R. and therefore poor reading for the Soviet citizenry, recommended in France by the same bureaucracy which leads the Russian and French Communist Parties?

The «Red Peasants» Meet

The Peasant Congress would have passed unnoticed if the Berlin police had not interfered on the last day, so as to give it some notice. Incapable of creating a genuine mass movement, the bureaucracy which is installed in all the leading international bodies (I.R.A., W.I.R., Prointern, Krestintern, etc.) has specialized in calling Congresses to create the illusion of capturing the working masses and their allies. Not long ago, a very costly Congress was held in Berlin, the juridical congress, at which no one spoke, and whose chief accomplishment—aside from the squandering of a great deal of money—was to enable those belonging to the International League for the Rights of Men to protest against the application of the death penalty in the U.S.S.R. The bankruptcy of this juridical congress in no way hindered the calling of an international Peasants Congress in Berlin at the end of March. A hundred delegates participated. Old man Martel represented France (a new crisis has broken out between the Peasants confederation and the Party). The delegates from the other countries were in a class with Martel. In concluding the work, the creation of an International Peasants Committee was decided upon.

For what purpose? To maintain an office. That's all. Another problem immediately arose: did the creation of an International Peasants Committee mean in substance the liquidation of the Krestintern? Or would this Peasants Committee be a substitute for the Krestintern, or would it come out against it, or would it relegate itself to inactivity?

In this respect also, an alarm must be sounded. The country, the peasants are separated from the workers; in the country it is the forces of reaction that speak to the peasants. It is an immediate and urgent duty of the Communist Parties to penetrate into the country; this is the sole guarantee of success in all the revolutionary struggles of the working class. The bloc of the workers and peasants must not be empty talk. If the peasants are not united with the working class, the latter will find them in the enemies' lines, enrolled in the forces of reaction.

Reactionary Maneuvers in Spain

A rumor has been recently current that a crisis within the Berenguer government was provoked by the resignation of three of his ministers. The head general of Catalonia, general Barrera, made a trip to Madrid where he conferred with several important personages and then returned to Barcelona. They discussed against Berenguer, led by Barrera and Martinez Anido. Berenguer issued a denial but the conspiracy was nevertheless an actuality.

General Barrera filled the post of head generalship of the foremost military region of Spain (Catalonia), during the entire dictatorship. He was one of the principal supporters of the policy of Primo Anido. After the fall of the dictatorship he did not for a moment, together with Anido, cease maneuvering among the former ministers of the dictatorship and the leading elements of the Patriotic Union; but their maneuvers came to naught because of the unpopularity of all remnants of the dictatorship.

Berenguer was frightened for a moment fearing that the garrison of Catalonia might solidarize with Barrera. The latter was forced to present his resignation in order to take over other duties.

His post was taken over by the Prince Don Carlos of Bourbon. This appointment was well received by the Catalan plutocracy and by all the monarchist elements. The new head captain of Catalonia will attempt to save the monarchy of his cousin, Alfonso XIII. Berenguer was wise enough to win over the good will of Cambo and the Catalanian plutocracy.

Barrera attempted to organize several demonstrations: the Berenguer government forbade them. Despite that he issued two appeals to the garrison of Catalonia and to the Province defense corps, which showed his narrow ties with the former dictatorship and his desire, together with Martinez Anido and Sanjurjo, of re-instituting the dictatorial regime, even more brutal and violent than that under Primo de Rivera.

It is quite evident that the initial Republican enthusiasm has greatly diminished. This movement deceived many. Two months slipped away in complete confusion and disorganization, no one being able to lead this movement towards realization. Many naively believe today that the Republic will be peacefully achieved through elections. The Berenguer government sustains this illusion. In opposing the dictatorial maneuvers of Barrera and Martinez Anido, he wished to attempt the recapture in part of the confidence of the people which he had lost completely.

We have never had any great illusions concerning the Republican movements which followed the fall of Primo de Rivera. The petty bourgeois republicans are not and cannot be genuine revolutionists. They are afraid of the Revolution and of the proletariat and hope that the Republic will fall from the sky. That is why from the first moment we have set ourselves the task of fighting against the monarchy and at the same time unmasking the false republicans.

We have confidence only—is it necessary to mention this?—in the exploited worker and peasant classes. We must be at their sides in order to enlighten and direct them. The Communist Party must above all fix upon its proper characteristics, its slogan of the proletarian vanguard, and must energetically fight in the defense of the interests of the working class and for a Spanish Workers and Peasants Republic.

The International Opposition Conference

pages of its position. By its possession of a powerful press, telegraph, radio, and the like, it systematically falsified for years the Oppositionist's point of view, making it responsible at every turn for Centrism's own yesterdays. By injecting an unprecedented confusion in the ranks of Communism, it attained its immediate aim—but at the enormous cost of weakening the Marxist wing in the International.

The Origin of the Opposition

In examining its present condition, the Opposition could not forget its own origin. It arose in the Soviet Union. From the beginning, all its acts and words were limited by the exceptional conditions of the proletarian dictatorship and subsequently by the regime of bureaucratic strangulation of the Party. The views of the Russian Opposition penetrated abroad only episodically, a fact which alone made difficult the creation of a common ideological foundation. Furthermore, since the Russian Opposition directed its course of redressment of the Party line without splits or convulsions dangerous for the dictatorship, the Communist Left in the capitalist countries was necessarily obliged to an extreme restraint. But the Centrist bureaucracy chose the path of smashing the Opposition organizationally, always at the price of strangling the Party.

The crushing of Party democracy in the U. S. S. R., as well as throughout the Comintern, violently retarded the development and education of the cadres of the Opposition. The theoretical work of the Opposition, its analyses, its valuation of conditions, its predictions and its slogans thus remained the property of comparatively small circles. To this day, the official Party and the Right wing press can ascribe the most outrageous ideas to the Opposition simply because our real point of view has been so ruthlessly suppressed. The absence of numerous cadres capable of actively advocating our ideas in all branches of the labor movement, greatly facilitated in its turn, the hunting down of the Opposition by the apparatus.

Without these broad cadres and close international connections, the Opposition dispersed national groups of a propagandist nature. Every one was condemned to seek its own way by its own isolated means. In that already lay the danger of discord, of vacillation, of false ideas, and national limitedness.

To this must be added another fact. At each of its turns, Centrism drove out of the Comintern elements of a very diverse, and frequently, opposed character. They usually counted themselves or were counted among the Opposition. A number of them systematically compromised the banner of the Opposition through manifestations of opportunism, anarcho-syndicalism and petty bourgeois dilletantism. It is enough to name the Urbahns group which brought us the greatest damage by declaring its own all the caricatured ideas which Stalin maliciously attributed to the Left Opposition. In France there were a number of such groups deforming the views of the Opposition. In many countries, the course of the struggle showed that it was not so difficult to proclaim oneself for a revolutionary course in China, or in Russia, or in some other distant land, and pursue, under such a cover, a more or less opportunist course at home. Such a danger still exists and can be observed in one manner or another in most countries.

The same conditions, therefore, which determined the appearance of the Opposition as a political factor, also made for its weakening in the first years. There is no need to conceal this fact, for the camouflage policy of imitating the possession of power instead of really fighting for it is a contemptible one: we do not call ourselves the "majority group of the Communist Party" when we are but a small faction in it.

Our Recent Successes

Nevertheless, there is very reason to register very substantial successes in the recent period. These were brought out in the reports made by the delegates from every country represented at the conference.

The period was largely devoted to a necessary ideological delimitation, to the purification of our ranks and our minds—generally necessary in a proletarian party and a dozen times more imperative in a faction of a party. In some cases this work led to splits and seemingly to our weakening. But in reality, aiming at quality, this work prepared for us the possibilities of gaining quantitative successes in the immediate future.

In France, the appearance of La Verite and the transformation of La Lutte de Classes into a theoretical monthly, marked a milestone in the development of the French Opposition. While the writer was in France, the loosely-organized movement was coordinated and the Communist League of France (Opposition) constituted. There our influence is steadily mounting, under the direction of an excellent group of militants whose influence in the Party and the trade unions is palpably increasing. Guided by our comrades, there is being formed a substantial fraction in the Red trade union center (C. G. T. U.) which fights the stupid policies of the Party leadership as vigorously as it combats the liquidationist tendencies represented by the Right wing—"pure" syndicalist minority in the unions. Such a trade union group is a pressing need in the United States too.

In Germany, the last year was one of deep internal struggle which ended with the inevitable split of the Leninbund. This prepared the fusion of the Marxist section of the Leninbund with the Wedding and Palatine Opposition, and the creation of an organ which will represent the genuine opinions of the Communist Left. Relieved now of the confusionism of Urbahns, the German Left has every opportunity for rapid growth. Its unity conference on March 30 was already a demonstration of this fact. Despite the difficulties unavoidably present in combining two groups with diverse lines of past development, one could see the rise of a movement that will swiftly encompass the genuine Marxist elements within and without the official Party.

Our most sensational success has been in Spain. The Spanish Opposition has been transformed from a number of isolated groups living in enforced exile in France, Belgium and Luxemburg, into a powerful factor in the Spanish movement. Following the fall of Primo de Rivera, it was able to win over—in an amazingly brief period—the most decisive sections of the official Party and regroup those workers who had left it. The strongest Party districts are already with us, and the work has only been started.

In Czechoslovakia a firm group has been formed which is preparing to issue its own journal and re-establish a Marxist center in the country. There the policies of Stalinism have borne ripe—rotten ripe—fruit, because they have enabled the Right wing to gain the support of thousands of Czechoslovakia's best proletarian elements. The struggle will cut like a knife into their ranks, however, and turn the current in the other direction.

In China, where the Communist Party was decimated by Chiang Kai-Shek, assisted by Stalin, Bucharin and Martinov, the Opposition has found deep roots. Under indescribably difficult conditions, our comrades have assembled a powerful kernel of revolutionists who are preparing for the inevitable, third Chinese revolution. Their writings and deeds already show a Marxist profundity and keenness that is enviable. Their contribution to our movement is and will be immense.

In the Argentine, in Mexico, in South Africa, among the Indo-Chinese militants, the Opposition is beginning to make its way, even over the obstacles of distance and the years of falsification of the Stalinist apparatus. In the United States and Canada, where the Opposition was formed only after the Sixth Congress, we already form Opposition, and a decisive element in the one of the most important sections of the life of the movement, both in the Party and in the general Left wing.

But it is impossible not to note that in Belgium and Austria, two countries where the social democracy is particularly strong, and official Communism can show nothing but mistakes, defeats and impotence, the Opposition has not made any noticeable progress in the last period. The causes for this must be reserved for another occasion. The international Opposition, however, a source of strength for every national organization, will be of immeasurable aid to these two movements especially.

Towards an International Congress

The Paris Conference decided upon the convocation of an international Congress of an international Congress of the Left Opposition in the near future. The period in between will be devoted to an exhaustive preliminary discussion that will bring the confident clarity necessary for the Congress to adopt the long-needed international Platform of the Opposition. The Bulletin of the Secretariat will be largely devoted to this task, and our American group must collaborate in its solution to the maximum of its ability. Our internationalism, unlike that of the Right wing, is not of the platonic, politely friendly kind which obligates us to nothing but the use of the word, and an exchange of meaningless courteous correspondence and visits. It is, on the contrary, the very essence of our whole life and movement the mainspring of our political conceptions.

The corrupted apparatus, which has systematically undermined the foundations and the prestige of the Communist International, will shout itself hoarse with accusations about a "Fourth International". But that will only frighten infants and old women. We are reassembling the foundation stones of our International. We are cementing them with a renewed solidarity. We are defending the structure with the imposing armory of weapons inherited from Marx and Lenin. We will hold it against the rude and disloyal attacks of the usurpers whose name is Stalin. Let the bought writers, speakers and executioners of the ruling regime continue yet for a while to poison the atmosphere of the struggle. We bring a strength and light into the movement that will pierce the fog and reveal the future that belongs to us.

A Telegram to Comrade Leon Trotsky

The first international meeting of the Left Communist Opposition, held in Paris on April 6, composed of German, American, Belgian, Spanish, French, Hungarian, Italian and Czechoslovakian delegates, sends its warmest greetings and the mark of its closest solidarity to the Bolshevik comrades, imprisoned and deported, and to their exiled leader, L. D. Trotsky.

al things which brings Mink to the top for their brief moment of authority.

One all-prevailing concept that was evidenced in the utterances of every Party spokesman at the convention was that the organization needed nursing and the Party bureaucrats were there to furnish it. When the question of adopting the constitution came up, every objection was answered with: "We'll take care of that in the future!" or words to that effect. When the problem of control of the national committee arose, it too was answered by the usual: "We'll leave it to the incoming committee."

The Ship Councils Idea

A word in relation to this is quite important. The question of ship councils are quite all right in a basic stable industry as a means of coordinating the work of a center with the smaller units. But in the marine industry, where crews manning a vessel are changed almost monthly, it is wrong as the only form of organization. Today a crew might man a vessel in New York; tomorrow, the same crew might be divided between all the ports from Shanghai to Marseilles. Therefore, the possibilities of coordinating or checking the work of the center with such an organization is out of the question. This creates a very "convenient" leading committee, all sufficient independent of rank and file control, and self-perpetuating, if it wishes.

The next proposition was one of finance, which men from the floor pointed out was essential to a self-sustaining organization, only to have the wet nurse, Johnstone, once more tell them of the terrible difficulties, financial and otherwise, that they must face. Even to dream of a self-sustaining movement was out of the question! Once more posing the proposition of the T. U. U. L.'s rigid wardship.

The third important matter was the question of sectional organization. The T. U. U. L. representative, in order to facilitate the understanding the Daily Worker readers and the Moscow bureaucrats, proposed a form of organization that would be quite familiar to all of them: Negro section, Youth section, and...a Women's section. This last "section" was too much for some of the delegates.

The convention adjourned without having accomplished a single concrete task—and this is all the more criminal considering the opportunity given the convention directors by the excellent representation from every port of consequence. No national committee was elected. The constitution and its amendments were referred to the incoming committee which was not elected. The selection of the national committee (provisional, if you please) was turned over bag and boots to the national committee of the T. U. U. L., where the seamen delegates who thought they might suggest its composition, could never have anything to do with it. The question of a secretary so important in face of the almost universal opposition to Mink, was also left for "future consideration", which means Mink again. Along with this the question of the editorship of the Marine Workers' Voice, was also left hanging, which means Hines and what Hines stands for—or rather what he doesn't stand for.

Stalinists Endanger the Movement

A splendid start was made. A good basis was at hand. But the great Party "thinkers" did their best to stifle it from the word go. The "danger" of real initiative, of authoritative leadership springing from the ranks and from the struggle, will surely be "combated" by the Party brain batteries: the convention showed that. These people are so uncertain of their own ability to lead, founded upon intelligence and capacity, that they fear to let a single organizational thread out of their hands. It was apparent that there was more insight and ability on the floor of the convention, regarding the problems of the militant seamen and the way to solve them, than there was in the whole Party fraction.

The basis for growth and progress is still at hand. The new movement can become a real power. But the Party "specialists" must change their narrow, stalling course, which will inevitably reduce the new marine union into the horrid caricature that has been made, for instance, of the National Miners Union. The militants in the marine industry will enter into this new movement with all the greater energy because the enormous possibilities are threatened from the start by the cheap machinations of a bureaucratic clique.

Elated because he had at last found a job after a year's unemployment, Tony Santonostos returned to his home in Staten Island to find his three children dead by gas and his wife nearly asphyxiated. She had turned on the gas after a long and futile struggle to feed her children.

In the Party

The N. Y. District Is Re-organized

It is not a matter of principle that I wish to take up here, nor is it a question of policy in the class struggle. It seems that even in the simplest matters, in the most practical question the Party "leadership" has developed blunders and incapacity to a science.

Tuesday morning, April 22, I found a letter in my mail saying: "In line with the plan and decision of the Section Committee and the District Committee, the readjustment of the Section has been finally completed." It goes on further to say what new unit I was assigned to, and that I should appear for a meeting that evening, in a new place. This is the manner in which the reorganization of one of the largest sections of the Party was "achieved". No previous discussion by the members, no explanation on the basis upon which this reorganization has taken place. Everything was decided upon and carried out by the Section and District committees. Naturally, the result was—confusion.

Out of over 30 comrades assigned to my unit, half a dozen showed up to the meeting. In one place the letter says: "A system of revolutionary competition will be immediately instituted between units in relation to the stabilization of the unit, election of proper functionaries and the concentration on shops and factories, etc." Try and stabilize when the comrades walk around like sheep that have been lost from the flock, wondering where they belong. To quote once more from the same letter: "If you meet a comrade who did not receive a letter and does not know where his unit meets, take him to your unit meeting (!) and the Section representative will check up."

Eventually the lost sheep will perhaps find their flock. But this stunt was pulled exactly two weeks before May Day when every nerve of the Party is to be strained for in mobilizing the maximum number of workers, and a section of about 500 workers remains virtually disorganized and impotent to effectively work for the demonstration.

One gets the impression that there are master minds at the head of the Party constantly planning confusion and blunders—in big matters as well as small ones. If this be true, they are succeeding marvelously. —B.T.

A Little Purification

PITTSBURGH—

Charges have been brought in the Communist Party here against John Kaspar and M. Garfigel, and it is said, against John Otis as well. The charges are that they all attended the unemployment convention in New York without the authority of the Party. But that charge only conceals the real reason. The main reason is that Kaspar, as an organizer for the T. U. U. L., criticized the bureaucrats Devine and Saltzman so sharply that they could stand it no longer. Kaspar organized the campaign for the food workers, but the Party officials never assisted him. Kaspar would organize street meetings, but the Party officials never assisted him. Kaspar did as best he could for the cab strikers but the Party officials would say one day that they had ideological control of the strikers and the next day: If they won't accept our program, to hell with them. All these crimes brought about the suspension of Kaspar from the Party for a certain time and with him, Garfigel.

The Men's Clothing Union

In the Amalgamated: From Class Struggle to Class Collaboration

Prior to the formation of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the United Garment Workers, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, claimed jurisdiction over the clothing workers in the United States and Canada. Nominally, the organization is still in existence, but is no longer a factor either in industry or in the labor movement for the simple reason that it has failed to organize the clothing workers in the United States and Canada.

The Betrayal of the U. G. W.

In 1913 the clothing workers in New York decided to strike against their intolerable conditions. Over fifty thousand tailors, mostly unorganized joined ranks with the handful of radicals who initiated the movement. The strikers stood solid in spite of terrorism by the police, hired gunmen and the sabotage on the part of the national officers. The storm came when the president of the U. G. W., Tom Rickert, without the knowledge of the strikers, made a settlement which the workers and local leaders refused to accept. They claimed he "sold them out". Influential people in the labor movement intervened and a compromise settlement was reached. The workers won some of their demands and went back to work. They built up strong local unions against the wishes of the reactionary U. G. W. officialdom.

In 1914 the U. G. W. held its convention in Nashville, Tennessee. This city was chosen although it was not a clothing center and was very remote from one. The General Officers did this purposely because they knew the tailors had no money to send a full delegation. Consequently, the officers figured to control a majority in the convention and re-elect themselves into office. But the local unions did send their full delegations—and they were not seated. The delegates who were allowed to take their seats were mostly women from over-all locals—"paper locals"—which the general officers had then and still have at their mercy by means of the union label.

The delegates who were barred from the convention by the general officers, and also some of the insurgents who had been seated held their own convention in another hall in the same city. They elected their general officers and a general executive board with a complete machinery for the work of the organization. Their action was quickly ratified by the rank and file, who immediately began to pay dues to the new administration in order to supply "a fighting treasury".

First Victory of the A. C. W.

Immediately upon its assuming office the new administration with Hillman as President and Schlossberg as General Secretary, was confronted by a serious industrial conflict in Baltimore. Without a treasury, without effective machinery because of lack of time to establish it, and surrounded by odds, the General Executive Board took up the fight. The success or failure of this struggle was a test case for the new organization. In spite of the fact that the organization was penniless, in spite of treachery by the deposed officers, and in spite of the fact that one branch of the industry—the cutters—betrayed the tailors and went back to work—in spite of all this the 2,500 tailors fought bitterly until they won the strike gloriously. Thus, the first struggle led by the new organization was also its first victory.

This successful struggle was a deadly blow to the old administration, the U. G. W. of A.

The new administration had passed through its first line trenches, but it still went under the name of the U. G. W. of A. The following year the courts ruled that the old reactionary leadership was entitled to the name and treasury of the old, faded U. G. W. organization. The new organization therefore called a special convention in New York in December, 1914, and changed its name to the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

The new organization was based upon the class struggle and militancy of a high order as the preamble of the adopted constitution vividly attests. It set forth its principles in the following revolutionary words:

"The economic organization of labor has been called into existence by the capitalist system of production, under which the division between the ruling and the ruled class is based upon the ownership of the means of production. The class owning those means is the one that is ruling, the class that possesses nothing but its labor power is the one that is being ruled.

"A constant and unceasing struggle is being waged between these two classes.

"It further states—

"The workers must accept the principle of industrial unionism or be doomed to impotence."

The 1914 convention was the most outstanding in the history of the clothing workers in the United States and Canada. Radicals, revolutionists of all shades of opinion united and supported the new Amalgamated union. A new spirit and idealism was brought into the organization. Every industrial center, large or small, asked for organizers and help from the new organization.

The Early Successes

With conditions favorable for organization among the clothing workers, the leaders started a campaign in every industrial center and made rapid headway. Thus we see in 1915 a big strike in New York which improved the conditions of the workers. The same year a strike of 30,000 workers was called in Chicago. This was one of the bitterest struggles waged by the new union and lasted from September 1915 to January 1916. Two workers were killed during this strike and 1,200 arrests were made. The demands of the strikers were a 48 hour week, a 25 percent wage increase, and recognition of the union. Although the strike was lost through the scabbing of the old reactionary U. G. W. with the aid of the police, yet it laid the foundation and maintained organization. As a result of this struggle the employers in Chicago signed an agreement in 1919 with the 'amalgamated without a strike. This shows that strikes are a good weapon and not in vain when an organization is sincere and means business, instead of monkey business.

Here was the Amalgamated within a short period of five years—from 1914 to 1919—fighting battles, winning demands and establishing the first 44 hour week for the clothing workers. It was done not by miracles and appealing to the employers, but through struggle and sacrifices. This brought prestige and respect not only from the clothing workers, but from the employers, and even from enemies within the labor movement like the A. F. of L.

This shows again that reactionaries who say you can not organize workers through strikes do not know what they are talking about, or else they want to sit on their soft chairs comfortably and not do the job.

Because of its militancy and strength, the Amalgamated was the first union to be attacked by the open shop campaign in 1920 and 21. This lock-out involved about 60,000 workers in New York City and about 15,000 in Baltimore and Boston. It began on December 8, 1920 and ended on June 1, 1921. This lock-out was the most bitter fight of its kind ever waged by any organization in the history of the American labor movement. The employers failed to break the spirit of the workers even with the aid of the hired gangsters, and police brutality so they resorted to the courts and sued the organization for millions of dollars in damages. The A. F. of L. helped the employers in every way they could to destroy the Amalgamated but they failed.

This was the last heroic battle the Amalgamated waged, and since then Hillman and his general executive board have made peace with the employers.

Stalin Assassinate Two More!

MOSCOW—

I forward to you the information we received from N. "A new comrade arrived from Moscow. He was arrested among the '150' (in reality another hundred should be added to this figure). Two from his group were sent to the realm of Pluto. The names of these comrades are: Rabinovich and Silov. The mood of the workers, according to him, is that of waiting. In the city of Serpuchov there were 'disturbances' in a textile factory as a result of which the workers got a raise in the price list on some items, instead of a cut. Partyites also participated in the 'disturbances'."

It is clear that he is talking about the shooting of two Oppositionists. This is quite possible. At first there were expulsions from the Party, then exile follows, then jail, then the beating up in the Charkov and Ural jails then the murder of Butov through hunger, then the "accidental" murder (by beating up) of Haenrichson in Leningrad. Why should it be impossible that they are beginning to send Oppositionists into the other world? The shakier the ground under the Centrist feet becomes the more bestial they become. Autumn flies sting painfully...

Stalin's last speech on "Dizziness from Success" is undoubtedly symptomatic. It seems to me that turning to the Right (when this turn will begin) the Centrists will attempt to throw upon our shoulders all their ultra-Left crimes, as it happened in 1928 with the extraordinary measures. After all the press is in their hands. That is why it is necessary to give a timely warning to the working class about our relation to the Centrist inanities not only abroad (there it is much easier), but here too. For that it is necessary to hurry up with a declaration to the Party and to the working class. We must by no means hesitate.

Φ

The murder of Blumkin was only a beginning. We are informed about the shooting of two more Oppositionists: the comrades Silov and Rabinovich. Evidently the idiotic invention about the participation of Oppositionists in railroad sabotage was made with the idea of explaining away the Thermidorian crimes against the Bolshevik-Leninists. But comrades Silov and Rabinovich, had no relation whatever, not only with "sabotage", but even with railroads.

The fact that Stalin still covers up the shooting of Blumkin, proves that he has nothing to say in explanation of the committed murder. Stalin's driving forces in these new crimes, are: personal revenge, and usurpationist alarm.

The murders will not not frighten the Opposition—about that there is no need of talking—but will not even shake it from its path. We have a strict count of the crimes of the Stalinist apparatus. But the Party and the apparatus are not one and the same thing. The Party as a whole must demand an answer from the Stalinist fraction for its murderous policy. And it will find us in its ranks.

Message to Siberia

Deep in the Siberian mine,
Keep your patience proud;
The bitter toil shall not be lost,
The rebel thought unbowed.

The sister of Misfortune, Hope,
In the under-darkness dumb,
Speaks joyful courage to your heart:
The day desired will come.

And love and friendship pour to you
Across the darkened doors,
Even as round your galley-beds
My free music pours.

The heavy-hanging chains will fall,
The walls will crumble at a word;
And Freedom greet you in the light,
And brothers give you back the sword

IN THE RAILROAD BROTHERHOODS

The Legislative Board Game

Of the many festering sores which run through the American labor movement and keep it weak, backward, and unable to function, the Railroad Brotherhood's Legislative Boards may be classed as one of the most destructive.

Like the rest of the unions in our craft system of organization the Railroad Brotherhoods are infested by swarms of high salaried bureaucrats, all seeking to keep their easy jobs and their big pay. The legislative boards have furnished an excellent excuse for still more office-holders to climb upon the workers' backs.

The Make-Up of the Boards

Each organization of the Conductors, Engineers, Firemen and Trainmen maintains its own State and National Legislative Boards. The State Boards are made up of one representative from each Lodge or Division (meaning local union) with a Chairman, Secretary, and Executive Committee elected at stated biennial or triennial meetings as provided in the Union constitution. The National Boards are made up entirely of Grand Lodge Officials, as in the B. of L. E. or of Grand Officers and the Chairmen of the several State Boards, as is the case in the B. of L. F. & E.

Each one of the Four Brotherhoods has these boards organized in each one of the 48 states and the several Provinces of Canada. As a general rule each board maintains a lobbyist at each of the sessions of the State and Provincial Legislatures. The salaries of these lobbyists run variously from twelve to eighteen dollars per day, which accounts for the fact that these lobbyists are constantly finding more and more excuses to lay-off to perform some imaginary service.

On account of the big pay which the members of these Legislative Boards have helped themselves to, there is always present the strong temptation to prolong the Board sessions. As a general rule the members are also paid for coming and going to these meetings which is supposed to compensate them for actual time lost at their daily work and this privilege is often abused at the expense of the rank and file dues payer.

How the Racket Works

The last session of the Minnesota State Legislative Board of the B. of L. E. can be used to illustrate how the beneficiaries of this legislative board system work the game. The whole board was kept in session for three days. The executive committee held a session on the fourth day. The only actual work done was the auditing of the books and the election of officers, all of which could have been done on the first day. The auditing committee was ready to report at noon the first day. The board passed a resolution eulogizing the legislative record of Senator Shipstead and hired an expert penman for five dollars to write the resolution before presenting it to the senator. The board members charged the dues payers for going and returning from the meeting regardless of no time lost in doing so. John F. Collins, Chief of Division No. 369, who also represents that Division on the legislative board, lives at St. Paul and runs a day switch engine at that point. He had only half as far to go to attend the board meeting at St. Francis hotel as he had to the round house where he gets his engine. Still he received pay for one day coming to the meeting and one day for returning from said meeting at the rate of $16.00 per day, a total of $32.00 when as a matter of fact he was running an engine on both of those days, or should have been if he was not.

In one expense account of the Minnesota B. of L. E. Board we find the following items: "To H. S. Martin, 1 days work looking up a picture for the B. of L. E. Journal of a depot, $11.00", and again: "To H. S. Martin, 1 days work securing a picture of Magnus Johnson for B. of L. E. Journal, $11.00".

From May 14th 1924 to December 12th, 1927, three years and seven months, the B. of L. E. Legislative Board of Minnesota alone spent $12,451.87, of which $5,361.54 landed in the pockets of the Chairman and lobbyist, W. W. Royster. This sum alone spent by the Board is enough to pay the affiliation fee of the 27 B. of L. E. local unions in the state to the state Farmer-Labor Party for 81 years.

In the Firemen's Magazine of January, 1929, there appears a financial statement by the Secretary of the B. of L. F. & E. State Legislative Board of Pennsylvania, covering the three months of the third quarter of 1928. This statement shows disbursements during the three months in question amounting to $19,106.10.

Just these few figures cited above, are enough to give the reader some ideas of the enormous sum of money spent annually by the Legislative Boards, state and national, of the four transportation Brotherhoods, and the political returns for this outlay of workers' earnings are practically nothing. To illustrate the complete uselessness of the Legislative Boards and their lobby, we cite below a literal quotation taken from page 6 of the Biennial Report of the Railroad Brotherhoods' State Legislative Board of Minnesota, which shows what happened to their legislative program at the 1929 Minnesota Legislature. Note carefully:

one year, 1929. Nearly all of this sum landed in the pockets of the four lobbyists who spent a pleasant winter in St. Paul.

About all these Legislative Boards amount to, is, that they furnish excuses for more office holders to collect dues from the railroad workers for their personal benefit and enjoyment. In addition to being extremely expensive these Boards are an actual obstacle to progress and independent labor political action.

The useless and expensive Legislative Boards and Lobby are part of the rubbish which will have to be removed to clear the path for labor's political party. This task has already been started by the progressive wing of the Engineers and Firemen in the State of Minnesota with the slogan, "A Labor Party instead of a Labor Lobby".

Other readers of the Daily Worker will feel with us, we are sure, when we say it pains us to announce that Earl Browder has been made editor of that journal. Relatives and friends of the family are invited. Omit flowers.

Shall Three More Workers Burn?

Three militant workers are facing the electric chair. They are M. H. Powers, Communist Party organizer, Joe Carr Young Communist League organizer, of Atlanta, Ga., and Leonard S. Doherty, marine worker, now living in Boston. As a result of their working class activity among the textile workers of the South and the needle trades workers of Boston, these three men will burn unless the labor movement is mobilized in their support. The International Labor Defense is conducting their defense, but to the present, its participants are almost exclusively Communists and their closest sympathizers. Even the Communist press is giving it a minimum of publicity, apparently not realizing the serious charges against the three men.

Electric Chair for Leaflets

Powers and Carr were arrested after they had spoken at mass meetings attended by Negro and White workers and had distributed leaflets issued by the Communist Party and the Young Communist League. They are charged with leading an insurrection against the state of Georgia! According to the laws of that state conviction can result in their being sentenced to the electric chair.

When the case came up for a hearing on Monday, April 21, Assistant Solicitor General John Hudson who is leading the prosecution, stated that the state would ask for the death penalty. At that time the bail of the two workers was withdrawn by the state. They are now in prison awaiting trial, scheduled to begin May 6. One of the reasons given by the assistant attorney-general for demanding the maximum sentence for the two workers is that if released they would participate in a May Day demonstration.

Leonard S. Doherty, was arrested several months ago in Boston when he was marching on the picket line during the strike of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union. At that time the Canadian authorities stated that he was wanted for a murder committed there in 1925. This is an obvious frame-up, for Doherty was not in Canada during that year.

Information was received on April 24, that a federal warrant to deport Doherty to Canada is in the hands of an officer of the superior court of Boston. However, the day previous, Doherty was given a two months sentence in the Superior Court in a charge of beating up a scab during the needle trades workers strike. Therefore the warrant will not be served until after he has served his 60 day sentence. If deported to Canada, Doherty will be tried for murder, which with conviction, will mean the electric chair.

Facts of the Case Suppressed

At the present time, the facts concerning these two frame-up cases are practically unknown outside of the limits of the territory with which they are concerned. In the Carr and Powers case, several Southern newspapers print the details. In the Doherty case, only part of the New England press publishes the news of the case. In addition, of course, the Party periodicals with their limited circulation from time to time publish inadequate accounts, but apparently have not taken either case very seriously.

Is it part of the "third period" point of view to allow militant workers to go to the electric chair without putting up a serious fight? Most criminal of all, is the lack of any attempt to organize a united front movement in their behalf. Although the Gastonia defense was sectarian the dramatic incidents connected with the police raid on the tent colony, resulted in a large amount of publicity in the capitalist press and the mobilizing of certain sections of the liberals and the labor movement for their support. In the present cases, these factors are lacking and unless the Communist Party wakes up, it will have three corpses to bury. These are

A «Broad» May Day Conference

Another of those farcical conferences, euphemistically designated as "United Front" out of respect to traditions of former days, was held by the official Communist Party in preparation for May Day on Thursday night, April 24th at Manhattan Lyceum. There were 985 delegates present who, it was claimed, represented many working class organizations and shops. But a subsequent examination of the list of organizations, which were announced to participate in the May Day parade, reveals only the Party auxiliary organizations and the new unions, both of which have long lost whatever mass character they once had, due to the false policies of the Party. Most of the delegates, it could easily be seen were Party members. The admission of the political bureau of the central committee two days later, that "the United Front conferences were not sufficiently broad" testifies clearly to the narrow character of the May Day Conference.

Oppositionist Ejected

The delegate, of the New York branch Communist League of America (Opposition) comrade Russell Blackwell, who had been sent with the idea that perhaps on May Day at least, the divided forces of the Communists might be united in demonstration against capitalism was forcibly ejected the moment he made his appearance at the door. Jack Perrilla, guardian of the Party line and formidable Trotsky killer, was commander in chief with the proper orders and slogans, and directed the strategical operations of the anti-Trotsky defense force from behind the lines—far behind, in fact.

The proceedings of the conference were another demonstration of the current Party methods which kill all initiative, stifle honest discussion, and destroy Communist influence. The Party controversies immediately made their appearance when a Lovestone follower, delegate from a shop, asked for the floor in the discussion, and was denounced for his Party opinions and not permitted to discuss. Later, perhaps to relieve the conscience of the Party, the credentials committee announced that it had been discovered that he represented no one and was accordingly unseated as a delegate. All the talking was monopolized by the Party bureaucrats, even when at last discussion was opened, only three delegates from the floor were allowed to speak, and right away again commenced a torrent of bombast from such staunch protectors of the latest Stalin line as Wagenknecht, Engdahl and Salzer. Eventually, when the delegates had become fatigued from the steady dripping downpour of oratorical tripe, and were hurrying out of the hall, the chairman Darcy thought it an opportune time to adjourn the meeting.

Unemployed workers who wonder where their next soupbone is coming from can read nevertheless for the price of a daily newspaper about Mr. J. P. Morgan's $2,500,000 private yacht. This is the most palatial yacht ever built. It possesses the dimensions of an ocean liner 343 feet long and 43 feet beam. The Corsair is expected to develop 16 knots. Teak imported from the Orient is used throughout the ship except in the crew's quarters. It is reported that Mr. Morgan will not work in the stoke hole.

not the kind of heroes we want, which would be used to show the growing of class conflicts in America to the Stalinist regime in Moscow. Powers, Carr and Doherty must be saved! Let the International Labor Defense make the campaign for their defense a broad united front movement in which all sections of the labor movement can participate. Its refusal will mean that the Engdahls and the other Stalinist generals of the Red I. L. D. are more concerned with the prosecution of their idiotic formulae than with the proletarian defense of three militants.

The memory of Sacco and Vanzetti is yet too green to allow the American workers to remain with folded arms while the capitalist savages polish off their chairs to receive three more workers in their deadly embrace.

From Hillquit to Lovestone

Pointed Parallel between Two Generations of National Socialism

The heaviest blows we have dealt the Right wing have been our attacks upon its fundamental position: national socialism, the theory from which most of its current anti-Communist conceptions are drawn. It has not been difficult to point out that the banner under which the united forces of Stalin and Bucharin led the reactionary crusade against the Left Opposition ("Trotskyites")—the banner of socialism in one country—inevitably led to the splitting of this united bloc and the departure of its Right flank from the ranks of Communism. Giving Lovestone, Brandler, Jilek and Co. their due, we have pointed out also that it is they and not the Stalinists who are correct, insofar as it is a matter between the two of them, in the question of "exceptionalism". That is, Lovestone contends that if Stalin may erect an "exceptionalist" theory for Russia ("we will complete a socialist society by ourselves"), then Lovestone is permitted to erect an "exceptionalist" theory for America. From the point of view of the theory of socialism in one country Lovestone and not Stalin is correct; but from the point of view of elementary Marxism, of revolutionary internationalism, they are both wrong.

The Impotence of Centrism

The reason why the official Party (the Stalinists) arguments against Lovestone have always limped and halted is that they have been unable to show the workers who went with the Right wing what was fundamentally wrong with the latter: to do that would have meant the exposure of the anti-Marxist roots of Centrism itself! The Centrists have thus enabled the Right wingers to shift the whole content of this historical struggle on to the secondary and tertiary questions, where in many instances the Right wing adopts a position which, in appearance, is more correct than the fabulous idiocies of the Party chieftains. Only by re-establishing the basis of the dispute upon the questions of principle, and proceeding from these questions to those that flow from them, can the bankruptcy of the international Right wing be demonstrated. But such a fight leaves the Centrist helpless, for he is only a person who has not developed to the logical conclusions of the Right winger; his only weapon, therefore, is organizational manipulation and terror. The burden of the fight against the Right wing continues to rest upon the Left Opposition.

It is when the Right wing attempts to answer our unanswerable argumentation that it shows how well the Left wing has acquitted itself in this struggle. It flounders, it evades, it swindles, it is demagogic, and above all, in its profound hatred for the genuine Left it exposes its own petty bourgeois philistine character. As good an example as any is furnished by the Revolutionary Age and its latest article, "Whither Trotskyism?" by Will Herberg (No. 12). We will pass over the amusing fact that this same question was answered by the same Herberg only a few months ago when he "proved" that we had quite thoroughly "disintegrated" and that there should therefore be no reason to waste space in slaying a dead dog. We will rather take up the washed trivialities that pass for Marxism in the Right wing camp and properly identify them as a political tendency.

According to Herberg, "Eager sectarianism is the very essence of Trotskyism... Trotsky himself welcomes the sectarianism that is the essence of his system. 'To be a sectarian' today," he declares, "is an honor for every real revolutionary!" This would be a somewhat "damaging" quotation if not for three facts which are as well known to Herberg as they are to us.

1. The sentence is taken from its context, and refers not to a political party (the Communist Party), but to a faction within that Party.

2. The word sectarian is put within quotation marks, as a scornful comment upon the term by which we are designated by the Right wing groups which, as everyone surely knows, are mass organizations embracing millions of workers....

3. The sentence quoted by Herberg from Trotsky read in the original (see the Militant, October 1, 1929): "To be at present a 'sectarian' of revolutionary Marxism in the eyes of philistines, of snivellers, of shallow minds, is the greatest honor for a real revolutionary." One need not have gone through a college course in psychology to perceive why Herberg so diligently omitted quoting the whole sentence. He knows but too well, our friend Herberg, who is meant by Trotsky when he says "philistines, snivellers and shallow minds." Literary forgeries of this type are considered good form in the Right wing camp, where for years charlatany bluff and swindle were the principal weapons in the campaign against "Trotskyism". Naive people that we are, we still think these methods contemptible, no matter what "period" they are practiced in.

The Real Sectarrians

But since we are speaking of sectarianism, let us establish again who practices it: It is the Right wing in every country, for they have cut themselves off from the international revolutionary movement and turned their backs upon the Russian revolution. By these steps they have doomed themselves to the life of national sects. They are following in the footsteps, not of the Hillquits and Oneals of today who are open Right wing socialists, but of the Hillquits and Oneals of yesterday who still employed "revolutionary" phrases about Russia and internationalism, and even the dictatorship of the proletariat, in order to retain the Left wing workers in the Socialist Party.

Here are four documents: Herberg's article. A statement "On the Situation in the C. P. S. U. (Revolutionary Age, Number 11). From Marx to Lenin by Morris Hillquit (1921). A debate between James Oneal and Robert Minor (1921). Space unfortunately prevents us from making comparisons at length but sufficient parallels can be drawn between the Hillquits and Oneals of yesterday and the Lovestones of today to show how close is the ideological rapprochement. And, unlike Herberg, we will quote literally. Emphasis everywhere is our own, done to indicate significant similarities between the old and the...new.

"First I want to say that I am unreservedly in support of the revolutionary government established by the workers and peasants of Russia, and that I believe that those who call themselves Socialists and don't give that support, who in any way approve of the intervention on the part of the international imperialists, automatically takes himself out of the socialist classification, and no one has spoken more frequently than I have in behalf of the Russian workers and peasants to work out their own problems and to establish their own regime without interference on the part of anyone throughout the world... I want to say however that support of a social revolution in Russia, or in the Argentine, or in China or Japan, or anywhere else in the world, does not necessarily carry with it the support of a particular international organization, of which the Russian workers and Communists are merely only one section. I want to make that distinction clear." (Oneal).

"The Soviet workers do not want war. They want peace in order to be able to carry through the gigantic plans of Socialist construction... We American workers and the workers of the whole world, must close our ranks and stand by the U. S. S. R. and defend it against the blows of world imperialism!... But (Oneal's "but") precisely because of this gap the crisis is not manifested in the same form in the C. P. S. U. as in the capitalist countries: neither the political issues nor the fractional groupings are the same, in no sense is the international opposition (i. e., Right opposition) movement based upon the issues or groupings in the C. P. S. U. nor does it find its counterpart in any of these groupings." (Lovestone).

"Now, what is the character of the so-called Communist movement in the United States? It is solely and almost exclusively a movement that lives by reflection from Russia." (Oneal).

"An international tendency of Communism that makes its basis of concentration not the general living issues of international (and national) class struggle but issues—many of them outlived—of differences in the Soviet Party is condemned to ultimate sectarianism. This is just what Trotskyism does. The concentration of Trotskyist forces on a world scale takes place primarily on the issues of Soviet policy in which Trotsky differed sharply with the leadership of the C. P. S. U." (Herberg)

A Couple of Exceptionalists

"I don't believe that an international organization of the working class calling itself socialist, claiming to represent the best of Marxian thought, can direct the policies and methods of the workers in all countries of the world, regardless of the particular historical conditions that prevail in each and everyone of these countries. The development of human institutions and thought is by no means a uniform thing." (Oneal the exceptionalist!)

"Trotsky, like Stalin, proceeds along the line of mobilization of the international movement for the program of a fraction of the C. P. S. U.—this is his 'internationalism'! Trotsky, like Stalin, cares not a whit about the specific conditions in the various countries and brands as 'opportunism' the attempt to apply and adapt the general line to these conditions." (Herberg).

"All Socialists who fail to subscribe to every article of the neo-Communist creed are branded as 'traitors' and 'agents of the capitalist class' and parties desiring to affiliate with the Communist International are warned of the necessity of a 'complete and absolute rupture with reformism, and the policy of the 'centrists' and of advocating such a rupture 'among the widest circles of the Party membership.' (Hillquit).

"These question form a closed system of dogma without any regard to their actuality or to their present relation to the vital questions of the revolutionary movement... Trotsky, like Stalin, issues his Open Letters to serve as a basis for the separation of the sheep from the goats, the 'loyalists' from the 'renegades.'" (Herberg). "We are not phrase-mongers nor obedient rubber-stamps." (Lovestone).

A startling and significant similarity! Both sets of quotations exude the same overpowering odor of national fever and contempt of anything but the most harmless and least obligatory internationalism. Both of them wallow in their provincial independence. In 1921, Hillquit and Oneal were proud of the fact that they were not a tail of any "faction" of the Russian Socialists (Mensheviks or Bolsheviks); in actuality, as everyone knows, they were for the Mensheviks who represented the class interests of the counter-revolution. In 1930 Lovestone and Brandler are equally proud not to be the "tail" to any "faction" of the Russian "Communists"; in actuality, to the extent that the Russian revolution interests them, they share the political viewpoint of the Right wing (Bucharin) which represents the class interests of the Thermidorian counter-revolution.

More than 12 years after the Bolshevik uprising, Lovestone dares to express his official, formal viewpoint of Russia thus: "On the various questions at issue—question of tempo or methods—we cannot, as a group, express a definitive opinion because we have not the material upon which such an opinion can be based!" Under cover of "refusing to be a tail to a Russian 'faction'" and a pretended ignorance of what is going on in Russia (twelve years after the October!) Lovestone has turned his back on the Russian revolution.

Nationalism and Internationalism

Hillquit and Oneal tried to separate the estimate of the class forces in the Russian revolution from an estimate of the world revolutionary situation and from the tactics and strategy to be pursued by the socialist movement—not only internationally, but also nationally. Lovestone does

Ross Arrested in Minneapolis

MINNEAPOLIS—Joe Ross, member of the local branch of the Communist League and active in the Laundry Driver's union, was arrested here and fined for disorderly conduct by the court for the crime of distributing leaflets issued by the League on unemployment. The leaflets were being distributed in front of the City Auditorium at a huge unemployment meeting called by the local trade union leaders and attended by some 14,000 workers. The fact that they had no program of fight to offer the assembled workers, and that the League leaflet proposed such a program and urged its adoption at the meeting, did not suit the labor bureaucrats. One of them Robert Cramer, erstwhile "progressive", had the cops chase the workers who were distributing the circulars and arrest Ross. Nevertheless, more than 7,000 leaflets were handed out.

The Minneapolis League has called a May Day meeting for Wednesday, April 30, but we go to press too early for a report. The leaflet also urged the workers to join in the May Day demonstration at Bridge Square the next day.

Billings' Release «Postponed»

SACRAMENTO, Calif.—The same legal point that formed the Lowell committee's excuse for confirming the martyrdom of Sacco and Vanzetti may condemn Warren Billings to perpetual imprisonment. Chief Justice Waste of the California supreme court has announced that the investigation of Billings' appeal for pardon is being held up because the court is able only to study the court records of the case and has no power to subpoena witnesses who have knowledge of the frame-up.

"The petition for pardon," says Justice Waste, "is based largely on affidavits obtained since Billings' conviction and repudiating the testimony of a number of prosecution witnesses. There is no machinery provided for investigating angles of a case that happen subsequent to conviction." This is the same ground on which Mooney was refused a new trial when Trial Judge Griffin requested it. Waste also pointed out that the petition is simply before the individual members, who have no executive or judicial power. Even so, he believes it will be "some time" before any decision is reached.

Φ

HUNTINGDON, Pa.—"On the surface it might seem that the Soviet is within its rights in setting up an anti-religious government," says Bishop H. S. Longley, Episcopal, of Iowa, in a widely published syndicated statement. "But it is impossible," he continues, "to have in existence a government of this sort without its effect being felt in Christian nations throughout the world. I certainly believe that a diplomatic protest should be made by the nations of the world even though it lead to bloody conflict."

..... the same thing, and that is where the analogy fits.

The Left Opposition is "a tail" to a "Russian faction"; it is an advocate of the revolutionary principles which formed the foundation of the Russian revolution and are now embodied in the Russian Bolshevik Opposition. Lovestone separates the "Russian question" and the theory of "socialism in one country" from the estimate of the world situation and the course the American Marxists must follow in the United States. For us, all these questions are inextricably combined. Trotsky proceeds from an estimate of international economy and politics to an estimate of the national (Russian, let us say) situation. Stalin does precisely the opposite. We outline our course in the United States on the basis of its place in the world revolutionary movement. Lovestone starts the other way around. We remain revolutionary internationalists. The Right wing is slipping back to a sort of Left wing Hillquitism of the 1921 style. —MARSH

:-: UNDER THE LASH OF UNEMPLOYMENT :-:

The Crime of Being Jobless

DETROIT—There is one less jobless worker in line at the Ford Rouge plant now. A well-fed brute in the uniform of a policeman killed him as he stood in line among 12,000 others in vain search for a job. Not a word of it has been whispered in the press. What's one worker more or less?

Eyewitnesses described the slaying as follows: "Armed cops were walking up and down the line," they said. Where they couldn't find trouble they tried to start it. They displayed their guns and clubs arrogantly and abused the jobless without provocation.

Clubbed to Death

"It so happened that this one fellow was slightly out of line, although he had been there since 5 the night before. He was tired, hungry, and cold. The cop got nasty with him and tried to pull him out of line. The worker refused to get out of line. He said he'd been there for many nights and he wasn't going to get out just because a cop told him to. The policeman raised his club and brought it down with smashing force behind the man's ear. The man fell like a log. He didn't make a move. The cop looked surprised and called for a wagon. They carted the dead man on and drove off while cops began busting up the line."

Workers are returning from the Rouge battered and bruised with stories rivalling those from the company towns of Pennsylvania. Men have been making fire with waste paper to keep themselves warm, for example. The cops have been assiduously and brutally breaking up even these small gatherings of men. Workers congregated inside the fence around the employment office have been driven out daily by hundreds of sleek cops armed with guns and clubs. Even workers who have stood for 12 hours or more are being shown no mercy now. "Smash the unemployed" is the order of the day.

LABOR CAMP JOBS 1-10TH OF FORMER YEARS

NEW YORK—The shipment of men to labor camps this spring is 1-10th of what was in former years, the Salvation Army reports. The supply of odd jobs is almost nil in and around New York.

1,000 men waited two hours in the line for free Army tickets good for 5 cent ten cent meals in Bowery restaurants. For the first time we have allowed men to sleep in chairs or on the floor in our waiting room," says Lieut. Col. W. Winfield. "450 have slept this way on the average. Hundreds are walking the streets."

NEW YORK—

An inkling of how devastating the extent of unemployment has become in proletarian sections of New York City was given me the other day by the enumerator sent to chalk me up for the Wall Street census. This nose-checker revealed, under questioning that in the single 17th Street block between Avenue "A" and First Avenue, a typical East Side tenement street, the wage-earners of 150 families out of the 230 canvassed are jobless. If what the mincing capitalist rags call "idleness" obtains on the same appalling scale throughout the East Side, and the chances are that it does, then more than 55 percent of the workers in this slum area are now gorging themselves on Hoover "prosperity".

It is a foregone conclusion that the capitalist government will take mighty good care to hide its findings on the unemployment situation, though the number of radio-owners abroad in the land will undoubtedly be made public the day the count is completed, as one more irrefutable proof to the world-at-large of the American "peepuls" luxurious standard of living. But perfume the crisis as they may, the shkel-swine cannot pollyanna an empty stomach a damn's worth; the jobless army exists, no matter how often the prostitute press whoops it down in print. Furthermore, it is a gathering torrent thundering more and more ominously about the dikes of moneybags as the need of relief becomes daily more urgent.

It is the job of the Communist vanguard to direct this torrent of discontent overcome its diffusion and turn it, with the employed masses which likewise are being whipped up by the winds of crisis, into one powerful stream. But the apostolic Stalin leadership, secure from reality in its high ivory dome, sweeping the scene through the trick binoculars of the "third period", sees this gathering torrent already as a raging flood washing out the very foundations of American capitalism. And the tragic part of it is that the self-deluded Centrists are formulating tactics accordingly, tactics calculated, not to harness the power of the jobless and employed masses, but to render it more diffuse. The chief slogan raised on May Day for instance, was the "mass political strike", with its connotations of a swiftly approaching revolutionary situation. At a time which calls for a united front of all Left wing forces to guide and lead the fight for work or compensation, unemployment insurance, the 7-hour day and the five day week, etc., the C.P.U.S.A. persists bull-headedly in its narrow sectarian policies, going so far as to unseat delegates from opposition Communist groups at its "united front" unemployment conferences.

The last unemployment conferences in New York, truly "national" in scope, was an afterclap to March 6 such as would have awakened a dead and buried Marxist to the true state of affairs as regards the Party's "leadership" of the jobless. The American Stalinists, however, wandering boozily in the gases generated by the Daily Worker, stick to their ivory tower and chart another "victory". Where were the 110,000 unemployed New York workers whom the Party claimed to have rallied to its leadership when this conference opened? Among the handful of "unemployed" present, called to prepare for the "huge" July 4 meeting in Chicago, it required the most diligent kind of sleuthing to discover one face which had not been a landmark in Union Square for years.

A kind of wry humor was afforded us by the spectacle of the demon-theoretician of the "third period" Earl Browder, coming out in the Daily Worker (4-19-30), against ultra-Leftism and roundly scolding an over-zealous rank and file who had brought forward the slogan of "capture the city hall" at a Party conference, possibly the same unemployment meet. Well, and why not "capture the city hall"? Is this not the "third period"? And if this period is so close to the revolutionary situation that it is permissible for Browder and Company to call for a "mass political strike" on May Day, and to organize Workers Defense Corps for battle against Whalen's cossacks, and if the foundations of Wall Street are already giving way, what is so politically damnable in the over-zealous comrades slogan? Who shall say that what is sauce for Browder is not also sauce for the rank and file, misguided by Browder? And by the way, Browder belaboring ultra-Leftist adventurism somehow or other recalls the equally delectable show given by Lovestone when he was furiously lambasting the "right danger" between venomous attacks on the "Trotskyists".

No, unless the workers themselves drag Browder and his ilk down to earth and force the Party to adopt a coldly realistic policy, which can only be determined with a correct political line, the jobless army will remain helplessly unorganized and will spend its force to no purpose, the bureaucrats stupidly allowing its potentialities to trickle away into futility, to the irreparable damage of the labor movement in this country.

He Starved Amid Plenty

PITTSBURGH—There is a halt in traffic along one of Pittsburgh's main streets. The curious collect, a morgue ambulance arrives, and a policeman hauls from a miserable hole in a concrete wall one of the late unemployed.

Unmistakable signs show he was jobless. His clothing was obviously of the donated kind. He was shoeless. His hair was white—perhaps he died for the crime of passing the age deadline. His frame, once powerful was shrunken.

The Crime of Joblessness

Since he made his home on a busy street, they can't call him a "recluse" as they do other jobless who find quiet places to die, far from the busy profit-making that will have none of them.

Three steel workers were classed as "recluses". Past the deadline, they subsisted in a riverbank shanty, living on what they could comb from the water. One of them died, and the other two coughed the poorhouse.

Another feature story was "Ramblers' Row" a collection of pieced together shanties along a railroad track. The human interest included a picture of Stanislaw, the bearded patriarch of the colony of misery. Stanislaw, 60, was frozen to death the morning Andy Mellon reached his 75th birthday. Spring has come and "Ramblers' Row" is breaking up.

Pittsburgh's one breadline has closed its doors. The Pittsburgh Federation of Social Agencies branded it "unnecessary, unwise and demoralizing to the community".

"We are feeding every day an average of 2,000 men," said the line's directors. "We know they are hungry. One man has fainted from lack of food. Since the soup kitchen has been operating, panhandling on downtown streets has diminished. We absolutely know from careful statistics that 7 out of 10 are honest, hardworking men. There are in the neighborhood of 3,000 unemployed homeless men in the city."

MASTER PLUMBER'S OFFENSIVE

PLAINFIELD, N. J.—Master plumbers of this city have incorporated themselves as "Master Plumbers, Assn., Inc." Their purpose is for the "protection of trade and social purposes". What it really means is the boss plumbers will soon come out for the open shop. Several shops have started and installed scabs on jobs. May 1 is the time set for the journeymen plumbers to ask for an increase of $1.20 per day. It is expected that the battle for open or closed shop will start then.

Whalen's Anti-Red Forgeries

Peshawur and the Gandhi Arrest

The almost impenetrable veil of official British censorship continues to make it difficult to get a clear and well-rounded picture of the situation in India. That the British are being hard pressed, however, can easily be seen even though the highly colored official reports that are allowed to filter through. They have finally been compelled to arrest Gandhi. They are taking fear-stricken measures to confiscate all arms and ammunition in the hands of the Indian people. They have been forced—openly, at last—to admit the dispatch of substantial military forces of infantry and cavalry, accompanied by airplane fleets, to the most turbulent sections of the country.

MacDonald: Servant of Capital

All these actions, let it not be forgotten for a moment, are being taken by the British government that has been advertised everywhere by the liberals and socialists as the "most progressive and enlightened" in the world, the "Labor" government of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. Where is the democratic Laborite freedom of the press which is announced as so superior to the methods of the Communists? Sunk without a trace by the censors! Where is the "democratic" opposition to imperialism? It exists only in the mealy, pious speeches of MacDonald, agent par excellence of the British moneybags, jailor and executioner of the Indian masses!

India is today an armed camp, but armed only on one side. For that, the Indian masses have Mr. Gandhi to thank. It is under his treacherous direction, his insistence upon pacifism and non-resistance, that the Indian people are today defenseless before the imperialist troops armed to the teeth and ready to repeat an Amritsar massacre on an All-Indian scale—without fear of successful resistance. Rarely has the British lion been served so well by Gandhi. He has hog-tied the Indian masses, and trapped them in the paralyzing jaws of non-resistance.

But the arrest of Gandhi shows that he has accomplished—against his every desire and will—something else, too. Just as the Kerenskys involuntarily aroused a genuine revolutionary movement by their timid opposition to the czar; just as the Chiang Kai-Sheks unwillingly let loose a mass movement in China, so the sensational march to the sea of Gandhi has roused millions of the people to a militant mood which is already overflowing the reactionary boundary lines he originally staked out for it.

The Meaning of Peshawur

The sharp struggles in Peshawur, which required the dispatch of large numbers of British troops, made a mockery of Gandhi's treasonable policies and indicated the correct way to remove the British yoke.

The "passive" mutiny in Peshawur of the native Garhwal Indian Rifles is the prologue to active resistance and militant offensive. A real fight against British imperialism, in the interests of the Indian masses and not of the Indian bourgeoisie, can only be led in spite of Gandhi and in direct battle against him and his.

The absence of a conscious, organized revolutionary movement—a crime of omission for which the Stalinized course of the Communist International must still answer—hampers the development of the struggle. But it can yet be created in the fires of conflict. Peshawur shows the possibilities.

N. Y. JOBS SCARCEST SINCE 1914

NEW YORK—Factory employment in New York state, Gov. Roosevelt announces, is at the lowest point since 1914. It has dropped steadily since last October, he said, and will probably drop further, as it usually does in May. The Annalist, financial weekly, states that national employment is the lowest since 1922.

Judge Denies Bail to Foster, Minor, Amter

Bail for the leaders of the March 6 unemployment demonstration, including William Z. Foster, I. Amter, Robert Minor, and Harry Raymond, has been refused by supreme court justice Gavegan in New York. The four Communists have begun serving the three year term to which they were sentenced under star chamber proceedings and without the possibility of introducing evidence or defense witnesses.

The crassly class character of the prosecution was more than demonstrated during the trial, and the judges gave the defendants the vicious an almost unprecedented sentence of three years.

It is evident that the convictions were aimed primarily to curb the movement of the unemployed workers among whom the Communists are the most active elements. All the more reason why every effort must be made to compel the most rapid release of the four prisoners. Thus far their defense has been organized by the Party on the narrowest possible basis with the result that the fine opportunities for developing a broad movement for the four have not even been approached.

The New York convictions are but ominous forerunners of persecutions against militant fighters of the working class throughout the country. They cannot therefore be understood merely as an isolated instance of capitalist violence against the Communists. Nor can the bosses and their police, court and gangland agents be

Mr. Cossack Whalen is now well on the downward road to the other "great" American Red baiters who presided him: A. Mitchell Palmer and ex-mayor Ole Hanson of Seattle. Not to be outdone by either of them, or by their international colleagues who concocted the anti-Soviet forgeries in Berlin and the "Zinoviev letter" in England a few years ago, this cheap Tammany Hall politician has gained another bit of brief publicity for himself by publishing as crude a set of forgeries as have yet come of the press. It seems that Whalen is intent upon proving that there is a Communist movement in the United States and that it has connections with the revolutionary movement in the Soviet Union!

Nevertheless, the appearance of the forgeries at this particular moment is far from accidental. The stage setting for them has been in preparation for some time. The development of a sharp unemployment situation in the United States, with the accompanying disillusionment of millions of workers on the score of American capitalism's fabled "permanent prosperity", has opened up previously non-existing prospects for the growth of the American Communist movement.

Whalen's forgeries are calculated to nip this growth in the bud, to whip up sufficient anti-Red hysteria to cut it down effectively combated by the Communists alone, much less by the official Communist Party only. The arrests and persecutions all over the country in connection with the unemployed demonstrations, the May Day meetings as well as at other working class gatherings make imperative a genuine mobilization of all progressive, Left wing and Communist forces ready to unite on a program of resistance to the terror and persecutions of the employing class and for the freedom of all class war prisoners, for the establishment of full civil rights for workers and working class organizations, etc.

It is necessary to change this course immediately, and take advantage of the general sentiment against the convictions that exists and can be aroused among broad sections of the working class. A united defense for the prisoners is the best reply to the harpies of class justice.

Φ

NEW YORK—Trial of 46 Brooklyn shoe workers for violating an injunction taken out by the Diana Shoe Co. against the Independent Shoe Workers Union has been postponed to June 3. The company broke its contract with the workers when Charles G. Wood, red baiter, of the federal labor conciliation service, notified it that the union was led by Communists. The injunction sustained the company's refusal to continue a contract with a Communist-led group.

before it assumes really dangerous proportions for the class he represents. He is not alone. The rapidity with which Congress has snapped at the opportunity to organize a public demonstration in preparation for a national anti-Communist lynching campaign is indicative of the general spirit of the masters. All of them are quite well aware of the fact that outside of the Communist movement, despite all the enormous and persistent blunders of the official Party, there is no force working actively and energetically to mobilize the permanent army of unemployed to fight for their lives, literally for their lives.

Every worker must therefore be vigilantly on guard for the next step of capitalist reaction. The scheme to crush the Communist movement, to jail its fighters, to deport and harass the foreign-born workers in particular, is aimed not only at the Communists, but at the whole working class in which the Reds so justly hated by the bosses, constitute the most militant section. Every blow the capitalist class and its Congress strike at the Communists hits with redoubled force at the interests of the whole working class.

There is yet another reason for the Whalen forgeries. They follow hard on the heels of the bomb plot against the Soviet embassy in Poland, the anti-Soviet military maneuvers of the Rumanian and Polish marionettes of French imperialism, and the hypocritical religious crusade against the Soviets which stank so noticeably of good Stock Exchange gold. All these events were timed with the sharpening of the economic and political difficulties in the Soviet Union rising out of the industrialization and collectivization campaign. All these incidents are calculated to exert a violent pressure upon the Soviet power, and the Party which exercises it, that will make it veer to the Right.

The Pressure on the Soviet Union

Knowing Stalin for what he really represents, the reactionary forces throughout the world are keenly aware of the fact that precisely at the present moment a well-concentrated pressure can strengthen the toe-hold of capitalist elements in Russia by compelling a shift to the Right. But the class relations in the Soviet Union are so taut right now, that a sharp turn to the Right, already implicit in all of Stalin's recent acts and words, would have the gravest effects not only upon the working class republic but upon the proletarian movement throughout the world.

The anti-Soviet drive in the United States, even though based upon the school-boy documents that many capitalist papers refuse to take seriously, is a timely reminder of a danger. A blow at Soviet Russia is a blow at the Communist movement. In turn, and because of that, it is an even heavier blow at the whole working class. The common danger and the common injury demand a common front. All workers: on guard!

Wall St. Speaks

Hoover's Bunk

"The second quarter of the year," comments the Annalist, financial weekly of the New York Times on Hoover's recent "optimistic" statement about the turn for the better, "opening with business activity approximately at the depression level of last December, offers no reasonable prospect of other than an uneven and low progress out of the valley of the current business cycle. The normal relations of production and consumption have been disorganized. Productive facilities, and all commodities including bank credit as used, are present in excess. The new stabilization that needs to be worked out is threatened by existing cheap money policy and rising speculation."

Cynical Over "Predictions"

The Annalist sees a "broad valley of depression out of which business is not likely to emerge in much less than six months or so." Hitting directly at the Hoover prosperity pronouncements the Wall St. weekly says: "Another point to be noted is the indubitable fact of a reaction among business men against the cheerful business propaganda initiated at Washington. The ironical fashion in which business events have repudiated successive 'bally-hoo' official statements from Washington has had its logical effect on the business mind—it has produced a conviction not only that the government does not know the facts, but that the facts are probably rather worse than has been generally supposed even outside of Washington."

The Annalist index of business activity even below the lowest previous mark of for March, its latest figure, shows business December. Freight car loadings, electric power production, cotton and wool consumption and soft coal and zinc production were all below the December figure.

LITTLE PIECE OF FORGOTTEN HISTORY

The Daily Worker of May 7, 1930 writes, greeting the "new" Weekly Young Worker organ of the Young Communist League, as follows: "In the United States the youth movement has long lagged behind. There has not been a weekly youth paper before in this country." The author of those lines must have joined the Party a few weeks ago. Had he been in it very much longer, he might have remembered that more than four years ago the Young Workers League launched the Weekly Young Worker and maintained it for a long period of time, successfully, too. It was only when the immediate predecessors of the present misfits in the League "took over the power" that they wrecked it—a job they have conducted with great success to the present day!

After May Day's Demonstrations

Even the briefest review of the May Day demonstrations this year must begin with a clearing of the air so that the facts become visible. That means—unfortunately nowadays—to discount from the very beginning all the figures given in the official Communist Party press. The definite information we have already received about a dozen of the most important cities shows what recent experience with the Party press has taught us to expect: in every instance, the figures given in the Daily Worker on the participants were distorted anywhere from twice to ten times the number that were actually on the scene. This sort of reporting has the worst possible consequences because it gives a misleading picture of the response of the working class, of the strength of the Party, and thereby perpetuates the basis for adventurism, and, in general, for policies all out of proportions to real conditions.

Achievements of Meetings

But when the outrageous falsifications of figures are wiped out, and the consideration is taken of the fact that for the first time in many years this May Day was almost everywhere organized as an open demonstration, frequently in the face of police terror or opposition (instead of, as formerly, in meeting halls), the participation was indicative of the increasingly radical mood of the working class. It may even be said that relative to the strength of the Communist Party, the demonstrations in the United States were superior to those in many, if not most of the European countries where, preliminary reports would indicate, the May Day demonstrations of the Communists were not at all up to the mark set in the past. Most certainly, they lacked the militancy that has characterized such meetings on previous occasions.

The demonstrations in the United States showed, at one and the same time, the weakness of the Party and its great possibilities. In New York, for instance, most obvious particularly as indicative of the organizational decline of the Party, was the falling off of its influence in the trade unions. The shoe workers, who formed one of the most impressive contingents in last year's demonstration, were represented by the barest handful this year. The food workers were to be remarked only by their fewness. In other trades and industries, an even worse picture was presented. And as a whole, the demonstration made evident the enormous gap that exists between the organizational strength of the Party and the possibilities for its growth and power, an ever-increasing gap which the destructive Party policy makes it extremely difficult to bridge. One need go no further than the needle trades representation in the parade: In spite of the radical decline in organizational influence of the Party and Left wing in this industry, needle trades workers formed the largest group, many of them coming from Right wing shops. That the Party has lost in organizational influence over them is largely traceable to the incoherent policy of blunders it has pursued for the last period of time.

As for the much-touted "mass political strike," it simply did not materialize. Not all the bluster of the Party press can conceal this damning fact. That the slogan was wrong and inappropriate for this period, that its use could result only in discrediting the slogan itself, was already clear when it was first promulgated. On May Day, the dispute was tested in life. The Daily Worker was unable to mention the name of a single factory or shop of any real importance throughout the United States which responded to the "mass political strike" slogan. As in so many other instances, the Party leaders are going through the regular process of self-exposure as irresponsible phrase-mongers.

Opposition Active

In all the demonstrations, the members of the Communist League (Opposition) participated actively in groups. The Party bureaucrats, as is known, followed a criminal course of ejecting our delegates from every "united front" May Day conference they controlled, issuing, at the same time, condemnations of the rank and file for "not organizing the united front conferences on a broad basis"! Needless to point out that this did not halt us in any instance from participating side by side with the revolutionary militants. As on May Day, we will continue to march with them, helping the workers in the Party to unload the crushing burden of stupid and criminal policies and an even worse leadership. The needs and possibilities of the movement, shown starkly on May Day, make this unburdening imperative.

ON THE NEEDLE TRADES

The next issue of the Militant will print an extended comment on the amazing statement "Building the Needle Trades Workers Union" which appeared in the Daily Worker on May 7, 1930.

Bluff, Brother, Bluff! Someone Will Believe It

The Crusader News Agency is a press service directed and controlled by the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party, under the immediate responsibility of Cyril Briggs. It is intended primarily for Negro newspapers in the country, and is one of the methods by which the Party brings its viewpoint to the Negro workers. In its press release for the week of May 5, 1930, it prints the following astounding report of the New York May Day parade and meeting:

"In this city (New York) over 300,000 workers, Negro and white, answered the call of the Communist Party of the U.S.A. to 'strike and demonstrate'."

And further: "Over 70,000 joined in a gigantic, colorful parade from Rutgers Square through some of the worst slum districts to Union Square where the biggest meeting of the day was held."

The Daily Worker is the official organ of the Communist Party. That it exaggerated the facts in its reports of the May Day demonstrations goes without saying: it's in the blood. But it never dared go so far as its colleague, the Crusader News Agency. Its issue of May 2, 1930, says:

"A hundred and fifty thousands New York workers (not 300,000!) turned out yesterday, striking and demonstrating on May Day."

And speaking of the parade: "The procession began shortly before 1:30. And, what a procession? A close (close, Briggs!) checkup indicated 25,000 in line (not 70,000 Briggs!)."

But what is a little matter like an additional—even if non-existent—150,000 strikers to the Party bluffers? Or a matter like an additional 45,000 marchers who never marched? In the third period, the Party leadership calculate, the best way to win the masses to Communism, and (evidently) the Negro workers especially, is to bluff and bluff and bluff. Surely someone will believe it!

IN THE AMALGAMATED

Hillman and the Left Wing

This is the second of a series of articles on the situation in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the record of the Hillman Right wing administration, a criticism of the policies of the Left wing and the present tasks of the latter. The first of this series appeared in the last issue of the Militant, and the next one appearing next week will deal with the present regime in the union to which intellectuals of every stripe have sung such passionate songs of limitless praise. The series is of vital importance to all militants in every industry, and particularly to workers in the needle trades. By a regrettable error, the pen name of the author of this series, "A. Schneider" was omitted from last week's article.

After the 1921 lockout Hillman left for Russia for his vacation. During his absence from New York a serious situation developed in the New York organization.

"Harry Cohen, once manager of the Children's Clothing Joint Board, left the organization in 1920 and engaged in selling sewing material to the clothing employers. The union which was unattractive when private profits seemed in sight became attractive when the profits failed to materialize.

Capitalist Corruption in the Union

"In September 1921, H. Cohen announced his candidacy for office of manager of the Children's Clothing Departemnt of the New York Joint Board. H. Cohen was promptly informed by the General Office that his name would not be placed before the members to be voted on unless he cleared himself on certain charges. These charges involved checks which H. Cohen had received from employers of our members. But H. Cohen failed to appear before an investigation committee and opened fire upon the organization.

.... "At the same time H. Cohen withdrew certain locals from the Joint Board and proclaimed himself boss of a separate union. After a few months fight H. Cohen was forced to appear before an investigation committee and explain his acts. The committee's unanimous verdict was, the act of any union official in borrowing money from manufacturers with whom the union has relations is, in the opinion of the committee, unethical and to be condemned. A man whose act of accepting financial favors at the hands of the employers of our members is unanimously condemned by an investigation committee, cannot hold any office in the A. C. W. A. The General Office took the position that in the labor movement purity must be even above unity. A labor organization that is unable to keep its hands clean does not deserve to live." (See the Advance editorial of Feb. 3, 1922, and the report of the investigation committee in the same issue pages 4-9 signed Morris Rothenberg, B.C. Vladeck, Charles W. Ervin. For other references see editorials, Advance of Dec. 19, 1921 and Jan. 13, 1922.)

During this fight the Forward and all those discredited leaders who were forced out of the union supported H. Cohen in his fight against the Amalgamated. They knew that if H. Cohen won they would be able to come back to the organization. But the investigation committee decided against H. Cohen and he withdrew temporarily.

The investigation committee also recommended to the Chicago convention a change in constitution in 1922 which states specifically in Article 13, Section 7 that people who have had dealings with employers are not eligible for office before the lapse of five years after their return to the trade. Did Hillman or Schlossberg live up to this clause in the constitution? No! Hillman, just as most chiefs, violated the constitution and still holds office, and H. Cohen, right after the Chicago convention was taken back into the union.

An interesting occurrence at the Chicago convention was Hillman's report of the Russian-American Industrial Corporation to help build clothing factories in Russia. The delegates unanimously approved his report with the exception of A. Beckerman who spoke against it. The "Left wing" so rejoiced over the approval of this report that they forgot to fight against standards of production and other "reforms". Hillman's going to Russia and the Russian-American Industrial Corporation was a maneuver to bind the Lefts in order to introduce standards of production and reductions of wages. Hillman succeeded in fooling the Left wing.

At the same time an unemployment situation developed in New York during 1921-22. Some of the old leaders who had left the union during 1919 and 1920—some of whom were forced out by the rank and file—utilized this situation for their own purposes while the Lefts were busy caucusing in the General Office with Rapchik, the lickspittle, and Salutsky-Hardman. Of course they organized with the aid of the Forward, and they threatened to split the New York organization and go back to the U. G. W. Hillman was faced with two possibilities: either to accept the challenge and make a fight against the clique with the aid of the progressives (or the Lefts) or to make peace with the Forward and take back the corrupt gang. Hillman chose to make peace with the Forward and its clique. He took back, in a quiet way, D. Wolff, Alex Cohen and Harry Cohen.

Not only did the Lefts not resist this treachery of Hillman, but local 5 under their leadership supported D. Wolff as manager of the N. Y. Joint Board! Hillman promised the Lefts that D. Wolff would carry through the Left policies in the union, and the Lefts took it for granted. Furthermore, the Lefts in local 5 called a meeting in Cooper Union and D. Wolff outlined the Left policies he would carry through in the union! It did not take long for the Left wing to find out that Wolff and Hillman had put them in a trap and double-crossed them. This shows how the Lefts allowed themselves to be used as a tool by Hillman and his gang. The Lefts made a grave mistake by giving Hillman time to make peace with the fakers and the Forward clique whom the Left knew would do everything in their power to oust it from the organization. Will this be a lesson for the Left wing in the Amalgamated?

At the same time conditions in the industry became deplorable along with Hillman's policy of more production (which he called "efficiency" and reductions in wages (which he called "adjustments") to say nothing of reduction in working forces where workers were thrown out of the factories with the aid of the union.

Something had to be done to put a stop to this unbearable situation. So the local unions under the control of the progressives and the Lefts demanded certain reforms in the N. Y. organization: 1. A minimum wage scale. 2. An aggressive and constructive policy against "standards of production", reduction in wages, and reduction in working forces each season. 3. Economy for the Joint Board, which meant reducing the staff. 4. Amalgamation of the two Joint Boards (Children's and Men's clothing) and local unions. These demands were never carried into effect until the Amalgamated officials were kicked into action by the fight the Left wing made.

When Hillman saw the Lefts were determined to put up a fight for the reforms (or demands) and were gaining strength, he convinced himself at the Philadelphia convention in 1924 that the Right and Left wings were equal in numbers. Hillman and his General Executive Board made a gesture of "peace". Hillman declared that he belonged to neither group and what he wanted was "unity", which, in reality, meant the beginning of a bitter fight between the two factions. Hillman who didn't like to have a "Right or a Left" machine but always a Hillman machine, had to eliminate one of the groups in order to intrench himself. So after the Philadelphia "peace" convention Hillman with his Right wing Forward clique declared war against the progressives (or Lefts).

Furthermore, Hillman took in A. Beckerman, a person whom he always disliked, and made him manager of the New York Joint Board without an election. Hillman appointed Beckerman as manager because he knew Beckerman would do the "dirty work" against the Lefts. Who does not remember Beckerman with his gang which broke up meetings, black-jacked members, deprived workers of their jobs, or threw them out of their shops? Beckerman succeeded in crushing the Left wing and kept in submission the discontented workers. Not only were individual members expelled and ruthlessly blacklisted, but local unions, such as Local 5 of N. Y. and the Pressers local of Rochester, under trusted organizers like Harry Cohen and with the help of the underworld, were suspended and reorganized. Hillman, a shrewd politician, killed individual activity in order that his group should be kept in power.

Why were the Lefts defeated in the Amalgamated in a time when they controlled the largest local unions in N. Y. and half of the membership supported them throughout the country? This power was evident at the Philadelphia convention when the Right and Left wings had equal strength. As I pointed out: 1. The Left gave Hillman time to make peace with the H. Cohen and the Forward clique. 2. When the fight began they had the machinery in their own hands and it was easy for them to oust and expel the Left wing. 3. The Left did not develop leadership able to cope with the situation. 4. There was no unity among the Lefts; they fought among themselves instead of fighting the Hillman and Beckerman machine. 5. They devoted much time to eliminating each other as leaders. In other words there wasn't one who could dominate or hold the group together. On the other hand the Hillman clique had the whole machinery in their control. They had the bosses, the police, the gangsters, the cash, and above all they were united to crush the progressives, or the Lefts. They have succeeded temporarily.

The question is: Have the Lefts learned the lesson from their past mistakes? This can not be answered off hand. For one thing the isolation policy the Communist Party officials have lately adopted will not bring any results.

What Must Be Done

In order to change the present intolerable conditions of the Amalgamated members something must be done. Conferences should be held in every clothing center. The Left wing should unite with progressive workers, and put responsible leadership in every city to carry through the work. An educational campaign should be waged throughout the country to bring before every local union in the U.S. and Canada the following demands: 1. All expelled members to be taken back to the organization with full membership rights. 2. No discriminations against political affiliations. 3. Elections should be held in every city and the members should decide who should represent them. 4. A 40-hour week should be established all over the country with week work. 5. To do away with piece work and "standards of production". 6. A minimum wage scale for all operations. 7. Unemployment insurance to be paid by the bosses and controlled by the workers. New York must take the lead in this fight because the loss of New York was decisive in the defeat of the Lefts throughout the country.

I know the Amalgamated bureaucrats will not accept these demands. What is important, however, is that with the help of the progressive workers, and with a constant agitation, the masses will rally behind the Left wing. When the next battle between the Left wing and the Hillman machine occurs, the Lefts and the progressives, united and not isolated, will come out victorious.

Stalinist Splitting

Bordiga Expelled

Il Lavoratore, organ of the Italian fraction of the Party, has just announced the decision of the Italian Communist Party Executive to expel comrade Amadeo Bordiga, on the charges of leading the Left Opposition and supporting "Trotskyism". The expulsion of the most capable leader of Communism in Italy is one of the most irresponsible and severe blows yet struck at the Party by its own leadership.

Comrade Bordiga is the founder of the Italian Communist movement. When about nine-tenths of the present leadership of the Italian Party were still either in the camp of the social democracy or hesitating about the formation of a Communist Party and a break with the yellow leaders of the Socialist party and the Federation of Labor, Bordiga was leading the struggle to found the Party from which he has now been expelled. He was the principle spokesman of the Left wing at the famous Livorno Congress of the Socialist Party in 1921, and was the acknowledged leader of the Communist Party after the Congress split.

In 1923, Zinoviev manipulated the executive of the Italian Party in order to remove the Bordiga group from leadership, even though a subsequent vote showed ninety percent of the Party to support the Left, and practically the entire Youth Federation. The coup d'Etat of the Centrists and Right wingers in the Party was finally achieved at the Lyons Congress in 1926, where the most outrageous gerrymandering and mis-counting of votes enabled them to cinch their control. Not only was the vote of Bordiga's own local Party group officially recorded against him at the Congress, but even the vote of Bordiga himself!

In November of the same year, comrade Bordiga was imprisoned by the fascist regime for being a Communist and exiled to the island of Ustica, between Sicily and Naples in the Mediterranean Sea. Only on the occasion of the recent "amnesty" were he and a number of other comrades released—only to be kept under the most rigid surveillance by the fascist police.

Not daring to expel Bordiga as a "counter-revolutionary" while he was in fascist exile, the opportunist leaders of the Party, fearful of the great influence comrade Bordiga would exert in the ranks of the Party took the desperate measure of expulsion. It is unnecessary to add that this will do anything but prevent the progress of the Left Opposition in the Italian Party.

That the expulsion will not pass by without serious repercussions in the ranks of the Italian Communists in all parts of the world, goes without saying. The first reports we have already received in New York indicate a strong resentment in the ranks of the Italian Party members against the expulsion. We are confident that many of these comrades, as well as revolutionary workers outside of the Party, will make their voices heard in protest against this criminal act of the Italian Stalinists.

SAN FRANCISCO—Oscar Lilgeholm, 75, ran out of money and was too old to get a job. He dug himself a rough cave in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, and had lived there for two weeks before starvation drove him out. Two boys found him half unconscious and begging for water.

A Visit to the Island of Prinkipo

Prinkipo is the old Greek name for the Isle of Princes, about two hours by boat from Constantinople. It was given this name because princes of the ancient realm who incurred the displeasure of the ruling autocrat were dispatched to the tiny island in the Ser of Marmora as exiles and prisoners. The nationalistic Turks, having overthrown the yoke of Greek domination, proceeded to remove all relics of that hated regime even to the extent of changing the old Greek names: Constantinople has become Stambul, and the Isle of Princes has become Buyuk-Ada, or Grand Island.

The name of the island has been changed but it remains a place of exile. There is no longer a single prince imprisoned on it. But for that the island is now reserved for a different kind of exile, for the Bolshevik who has incurred the displeasure of the ruling regime in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. By gentlemanly arrangement between Stalin and Kemal Pasha, Buyuk-Ada has become the fourth place of exile for Leon Trotsky, his wife and son.

Trotsky's Health

We did not visit comrade Trotsky as a newspaper correspondent, seeking sensations and so we have no journalistic sensations to report. As it is, there are plenty of reporters and writers who knock on the door every other day to ask: "May I see M. Trotsky about his views on religion?" or "What does M. Trotsky think of modern art?" or "Will M. Trotsky write a reply for us to Floyd Gibbons' 'Red Napoleon'?" or "Can we get a statement from the report that M. Trotsky is on his death bed?" or any number of similar questions. Yet, out of all these personal questions, so to say, the one about his health recurs most frequently; there have been so many conflicting reports on this point that it will be worth while to state matters accurately.

Comrade Trotsky is not on his death bed, that goes without saying. He is usually quite vigorous and works with customary diligence. Unfortunately, the accumulation of certain maladies, made more acute by his exile in Alma-Ata and the absence of proper medical attention, makes him subject from time to time to malarial attacks and headaches of some severity, gout, and most alarming of all, to trouble with his heart. What is needed is treatment by a specialist as well as a climate and environment for a cure. Thus far, every effort has been made to prevent him from obtaining the necessary attention. It has been a concerted effort of Stalin and Kemal Pasha on the one hand, and all the bourgeois countries of Europe "democracies" and dictatorships, on the other. The much-advertized right of asylum is obviously extended to the Bessodovskys but not to Bolsheviks.

During our brief stay, we talked at some length about the situation in Russia and about the movement in the United States. Trotsky had just finished writing his articles on the new course in Soviet economy and the prospects for the Five Year plan. Just about the same time, the news began to arrive from Russia reporting the latest turn begun by Stalin towards the moderation of the Plan. The question arose: How is it that Stalin, and even Bucharin of late, after having conducted a furious campaign for years against the Opposition by accusing it of being "super-industrialist", finally adopted and began to carry out a plan for industrialization and collectivization which, at least on the face of it, was far more radical than any previously proposed by the Opposition? Comrade Trotsky explained it in this way:

Stalin and the Five Year Plan

The requirements of the economic situation that developed in the country after the presentation of the Platform and Counter theses of the Opposition, and the latter's subsequent expulsion from the Party, soon demanded the formulation of a much more radical and far-reaching program than had originally been conceived. The Centrist faction of Stalin, which had first adopted the timid and worthless plan of Rykov, rejected it under the pressure of the situation and proceeded with a Five Year plan of considerably greater breadth. The startling successes of the first year—startling to the Centrists who never really believed such a rapid tempo possible—not only demonstrated the enormous latent possibilities for industrial development under a proletarian dictatorship (nationalization of industry, banks, etc., etc.), but immediately produced an extreme boldness born precisely out of Centrism's previous timidity. Almost overnight, the initial successes of the Plan gave rise to the wildest kind of exaggerations. The Kulak was going to be liquidated as a class. The Five Year Plan was to be realized in four years—or three and a half, or three as some said. Agrarian collectivization was now definitely accomplished in half of Russia. The N. E. P. was to be abolished. Socialism was being completed in isolated Russia. These were only a few—and among the mildest—exaggerations contained in the Soviet press, and repeated in the official Communist press abroad. The achievements of the first year were utilized to "prove" that the entire Opposition platform was bankrupt, the previous accusations of "super-industrialism" were converted into "Trotskyist pessimism", and on these foundations, a number of capitulations were realized out of the ranks of the Left.

But the very first signs of difficulties transformed the cocksure braggarts of Centrism back again into timid, cautious bureaucrats. The rapid pace of collectivization and industrialization ran its head into the brick wall of a proletarian state isolated in a sea of capitalist world economy, proving not in abstract theory but in cold practice, the absolutely untenable position of Stalin's and Eucharin's theory of national socialism. A crisis began to develop in agriculture, exactly along the lines indicated by the Opposition. Stalin forthwith sounded the retreat. So long as uninterrupted progress had been made, Stalin sedulously cultivated what he now, when obstacles were encountered, sought to unburden responsibility for: "Dizziness of success".

That a retreat was necessary was already evident. It was already proposed by comrade Trotsky to ward off an impending crisis in the country, the danger of which is by no means averted yet. At the same time he raised a warning against the retreat going too far. It now becomes increasingly clear that Stalin who is on the road leading away from the recent ultra-Left zig-zag in Russia will not come to a halt until he has reached the other extreme and accepted the original program of the Right wing. That is now the great danger in the Russian situation.

It is equally clear that Stalin will not be able to gain the support of the whole Party for this new bureaucratic turn about face. In the zig-zag to the Left, mass forces were of necessity unleashed which it will not be easily possible to put in chains again. The proletarian core of the Party will resist the sharp turn to the Right which has already begun. That is why comrade Trotsky spoke with the greatest confidence of the re-formation of a strong Left Opposition inside the Communist Party.

It is in connection with the big journalistic bluff and exaggerations about the Five Year Plan and the capitulation of many Oppositionists who pleaded the "successes of socialist construction" as their pretext for leaving the Opposition, that a humorous but pointed conversation took place. A copy of the New York Nation had arrived one morning, containing an article, "Russia's New Revolution", written by Louis Fischer, one of the innumerable liberal journalists commuting between New York and Moscow and earning a livelihood by writing publicity for the Stalin faction.

We showed Trotsky a passage in the article which read: "Stalin's ultra-radical, revolutionary policy has won the hearts of the Trotskyists, and they have come rushing back from Siberian, Caucasian and Volgan exile to participate in the pressing business of reconstruction. They have come back humbly, with clipped wings, acknowledging Stalin's talents and Trotsky's mistakes..."

Stalin, my ex-Trotskyist friends tell me, had done more than they wanted of him, and more even than they expected of Trotsky."

"You see," we said jokingly while Trotsky was scanning the paragraph, "everybody is saying that Stalin has gone much further than you ever proposed."

"That's true," he replied immediately. "When a man has a boil on his neck, a capable surgeon will simply lance the boil. A shoemaker will go much further and sever the man's head from his shoulders. Yes, there is no doubt that Stalin has also gone 'much further' than I proposed!"

—And the capitulators? Would they play any considerable hole in the resurgence of the Opposition within the Party? Comrade Trotsky does not believe they will.

"The revolution is a great devourer of people," he said. "It has burned out these men, used them up, exhausted them. They cannot even play an important part in the Centrist faction. It must not be forgotten that these men are not newcomers in the movement. On the contrary. Many of them have gone through two, three revolutions. They spent a large part of their lives in czarist prisons and exiles. They were the militants who organized and led the Bolshevik revolution in 1917 and for years afterwards. They passed through the rigorous years of the civil war and intervention, then through the period of reaction after the death of Lenin, and finally through prison or exile under Stalin. They have lived through the intensest years of history. Very few have come out of them unscathed to one degree or another. The others have been burned out or the revolutionary fires in them quenched."

The "Old Bolsheviks"

Of course this phenomenon is chiefly noticeable and widespread in the ranks of the ruling apparatus. Trotsky mentioned one name after another of comrades in the most prominent Party and Soviet positions, all of them imbued with the profoundest hatred for the "permanent revolution". That formula runs against the grain of every self-contented bureaucrat who has squeezed his bottom firmly into a chair after the consolidation of the revolution's initial victories. All of them have sought to put themselves beyond criticism by the religious title of "Old Bolsheviks" or the "Old Guard". Yet the overwhelming majority of the members of the present Central Committee of the Russian Party are men who, inside or outside of Lenin's Party before the revolution, never went beyond the conception of revolutionary democrats or Mensheviks. Trotsky recounted an incident which adequately characterizes the "Old Bolshevikism" of nine-tenths of the present Party spokesmen.

It was during a meeting of the Party Central Control Commission, where Trotsky was being "tried" and his "non-Bolshevik past" brought out against him. During his speech, he quoted from an issue of the Social Democrat, a journal edited and published in Yakutsk jointly by the Mensheviks and a number of now prominent "Old Bolsheviks": Ordjonikidze, Petrovsky (of the Ukraine), and the peerless Yaroslavsky. This paper was issued not in 1905, nor in 1912 or 1914, but in 1917, after the Kerensky revolution and on the eve of the October uprising!

He read from some of the articles written by these "old Guardsmen", all of which were penetrated by the most vulgar kind of bourgeois democratic notions conceivable. The Kerensky revolution—if only it would introduce a few reforms—was hailed as the great people's democratic government. When Trotsky mentioned the trio of "Bolsheviks" who wrote these articles, there was a sensation even in the Control Commission. Yaroslavsky tried to bluster and bluff it out, but the blunter Ordjonikidze simply replied: "Well, what of that? We wrote lots of stupid things in those days."

"Yes," said Trotsky, "but I would let my arms and legs be cut off and my head taken from my shoulders if in all of my writings you could find anything half so bad as this!" A little while later, the copy of the paper from which Trotsky had quoted, which he had found after considerable effort, was stolen from his room. The Yaroslavskies, so meticulous about the literary records, real and forged, of comrade Trotsky, had no intention of letting their own shameful records lie around where Oppositionists could make use of them. Fortunately, the protocol of the Control Commission still records the damning excerpts—unless that too has been put into the furnace reserved for everything embarrassing to the Stalinist regime! It is precisely such types that are now doing the job of corrupting a whole generation of revolutionists with their shoddy substitute for Leninism.

A considerable part of our conversation was devoted to the situation in the United States and the perspectives for the movement here. He asked about very detail of our work, our numerical strength, the circulation of the Militant, our work in the trade unions, the influence of the Party, the strength of the Lovestone faction, etc., etc. The establishment of the weekly Militant, which he follows closely, he considers the greatest achievement of the American Opposition. When we spoke of the difficulties of the paper, to which every labor and revolutionary journal is subject, he even wrote to the American comrades urging that the greatest efforts be exerted to maintain and strengthen the weekly.

On the "Farmer-Labor Party"

Trotsky does not know the American situation as well as he does, let us say, the Russian, or even the French, but he is very far from being unacquainted with it. Of the American Party leaders, he is "best" acquainted with Pepper. He told of how Pepper came to him during the days of the great "farmer-labor party boom" in the United States, and tried to convince him that the revolution in this country would come about by winning over the revolutionary farmers, allying the Communist Party with the petty bourgeoisie and neutralizing the working class! The question of a farmer-labor party (i. e., a party of two classes) had come up then for the first time in the Political Bureau of the Party in Moscow. Everybody spoke hesitantly or tentatively about it. Stalin even said: "I am sure that if Vladimir Ilyich were present he would be for it." Trotsky intervened immediately and spoke sharply and at length against the whole idea. Kamenev who has a flair for the Left in a theoretical discussion, picked up the thread right away and as a result of the subsequent decision, the American Party was, in part at least, dragged by the hair out of the opportunist swamp into which Pepper had led it.

Trotsky outlined—we repeat them here briefly—his ideas of the perspectives for developments in this country. "In my work on the Russian revolution of 1905," he said, "I remarked on the fact that Marx had written that capitalism passes from feudalism to the guild system to the factory. In Russia, however, we never knew the guild system, with the possible exception of the 'kustari'. Or one might compare the development of the working class in England and Germany with that in Russia. In the first two countries, the proletariat has gone through a long period of parliamentary experience. In Russia, on the other hand, there was very little of a parliamentary system for the workers. That is, the Russian proletariat learned its parliamentary history from an abridged handbook."

"In many respects, the history of the development of the United States is akin to that of the Russian working class. It is nowhere written, and theoretically it cannot be substantiated, that the American workers will perform have to pass through the school of reformism for a long period of time. They live and develop in another period, their coming to maturity is taking place under different circumstances than that of the English working class, for instance. That is, the stage of a labor party or a powerful socialist party is by no means inevitable. The rapidity of the development of the American workers, of course, also depends to a large extent upon the degree of preparedness of the Communist movement and its clarity. The socialist party in the United States need by no means

Internationalism and the Theory of «Exceptionalism»

By L. D. TROTSKY

PREFACE TO THE AMERICAN EDITION OF "THE PERMANENT REVOLUTION"

consequently by the technical resources of industry itself.

Industrialization and Socialism

Industrialization is the moving factor of the whole newest culture and, by that itself, the single plausible basis of socialism. In the conditions of the Soviet Union industrialization means first of all the strengthening of the base of the proletariat as a ruling class. Simultaneously it creates the material-technical pre-condition for the collectivization of agriculture. The tempos of both these processes are interdependent. The proletariat is interested in the highest tempo for both processes, in so far as the new society that is being created can thus guard itself best from external danger, and at the same time create a source for the systematic raising of the material level of the toiling masses.

However, the tempos that can be accomplished are limited by the general material and cultural level of the country, by the mutual relationship between the city and village and in the pressing needs of the masses, who can sacrifice their today for the sake of tomorrow, only within certain limits. The optimum, that is the best, most advantageous tempos are those that give swift development to industry not only for the given moment, but secure the necessary stability of the social order of the dictatorship, that is, first of all the strengthening of the unity of the workers and peasants, preparing by that itself the possibility of further successes.

From this point of view the general historical criterion from the angle of which the party and government leadership directs the economic development in a planned order is of decisive significance. Here two basic variations are possible: a. the course described above of economic strengthening of the proletarian dictatorship in a single country until further victories of the international proletarian revolution (the viewpoint of the Left Opposition); b. the course of constructing an isolated national socialist society, and that "in the shortest historical time" (the present official viewpoint).

These are two absolutely different, and in the final analysis, contrary theoretical conceptions of socialism. From them flow a different strategy and different tactics.

In the limits of this preface we cannot consider anew the question of building socialism in one country. Other of our works are devoted to this particularly "The Criticism of the Draft Program of the Comintern." Here we limit ourselves to the most basic elements of the question. Let us recall, first of all, that the theory of socialism in one country was first formulated by Stalin in the Fall of 1924, in complete contradiction not only to the whole tradition of Marxism and the school of Lenin, but even to what Stalin wrote in the Spring of that same year, 1924. From the standpoint of principle the abandonment of Marxism by the Stalinist "school" in the question of socialist construction is no less significant than, for example, the break of the German Social Democracy with Marxism in the question of war and patriotism, in the Fall of 1914, that is exactly ten years before the Stalinist turn. This comparison has no accidental character. Stalin's "mistake," as well as the "mistake" of the German Social-Democracy is national-socialism.

Marxism and World Economy

Marxism follows from world economy, not as a sum of national parts, but as a mighty independent reality, which is created by the international division of labor and by the world market, dominating powerfully in the present epoch over national markets. The productive forces of capitalist society have long ago outgrown national limits. The imperialist war was one of the expressions of this fact. In the productive-technical respect socialist society must represent a higher stage compared to capitalism. To aim at the construction of a nationally-enclosed socialist society would mean, in spite of all temporary successes, to pull the productive forces backward even as compared to capitalism. To attempt, independent of geographic, cultural and historical conditions of the country's development, making up a part of the world's whole, to realize a self-sufficient proportionality of all the branches of economy in a national frame, means to pursue a reactionary utopia. If the heralds and supporters of this theory nevertheless participate in the international revolutionary struggle (with what success—is a different question), it is because as hopeless eclectics, they mechanically combine abstract internationalism with reactionary-utopian-socialism. The most finished expression of this eclecticism is the program of the Comintern adopted at the Sixth Congress.

To expose completely one of the main theoretical mistakes, lying at the base of the national-socialist conception, we can do nothing better than to quote the recently published speech of Stalin, devoted to the internal questions of American Communism. "It would be wrong," says Stalin against one of the American factions, "not to take into consideration the specific peculiarities of American capitalism. The Communist Party must consider them in its work. But it would be still more wrong to base the activity of the Communist Party on these specific features, for the foundation of activity of every Communist Party, the American included, on which it must base itself, are the common features of capitalism, the same basically for all countries, and not the specific features in the given country. It is not on this that the internationalism of the Communist Parties exists. The specific features are merely supplementary to the general features." (Bolshevik, Number 1, 1930, page 8, emphasis ours.)

These lines leave nothing to be desired in the way of clarity. Under the guise of giving an economic foundation to internationalism, Stalin gives in reality the foundation of national-socialism. It is false that the specific features are "merely supplementary to the general features" like a wart on a face. In reality the national peculiarities are an original unity of the basic features of the world process. This originality may have a decisive significance for the revolutionary strategy for years. It is sufficient to recall the fact that the proletariat of a backward country has come to power many years before the proletariat of the advanced countries. This one historic lesson shows that in spite of Stalin, it is absolutely wrong to base the activity of the Communist Parties on some "common features", that is on the abstract type of national capitalism. It is false to the roots that it is on this "that the internationalism of the Communist Parties exists." In reality it exists on the inconsistency of a national state, which has long outlived itself, and acts as a brake on the development of the productive forces. National capitalism not only cannot be reconstructed, but cannot even be conceived of as anything but a part of world economy.

The economic peculiarities of different countries is not of a secondary character: it is enough to compare England and India, the United States and Brazil. But the specific features of national economy, no matter how big, enter, and that in an increasing measure with their component parts into the higher reality, which is called world economy, and on which, in the final analysis, the internationalism of the Communist Parties is founded.

The Law of Uneven Development

Stalin's characterization of the national peculiarities, as a simple "supplement" to the common type, is in crying and by no means accidental contradiction to Stalin's understanding (that is, his lack of understanding) of the law of the uneven development of capitalism. This law, as is known, is declared by Stalin as basic, most important and universal. With the help of the law of uneven development, turned by him into an abstraction, Stalin attempts to solve all the riddles of existence. But it is shocking: he does not notice that national originality is the most common and, so to say, summed-up product of the uneven historic development. It is only necessary to understand this unevenness correctly, to take it in its full measure, extending it also to the pre-capitalist past. A faster or slower development of productive forces; an extended or, on the contrary, a contracted character of whole historic epochs; for example, of the middle ages, the guild system, enlightened absolutism, parliamentarism; the uneven development of the different branches of economy, different classes, different social institutions, different sides of culture—all these lie at the basis of national "peculiarities". Originality of a national-social type is the crystallization of the unevenness of its formation. The October revolution arose, as one of the grandest manifestations of the unevenness of the historic process. The theory of the permanent revolution, which gave the prognosis of the October overturn, supported itself, by that alone, on the law of uneven historic development, not in its abstract form, but in its material crystallization, in the form of the social and political originality of Russia.

Stalin introduced the law of uneven development not in order opportunely to foresee the seizure of power by the proletariat of a backward country, but in order, after the fact, in 1924 to hang on to the victorious proletariat the task of constructing a national socialist society. But it is precisely here that the law of uneven development has nothing to do with the matter, for it does not substitute and does not remove the laws of world economy; on the contrary, it is subordinated to them.

Fetishizing the law of uneven development, Stalin declares it sufficient as a basis for national-socialism, not as a type that is common to all countries, but exceptional, Messianic, purely Russian. To construct an independent socialist society is possible, according to Stalin, only in Russia. By this alone he puts the national peculiarities of Russia not only above the "common features" of all the capitalist nations, but also above world economy as a whole. Here is where the fatal gap opens in the whole of Stalin's conception. The originality of the U. S. S. R. is so mighty that it makes possible the construction of its own socialism within its limits, independent of what may happen with the rest of humanity. As for other countries to which the Messianic seal has not been affixed, their originality is only "supplementary" to the common features, only a wart on the face. "It would be wrong," Stalin teaches, "to base the activities of the Communist Parties on these specific features." This moral holds good for the American Communist Party, the British South African and Serbian, but...not for the Russian, whose activity is based not on the "common features", but precisely on the "peculiarities". From here flows the dual strategy of the Comintern throughout: while the U. S. S. R. "liquidates the classes" and constructs national socialism, the proletariat of all the other countries, completely independent of actual national conditions, is obligated to simultaneous action according to the calendar (First of August, March Sixth, etc.). Messianic nationalism is supplemented by bureaucratically-abstract internationalism. This duality runs through the whole program of the Comintern, depriving it of any kind of principled significance.

If we take England and India as two different poles of capitalist types, we must state that the internationalism of the British and Hindu proletariat does not at all rest on the sameness of conditions, tasks and methods, but on their unbreakable mutual dependence. The successes of the liberation movement in India require a revolutionary movement in England, and the other way around. Neither in India, nor in England is it possible to construct an independent socialist society. Both of them will have to enter as parts into a higher whole. In this and only in this is the uncrushable foundation of Marxian internationalism.

As this book goes to press in the English language, the whole thinking part of the international working class and in a sense—the whole of "civilized" humanity, listens with particularly keen interest to the resoundings of the economic turn taking place on the major part of the former czarist empire. The greatest attention in this connection is aroused by the problem of collectivizing the peasant holdings. And no wonder: in this sphere the break with the past assumes a particularly absorbing character. But a correct evaluation of collectivization is unthinkable without a general conception of the socialist revolution. And here again, but already on a higher stage, we convince ourselves that in the sphere of Marxian theory there is nothing unrelated to practical activity. The most remote, and it would seem, "abstract" disagreements, if they are thought out to the end, will sooner or later always appear in practice, and this latter will not forgive a single theoretical mistake.

The collectivization of peasant holdings is, it is understood, a necessary and essential part of the socialist transformation of society. The volume and tempo of collectivization, however, is not only determined by the government's will but, in the final analysis by the economic factors: by the height of the country's economic level, the correlation between industry and agriculture and and will by no means ever reach the position of the British Labor Party or the German social democracy

"It is not at all permanently established that the United States will be last in the order of revolutionary primacy, condemned to reach its proletarian revolution only after the countries of Europe and Asia. A situation, a combination of forces is possible in which the order is changed and the tempo of development in the United States enormously accelerated. But for that it is necessary to prepare".

It is the task of the Left Opposition to aid in this preparation, to set the revolutionary movement in the United States upon the path indicated by the guide we already have in Marxist thought, enriched and verified by the experiences of modern history.

On the train leaving Paris, after the conclusion of the international conference of the Opposition we unexpectedly came face to face with an American comrade still a member of the Party, who was returning to the States. We spoke of the trip to Turkey and he told us confidentially of a conversation he had had a little while ago with Eisenstein, the well-known Russian movie director who was then in Paris. Eisenstein had directed the film "Ten Days That Shook the World", a record of the October uprising in Russia. As is quite natural, Lenin and Trotsky—that is, actors taking their parts—featured prominently in most of the scenes. When the film was shown in the United States, many comrades will recall that while Lenin was to be seen, there was not a sign of Trotsky throughout the picture. To all the intents and purposes of that picture, Trotsky might have been in South Africa when the Russian revolution took place. What had happened between the time of the original production and its public showings? Eisenstein told my friend the story:

He was called in to the office of the Soykino (the Russian film trust) and the chairman said to him: "Eisenstein, art is art, but politics is politics. And you'll have to cut Trotsky out of the picture!" That is how "Ten Days That Shook the World" was saved from the menace of Trotskyism.

That is another task of the Opposition, a task which is part and parcel of the work of preparing the revolutionary Marxists not only in the United States but everywhere else: To re-tell the true history of the Russian revolution, to excavate the truth from under the garbage of filthy lies with which the apparatus men have covered it for without an accurate knowledge of the past and what it has to teach us, there will never be an adequate preparation for our future.—M. Character and Limits of Our Faction

Lessons from Recent International Experiences of the Opposition

By James P. Cannon

The American movement is condemned by its position, geographically, and politically to lag behind events in the International. This has been demonstrated with an almost arithmetical precision during the entire decade of the existence of the Comintern. The developments in the Russian and West European Parties have always been registered in our own—a few years later. This was the case regarding the crisis in the Russian Party and the Comintern. We were one of the latest detachments of the International Communist Opposition to take definite shape in the open just as the Lovestone group is a somewhat belated reinforcement in the rear of the International right wing. Neither of these American factions, however found its International connection by accident. We were "prepared by the past" for our place under the banner of the International Left Opposition. Lovestone and Co. served their apprenticeship and became journeyman opportunists, qualified for union with Brandtner, in the American Party struggles.

The protracted period of our gestation as a faction on the line of the Bolshevik-Leninists has not been without compensating advantages. The rich experiences of the International struggle were realized for us, as it were in advance, and we have been able to build on their foundations. This insured for us a clearer perspective and tactical line.

On the one hand our deductions from International experience enabled us to avoid a false attitude toward the Party and an over-ambitious program for the creation of a new one; on the other hand they were a shield against the capitulation panic. This sickness, which periodically attacked the Opposition movements in the other countries, was never a problem for us. Three or four weak and inconsequential people at the most, who found themselves in our ranks by mistake, denounced themselves as renegades as soon as they found that membership in the Opposition meant a hard fight.

That was all. One strives with difficulty to recall their names—so little influence did they exert on our cause.

Internationalism our Touchstone

This careful attentiveness to International development which has served us in such good stead all along, should mark our deliberations now as we prepare to raise our struggle to a higher ground. In contradistinction to the opportunists, Internationalism is the touchstone of our faction. But this does not assure for us the automatic assimilation of International experience. Continuous study of our problems in their international aspect is necessary now as before if we are to draw the correct inferences. Recent experiences in the International movement, particularly in Germany and France, should be the occasion for study and discussion in our ranks. And from this must follow a firmer consolidation of our ideological position and a strengthening of our tactical line in the struggle for the proletarian sections of the Party and Left wing.

In the light of recent events in the camp of the International Left three questions present themselves with especial insistence. They are: 1. The character and limits of our faction; 2. Our attitude toward the Party and the Party bureaucrats; 3. Our attitude toward the Right wing. Developments in the American Party since our National Conference also serve to push these questions into the foreground.

We proceed from the point of view that the crisis in the Comintern arises from the reaction against the October revolution and the weakening of the position of the revolutionary movement on an International scale. This crisis has split the Comintern into three factions, and the character of these factions becomes clearer every day. The issues were obscured for a long time. The exceptional position of the official Centrists, their monopoly of the apparatus and of unlimited material resources, gave them unprecedented opportunities for suppression, falsification and corruption. These methods were utilized to the limit. "Six years were necessary," says Trotsky, "in order to bring the weightiest questions and differences out of the bureaucratic underworld into the world arena." But political logic is stronger than bureaucratic machinations. It has forced the ideas, and the struggle over them, into the open.

This struggle for us is a struggle for the October revolution and for the principles embodied in it and in the first four Congresses of the Communist International. It is a principle fight for the foundations of Leninism. The International Left wing alone defends these positions. That is the reason, and the only reason, we were expelled by the bloc of the Right wing and the Centrists. It is obvious that such a fight can be ended only with victory.

The question then arises: how can this fight be waged successfully?

The answer is: in the first place, by a clear and definite principle line on all questions; in the second place, by the firm organization of a faction on the basis of principle; and, in the third place, by an intransigent struggle for these principles under all circumstances and through all fluctuations in the movement. Lenin taught these lessons positively—through the long struggle and final victory of the Bolsheviks by these methods; the German Leninbund has taught them negatively—through its disintegration and degeneration by the rejection of them.

The Left wing is not a Party but a faction fighting to win the Party. The Leninbund stumbled on this question. Mistaking the corrupted bureaucrats for the proletarian masses in the Party ranks it set out toward the formation of a new party. In order to bet numbers quickly it assembled heterogeneous elements. Instead of defining and sharpening its principle line it blunted it. The Leninbund admitted people who had all kinds of "grievances" against the Party but had no common basis in principle. It maintained relations with anti-Marxists and speculated on a bloc with

« The Case of Roy Stephens »

The assault upon the former Boston organizer of the Party and present adherent of the Lovestone faction, Roy Stephens, by a Central Committee directed slugging squad, adds another black page to the list of Fascist attacks by which the Stalinist regime in the movement threatens to discredit Communism for years in the eyes of the whole working class. The beating up of Party political opponents, organized on slaughtres upon public meetings, burglarizing private homes and robbing documents, are essentially fascist methods, and there is little if anything to distinguish them when they are used by black-shirts or Stalinists.

Tactics Copied from Fascism

Indeed, it is from the gruesome chapters of fascism that all of these methods have been copied by the Stalinist usurpers and introduced as an alien body into our movement. The whole Communist movement fought these methods when the desperate yellow socialists and A. F. of L. fakers applied them in the trade unions in order to stem the tide of progressive and Left wing influence. The same tactics deserve not one ounce more of approval when they are applied by the Stalinist bureaucracy against any of the political groups in the movement, be they of the Left wing or the Right wing. These methods bring only the most negative results. They are a contemptible abuse of what little "power" the Party bureaucrats have at their command.

We condemned these methods when they were first used against our group. We do not forget for an instant that the first faction to use them was the Lovestone faction itself. It was that group which first burglarized a private residence which temporarily housed our office, and stole our files and documents (which they have yet to return). It was that group which sent armed tough guys to beat up our comrades when they attempted to sell the Militant at meetings or in front of Party buildings. It was that group—all these deeds, of course, in active collaboration with the Foster faction—which first established the "theory" that our meetings are to be disrupted in the same sense that monarchist meetings are to be attacked!

We condemned those methods when applied against us. We condemn them now when there are still instances of them. We condemn them equally when the Party bureaucrats use them against the Lovestone faction or any of its supporters.

We are not very much interested in Stephens personally. We know him only as an irresponsible person, a man with little or no principles in the movement, a careerist whose services are very easily purchased in a factional struggle. We know further that Stephens himself, while district organizer of the Party in Kansas City, tried to terrorize the Party members against "fraternizing with the Trotskyist counter-revolutionaries". We know that Stephens himself, while district organizer of the Party in Boston, organized, just a little while ago, a thugs' assault upon a Lovestoneite meeting there where Ben Gitlow, his newly-found leader, was the principal speaker.

Nor are we very much convinced by the virtuous protests of the Lovestone leaders, and their moral indignation. We have yet to see their paper condemn the deportation of comrade Trotsky. We have yet to see them condemn the imprisonment and exile of thousands of Oppositionists in the Soviet Union. We have yet to see them condemn the atrocious murder of comrade Jacob Blumkin, and the recent assassination of two more Oppositionists by Stalin, beside which the attack upon Stephens looks like an insignificant incident. These are questions to which Lovestone must still reply.

Away with Fascist Tactics!

But Lovestone's past and present attitude neither justify nor diminish the enormity of the Stalinists' crimes. Their continuation will rob the whole movement of its great moral and political power to fight the same crimes when they are practised against the Left wing by the reformists and reactionaries. They will alienate the workers of our movement and make it hateful for them. They are a manifestation of political and theoretical impotence. They pervert the whole conception of the historically progressive value of violence in the class struggle, degrading it into the reactionary weapon of a fear-stricken clique. These fascist methods must be exposed and condemned. They must be burned out of the movement, and those who advocate and practise it eliminated with them.

the Right wing against the Party. The result: a false attitude on fundamental questions, the steady decline of a promising proletarian movement, a miserable degeneration culminating in a split.

The lesson for us in this event is the organization of our faction on principle lines only. Our strength as a faction, is our platform. Numbers will follow from that, not precede it. The Right wing attacks this insistence on close principle unity as "sectarianism". That is because their aims are different than ours. Opportunism has always made allowance for all kinds of divergent tendencies—except the proletarian revolutionary tendency. Lovestone freed by his expulsion from obligations to Communist tradition, is appealing for recruits on this basis. Anyone can join the Right wing and still "have the right to think and freedom to 'express' themselves" one way or the opposite. This is the Right wing "inducement" to prospective members.

We can have nothing in common with these conceptions. We stand for Party democracy because a living party can determine its united will only through democratic forms. But the democracy we advocate is a centralized democracy, that is to say, a form for a Party of action, not a mere discussion club for the exchange of ideas. A Party of action, thus governed, must have definite organization limits. These limitations have a double application for a faction.

The Limits of a Faction

Lenin prescribed strict limits of principle for membership in the Party, and still narrower limits for a faction. The sneers of the "Revolutionary Age" against the "sectarianism" of Trotsky's advice to the members of the Leninbund is characteristic of opportunists. Lenin, in justifying the expulsion of the Otszovists (boycottists) from the Bolshevik faction, elucidated the question as follows:

"As a faction, i. e., as a union of those who think alike in the Party, we cannot work without unity on fundamental questions. To break away from a faction is not the same as breaking away from the Party. Those who have left our faction are by no means deprived of the possibility of working in the Party." (Liquidating the Liquidators.)

The wisdom of this point of view is confirmed by all revolutionary experience. In order for a Party to lead the proletariat to victory it must have a clearly defined program and organization limits. A revolutionary faction must draw still closer lines. Otherwise it will not be able to act unitedly and influence the Party. It will be lost in the current of events instead of helping to shape them. We will not measure up to our historic mission if we forget the lessons.

As a group of Communists convinced of our platform and confident of our future, we have no need to boast of accomplishments, or to exaggerate our present influence. We know that the political line will decide and that the numerical ratio at the moment means little in the final analysis. But it is already clear that the Opposition, in spite of the heaviest obstacles, is going forward. In less than a year after our expulsion we succeeded in uniting our forces in a National Conference and adopting a platform. In less than a year since our Conference a new layer of Oppositionists is assembling in the Party. Our unrelenting fight on principle lines is shaping this development. The progress in the next period and our whole future depend on our continued adherence to this intransigent line of struggle.

Our platform is the platform of Leninism. The principled character of our faction and its definite organizational limits are the Leninist methods of organization. The slogan of intransigence in principle questions is the slogan for Bolshevik struggle and victory. The late experiences in the camp of the International Left wing, if properly assimilated, can only strengthen and reinforce our positions on this ground.

From this the question of our future attitude toward the Party and Party bureaucrats, and to the Right wing is easy to decide. These are subjects for subsequent articles.

Unemployment in Minneapolis

MINNEAPOLIS—

Twelve thousand people jammed the Minneapolis Municipal Auditorium and five thousand more were turned away from the monster unemployment protest meeting called April 23rd by the Organization and Education Committee of the Central Labor Union.

Unemployment Severe

This turnout proves positively the deep-growing inroads unemployment has made into the lives of Minneapolis workers and demonstrates how they will respond to a crisis in industry. The railroads are putting into effect a 15% reduction in payroll. The building trades see no great pickup in spring building. Layoff, speedup, and wage-cuts are the order of the day. Only the Ford plant seems to be running full blast with 3,300 men, but they also are planning a short season. All conditions were excellent for a packed meeting. The Auditorium was donated by the City Council. Floyd B. Olson, the Farmer-Labor Candidate for governor was the big drawing card. Walter Frank, R. D. Cramer and other labor officials scheduled to speak, Eddie Dunstader, the theatre organist, and the Kiddie Review, to amuse the crowd.

The stage was set. Amplifiers broadcasted the speeches to every corner of the building. Thousands roamed the corridors trying to sneak in against the Fire Marshall's orders. Yet with all these favorable circumstances the meeting lacked spirit. The speakers quibbled and hedged with the main problems...the chain store boom was stressed...buy union label card goods and solve unemployment...vote for Floyd B. Olson for governor...Labor's friend, Walter Frank's attempt at a real analysis was weak and lacked any concrete proposals for the solution of unemployment, which the workers could profit from.

It is not surprising that over one half the audience dribbled out before the main speaker got the floor. The reason was obvious: No program was laid down to combat and abolish unemployment. Workers know and no spellbinders can convince them otherwise, that the union label hocus-pocus is no solution for unemployment or any other big problem of the labor movement. Frank's vague reference to an "industrial and political democracy" which he somehow picked up in his brief stay in the Communist movement is a cheap "socialist" fig-leaf concealing his seat on the Olson band-wagon.

Cramer Has Ross Pinched

And behind the scenes what do we find? We find a connivance with the police to prevent a real message getting to the workers. The only piece of literature on unemployment distributed at that meeting was put out by the Communist League. R. E. Cramer, editor of the Labor Review, who apparently has influence at police headquarters ordered the literature banned. The cops led us a merry chase and finally arrested Joe Ross who is a member of Cramer's own local, and well known for his activity in the Brooks Parlor Furniture strike. Cramer claims that these leaflets were likely to disrupt the meeting. This proves Cramer's lack of faith and hypocritical disbelief in his own program—or lack of it. Eight thousand of the leaflets were distributed.

It should be noted that the Communist Party in line with its latest tactics "boycotted" this mass meeting of workers as "social-fascist" and went off to talk to itself on Bridge Square about the Communist duty to go to the masses.

The success and fine spirit of the May Day meeting held by the Communist League proved the correctness of our program of working among the masses of workers.

The May Day parade, what it lacked in numbers, made up in spirit and the "Trotskyites" contributed most of the spirit. We introduced the singing of revolutionary songs on the line of march.

The terms "counter-revolutionary" and "renegade" which so sneeringly rolls off

The "value" of colonization from the point of view of the economic development of colonized countries has already been stressed. The lovers of hasty conclusions will exclaim: "But then we cannot understand why you fight colonization?" It is to forestall this objection, as simple as it is stupid, that we have added: "Born of the brutal fact of conquest and not of the normal process of evolution, the industrial revolution brought about by colonization is thoroughly artificial."

It is now a question of drawing the most important consequences from this observation.

It is obvious that without this political conquest by the European, American and Japanese imperialisms, the present colonies would, as a result of a vital necessity of economic evolution, have entered the path of rational production, of machinism, anyway.

On the other hand, colonial experience gives us an example of a country whose rhythm of development is manifestly retarded by this political domination itself: India. There, the "presence of the alien" has enabled Gandhi to build up and spread his ultra-reactionary theory of non-violence and non-cooperation based on a sentimental reaction against the machine, the devil of the Occident, a reaction which unfortunately keeps the Indian masses, for quite a time too long, alas!, closer to political mysticism than to even a superficial examination of the concrete conditions of the anti-imperialist struggle.

Forty years of military penetration to establish a political domination, which represents a considerable loss of energies which could have made marvels (bourgeois, of course) in the economic and scientific domain and which were wasted in the guerrilla fighting, the conspiracies and struggles of interest between the ruling dynasty and foreign imperialism. And then, when about 1900, the French bourgeoisie began its economic penetration into Indo-China, it was the era of organized waste, for example, works of a million which cost ten times as much in the budget, the friends of the governors pocketing the surplus.

Moreover, the native agrarian bourgeoisie, in conflict with the French industrialists from the very beginning—the latter having at its disposal a powerful military and political force, and still having the memories of the recent civil wars, removed its opponent from the industrial and commercial field.

This struggle for the strengthening of the political power of imperialism, for the "legalization" of an illegal act, the conquest, contributed largely to retard the development of the new economy which the French bourgeoisie wanted as a monopoly, especially at the beginning of its industrial life where the narrowness of its economic field and the little emphasized character of the division of labor did not economically cement the two bourgeoisies.

This is how the difference between French Indo-China, colonized country and Siam, once vassal of Indo-China, can be established from the economic point of view. The latter, on an area of 630,000 square kilometers, that is, 170,00 sq. km. less than Indo-China, and with a third of its population, has a railroad line 150 percent as developed as Indo-China's (Siam: 2,900 km. Indo-China: 1924 km.)

Thus the native bourgeoisie (we mean the industrial and commercial bourgeoisie and not the feudal) born of an artificial clash, is basically incapable of properly fulfilling its historical role.

Smitten with congenital impotence, the tongues of Party bureaucrats these days ring rather hollow and stir resentment in the hearts of non-Party workers, who on revolutionary holidays like May 1st want to see unity of Communist forces before the masters.

AFTER YEN BAY

The Revolt in Indo-China

"placed between two fires", it has never been and never will be able to live its independent life. History has inscribed its oscillations now towards the imperialist bourgeoisie (French) without this bourgeoisie, at least till the latest times, uniting or allying itself with one or the other of the two Indo-Chinese social poles.

After many gropings, the Indo-Chinese bourgeoisie is falling pitifully into the only political formula that fits it: Franco-Annamite collaboration based on a vague equality, upon justice and courtesy (!) in reality, upon the unequal sharing, but still sharing, of Indo-China and the surplus values extracted from the forced labor of the Indo-Chinese masses.

Contrary to other bourgeoisies supported more or less by deceived masses, the Annamite bourgeoisie has entered upon the political scene without having first been able to rally any part of the masses. This explains the brutal, "inelegant" manner with which the French government, conscious of this fact, treats it. Twice the most authorized representatives of France, importuned by the demand of our elected bourgeois, have told them flatly: "You represent nothing at all."

After this declaration that the native bourgeoisie, artificially born, is incapable of any revolt, we now hear Doriot propound his colonial theory. "Bourgeois democratic revolution first," he recently said in the Civil Engineers Hall of rue Blanche. There immediately unfolds before my eyes with blinding clearness the horrible scenes of torture in China at the time of the Chiang Kai-Shek-Stalin "revolutionary" experiment.

Cannot Doriot understand that the native bourgeoisie, suffering from congenital impotence, will not embark on a democratic revolution, but will align themselves on the side of imperialism?

And besides, there exists a world situation within which Indo-China is included. Capitalism extends to the farthest corners of Asia. The world, despite the fact that politically it is still composed of many nations, tends to form an economic whole. In addition, democracy is sufficiently exposed so that there can no longer be any place for a democratic revolution.

Bourgeois revolution or proletarian socialist revolution no other issue.

But if one can distinguish the real from the formal, it can be said that in reality the world bourgeois revolution parallels capitalist expansion itself in all its forms.

There remains now the proletarian socialist revolution. Of course, that will not be achieved at one blow. There is a complicated process, that is, stages which we can fix only after having thrown light on the situation created by the artificial blow of colonization upon the peasantry and the proletariat, and after having explained the manner of conceiving relations between these two classes, as well as the role of the intellectual revolutionaries. There is also the uneven development of capitalism. This means that the actual revolutionary struggle cannot be limited to generalizations, to theories concocted in the ante-

The Inconsistency of the S. L. P.

KANSAS CITY—

It is amusing how the Socialist Labor Party decries revolutionary action on the part of the workers; and, at the same time, pretends to defend the Soviet Union which was established by revolution. I quote from three separate paragraphs of a pamphlet entitled "Americanism" issued by the S.L.P.:

"It is self-evident that it is the Proletarian Revolution in Russia which has aroused the capitalist class of this country to realization and action. All means are good to a desperate ruling class, as long as the hope is held out of prolongation of power. (Referring to direct action propaganda.) When it is not possible to soften the worker's brain by cajolery, or gouge it out by jingoism, then by all means let it be beaten out by policemen's clubs or shot out by Winchester rifles."

The author of the pamphlet did not consider the fact that the Revolution in Russia would never have been brought about had not the workers of that country dared to face clubs and rifles. Had S.L.P. tactics been followed in Russia, the nation would still have been prostrate under the iron heel of the Romanoffs.

The inconsistency of the S. L. P. is further shown by the fact that its official organ, the Weekly People, has, at the same time, been publishing a biography of Lenin and ridiculing Communists as "comesocists". A Communist alive is, according to S. L. P. reasoning, a hair-brained fanatic, while one dead is a great proletarian hero.

We wonder if both the purveyors of capitalistic and Menshevik bromides are not attempting to soften the brains of the workers by cajolery. One teaches them to acquiesce in robbery; the other fails to teach him the correct tactics wherewith to eliminate the robber. In the present crucial moment, when class lines are being drawn firmly and sharply, when the workers are struggling for emancipation, the S. L. P. continues to sit on the fence and make asinine quips at those who are genuinely laboring to overthrow capitalism.

In the very words of the S. L. P., "all means are good to a desperate ruling power." If they ever examined history, the S. L. P. writers would be forced to observe that no ruling class has ever succumbed without a struggle. The capitalist class is no exception to the rule as its past record and present conduct show.

room of the international bureau. Step by step, we must follow the dynamic relations of the united forces, the temporary harmony among them, strengthened or destroyed by the later developments of the struggle. We can nevertheless say one thing. The revolutionary party which will succeed is that which, while maintaining an ideological intransigence and fighting the opportunist concessions of the bourgeois-democratic revolution type, will know how, in the field of action, to pass over the "revolutionary compromises" with the temporary allies and to provoke splits within the heterogeneous camp of the enemy.

The book that first told the inside story of the struggle between the Opposition and the bureaucracy in the Communist Party in Russia. The details of how the conspiracy was hatched against Leon Trotsky by Stalin, Zinoviev, Bucharin and others, was recounted originally in this excellent volume. It is invaluable for an understanding of present day events in Russian and the world Communist movement.

Doonping on China

Charlatanism as a Cover for the Concealment of Adventurism

There is no other way to characterize the article "The Rising Revolutionary Wave and Trotsky Liquidation in China" by R. Doonping in the March issue of the "Communist" than as charlatanry and falsehood. It is not a polemical contribution written by someone convinced of his point of view—right or wrong—or of a confused revolutionist, but a piece of cheap slander, bought and paid for. That it can disgrace the pages of even so rotten a review as the "Communist" is a pitiable commentary on the theoretical abyss into which Stalinism is dragging our movement.

What Should Not Be Forgotten

When a supporter of the Stalinist policies in China dares to proclaim and defend them publicly against the views—confirmed a thousand times over—of the Opposition, at the same time spewing his slanders upon Trotsky who was chiefly responsible for shaping a course towards Bolshevism in China, it is first of all necessary to repeat a number of plain facts, which all the squirming of the bureaucrats will never down:

1. Stalin-Bucharin-Martinov were the principal props for Chiang Kai-Shek until the very last moment. The Opposition demanded that the Communists break with Chiang Kai-Shek and warned in advance—not after the fact, Doonping, but in advance—against his certain betrayal.

2. Stalin and Co. subordinated the Communist Party to Chiang Kai-Shek and the Kuo Min Tang. Under Stalin, the Chinese Communist Party, in a written document pledged itself not to criticize Sun Yat Senism. Under Stalin, the Chinese C. P. declared that it had differences "only in matters of detail" with the bourgeois Kuo Min Tang. Under Stalin the Chinese Communist Party was made to obey the discipline and decisions of the bourgeois K.M.T. The Opposition demanded—in time, not after the C. P. had been drowned in its own blood—the freedom of action, the political and organizational independence of the Chinese C. P.

3. On the very eve of the moment that Chiang Kai-Shek was entering Shanghai with his army to let loose a horrible reign of terror against the Chinese workers, Stalin was crushing the Opposition in Moscow because it declared that Chiang would soon show himself to be the Chinese Gall-let. Stalin then declared that "we will still go a long way with Chiang Kai-Shek" (March 1927). At the moment that Chiang Kai-Shek was beginning the slaughter of the Shanghai proletariat the French Communist Party sent the K. M. T. a telegram greeting the entry into Shanghai as the "Chinese Commune".

4. When the Hankow government of Wang Chin-Wei and Co. was formed, Stalin praised it as the "only revolutionary center" as the organizer of the agrarian revolution (no less)—only to have it appear in its full stature of strangler of the proletariat and peasantry a brief few weeks later. The Opposition again demanded—in time!—a break with the Wang Chin Weis and the formation of Soviets.

5. Stalin concealed the crying facts of the suppression of the labor and trade union movement in China, the curbing of the peasant sections, so as not to antagonize, first Chiang, then Feng Yu-Hsiang, finally Wang Chin Wei. The Opposition had to make these facts public in secret and illegal documents.

6. Stalin and Bucharin sent telegrams to the Chinese Communists demanding that the brakes be put upon the peasants movement. The Opposition demanded that it be driven forward in collaboration with the revolutionary movement in the cities.

Chinese Soviets: Now and Then

7. The official brakemen of the Chinese revolution opposed the formation of Soviets when the revolutionary wave was rising and raised, instead, the slogan of a constituent assembly. The Opposition was for the formation of Soviets, at the proper time, when it meant setting tens of millions of workers and peasants into motion for the capture of power.

8. Stalin raised the slogan of Soviets for China only after the crushing of the Chinese proletariat and peasantry, after the physical annihilation of the Chinese Communist Party to his ally Chiang Kai-Shek, because he could not and cannot distinguish the face of a revolution from its rump. The Opposition, pointing out only what idiots and blind men cannot see—that the counter-revolution has triumphed in China—has raised the slogan of the constituent assembly for China as a transitional slogan that will revive the mass struggle and lead to the victorious issue of the third Chinese revolution, to the dictatorship of the proletariat which supports itself upon the masses of peasants.

This criminal record of the official apparatus must never be forgotten.

Now for Mr. Doonping's dishonest article. His two main contentions are that "Trotsky sees no revolutionary perspective in China", i. e., that he is a "liquidator"; and that China still stands before a bourgeois democratic revolution, i. e., not before the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Now how does Doonping draw the conclusion that Trotsky sees no revolutionary perspective in China? Because "the theoretical root of Trotsky's mistakes is his erroneous theory of 'permanent revolution'." So Trotsky is an advocate of the "permanent revolution", that is, of the democratic revolution developing into the socialist revolution, of the flow of the class struggle rising steadily towards a higher and broader stage. If that is true (and it is) where does his "liquidationism", his "lack of revolutionary perspective" fit in? Doonping intimates that it is demonstrated in Trotsky's opposition to the slogan of Soviets at the present period, his opposition to the guerrilla warfare endorsed by the Stalinists, in his advocacy of transitional democratic slogans. Where does the one flow from the other? If the Communists do not raise the slogan of "Establish the power of the Soviets" in, let us say, Turkey, does this indicate the absence of a revolutionary perspective? Or, conversely when the Stalinists, breaking with all the teachings of Marxism and Leninism and the experiences of the revolutionary movement, carry thru in China a policy of "Communist" Makhnoism, of adventurist, self-exhausting guerrilla warfare, does that prove these perverters of Marxism to be the best revolutionists?

So that Doonping's conscious falsification of Trotsky's position may be adequately understood we quote from the latter's article, "China and the Constituent Assembly":

Trotsky on the Constituent

"China is not passing through a revolution now but rather a counter-revolution. During such a period, the slogan of Soviets can have meaning only for restricted cadres by preparing them for the third Chinese revolution in the future. This preparation obviously has an enormous importance. To accomplish it, the slogan of Soviets must accompany that of the proletariat's struggle for the dictatorship at the head of all the poor masses of the population, and above all, of the poor peasants. But, besides the preparation by theory and propaganda of the revolutionary cadres for the revolutionary future, there still remains the question of mobilizing as broad as possible workers' circles for active participation in the political life of the period we are traversing."

This is not understood at all by the Stalinists. For their criminal opportunism of yesterday they substitute an equally criminal adventurism today. With the working class crushed, the revolutionary movement decapitated, the order of the day is headed, for them, by the... immediate struggle for power.

But not even for that! The Chinese proletariat has been forbidden to fight for power by the leaders of the Comintern. In China, says Doonping, the task of the moment is the struggle for the democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry, because says our feeble-minded Marxist, the remnants of feudalism dominate the economic life of China, like the "remnants" of Doonping's Kuo Min Tangism dominate his thin "Marxist" veneer. This can mean nothing but a repetition of the debacle of Hankow. For what else will this democratic revolution look like? What will be its state form? What class will direct it? What will be its social program? Not a word about this. To speak of the democratic revolution after Nanking, after Hankow, and particularly after the experiences—negative though they were—of the Canton Soviet which proclaimed the socialist dictatorship, is to place a "legal" prohibition upon the Chinese proletariat to fight for power and lay the basis for a recurrence of the crimes of Stalinism in the Chinese revolution of 1925-27.

Doonping's Defense of Browder

Two more words on Doonping. He ardently defends Earl Browder from our comrade Charlie Bryne, who in an issue of the Militant, once called Browder "Stalin's Yankee Priest in China". Comrade Bryne spoke more truly than he spoke. And here is the fact. When the nationalist government left Canton for Wuhan, the general Li Ti Sin carried out a coup d'Etat in Canton (December 1926-January 1927). The workers were disarmed. The Canton Committee of the Kuo Min Tang, led by Left wing elements, was dissolved at bayonet point. The workers' groups that protested were hunted down mercilessly and driven into illegality. Yet, after this reactionary action, the delegation of the Comintern, composed of Browder, Tom Mann and Doriot, visited Canton, were received by the butcher Li Ti Sin, and were banqueted and toasted by him without a word of the meekest protest from them against the slaughter of workers. That is the beginning and the end of Browder's revolutionary record in China.

And now, who is Doonping himself that he presumes to teach Marxism and Leninism to Trotsky and the Opposition? He began his revolutionary education in a Chinese bourgeois university, and improved it as a student in Rockefeller's University of Chicago. During the whole period of the Chinese revolution, he was a member and ardent supporter of the Kuo Min Tang, and an opponent of Communism. After the defeat of the revolution, he joined the Communist Party and was forthwith sent to the Far Eastern University in Moscow to absorb the latest brand of Stalinism. Fearless revolutionist that he was, he resisted violently the proposals that he go to China for Communist work, calculating that a head on the shoulders in Moscow is worth two on the ground in Canton. He even wanted to quit the Far Eastern University to return to comfortable America. He was finally granted his heart's desire. To perfect his 100 percent Bolshevik education (Stalin style) he entered Murray Butler's Columbia University, where he is now completing his studies—in Marxism, we suppose. In the cozy calm of the university campus, is he not just the man selected by destiny to teach the Opposition the fundamentals of Marx and Lenin?

In the Soviet Union

And the Kulak?

MOSCOW—

In a recent number of "Soviet Siberia" one finds a decision of the Executive Committee of the Regional Soviet where, among other things, it says: "Kulak holdings destined to be liquidated are divided into two groups: 1. The active Kulaks, among the richest, who must be deported to distant localities, and 2. all the remaining Kulaks who will be left within the limits of their respective districts but who will be put out and distributed over other grounds outside of the limits of the collective farms." This "liquidation" of the Kulak by means of Article 58 and by administrative measure reminds me of the plan of the late Stambulsky ("peasant" prime minister of Bulgaria killed by the fascists) to "uproot entirely" the Communist evil by means of a complete deportation of all the Bulgarian Communists (at that time they counted about 38,000) to the desert islands of the Black Sea littoral or to any other kind of deserted locality. As you see, in this field also our Centrists steal their "ideas" from others, in this case from a petty bourgeois prime minister of Bulgaria.

Voronezh versus Tomsk!

Now for some news. The leaders and semi-leaders of the capitulators have been distributed throughout the U.S.S.R. On this subject, Radek has reflected thus: "Surely L. D. will exclaim: Let Radek tell us now which is better—Tomsk or Voronezh! Ah! it must be admitted that L. D. was right in his foresight. But what can you do... There is no way out, no way out..."

Three deported Oppositionists were arrested at Schtchedrinsk. They are accused of "having received directives and of spreading them". Quite simply, they are threatened with "solitary" for having corresponded with comrades in a spirit which is not that of the capitulators. With such an accusation, the Centrists can arrest the whole population of the deportees. Moreover that is just what they are beginning to do, for recently four comrades were arrested at Tomsk and shipped to Nizhni-Sibirsk. They would like to finish us off for the Sixteenth "council".

How is your letter of November concerning the "possible or inevitable concessions to the class enemy in the realization of the Five Year Plan" to be interpreted? What concessions are you speaking about? Up to where will these concessions go? Perhaps you will write us in detail your opinion on this matter. It would be very useful. As for me, personally, it seems that being given the situation, after all the Centrist madness in the country, the return to the positions of our Platform runs the risk of being interpreted as a concession. But since since they cannot go further, I am for such a concession, that is, for the recall of the measures which have led to the "generalized mess". I mean the "generalized collectivization" accompanied by accusatory "comments".

I am against the "switching" of small agriculture on to the "socialist" rails in one or two years, because I believe that such a switching will yield absolutely nothing and because I think the theory of socialism in one country is false. I am against the monstrosities accomplished by the light-hearted Centrists in the country, which make the Kulak a martyr for the "peasant" cause. In a word, I am for the concession that would consist in a return to the position of our Platform. Is that the kind of concession you speak of in your November letter? Write us about it!

Whalen's Forgeries

The crude anti-Soviet forgeries of Mr. Whalen have proved a miserable dud—even in Washington. The New York Graphic exposed their origin by tracing the forgeries to a New York printing shop where the "Comintern" letterheads were turned out. Besides, anyone casually acquainted with the Communist movement could see at first glance that no Communist or Communist organization could possibly have concocted the letters. What stands out quite clearly is that Whalen must have been well aware of the falsity of the "documents" when he first made them public. For his pains he has been virtually laughed out of court by most of the prominent capitalist papers. But that does not mean the end of the matter. There are indications that the roots of the whole dirty business may be uncovered and "men higher up" involved. The Forgers International reaches from Riga and Sofia, through Berlin, through MacDonald and Baldwin, to Whalen. Mathew Woll and Ralph Easley of the Civic Federation, and some "noted individuals" in Washington whose names may yet be known. Nevertheless, Whalen's attempt to put a crimp into the growing U. S.-Soviet trade by an "exposure" of Amtorg has not got very far. American labor, suffering intensely from unemployment, will do well to demand credits to Russia that will enable it to place machinery orders here and alleviate joblessness.

Tariff and Trade

The attempt of American capitalism to issue out of its profound crisis is involving it in the sharpest conflict throughout the world. Hoover's soothing syrup is obviously accomplishing nothing. The ill-fated "engineering mind" no sooner says that all is going well than the Stock Market suffers its worst crash, Canada opens a bitter tariff war on the U. S. and a new decrease in New York jobs is immediately reported. The U. S. (which can build capitalism in one country just as little as Stalin can build socialism in one country) can alleviate its body-racking crisis only by an assault upon the world market, which means primarily an assault upon European capitalism, headed by England. But the anarchy of capitalist production makes it enormously difficult to reorganize American industry for this attack. Bad signs for American industry multiply: steel and iron are stagnant. Foreign trade dropped almost a third of a billion dollars in January-February-March. Canada is hitting back at the Grundy bill by establishing a British-favored tariff that will cut American trade with Canada by 25 percent; France and other countries are also preparing retaliations. America will meet world competition only by lowering costs of production, which means the severest attack on U. S. labor's standards, and the creation of the most profound international social convulsions and upheavals. The American crisis is not only lifting whole sections of the working class out of capitalist-minded swamps, but is blazing the trail for the proletarian revolutions in Europe.

The Labor Party's Message of Peace Comes from the Mouth of Machine Guns

The world of liberal and socialist reformism is deeply stirred with fear and chagrin. All its shabby principles and methods, its "prestige", its "future" are in danger of crashing on the rocks of the class struggle in India. The British Labor Party and its leader, Ramsay MacDonald, are again taking the great dispute between reform and revolution out of the realm of abstract discussion and testing the merits of the former in undisputable realities. And the test has resulted, as was inevitable, in a crushing indictment of MacDonaldism.

Eighteen hundred British troops, the soldiers of His Majesty and His Majesty's loyal servants of the Labor Party, are patrolling the streets of Sholapur. The Indian population is being persuaded of the nobleness of MacDonald's "inevitability of gradualness" by the establishment of martial law. The message of all-hallowing pacifism is pouring out of Labor Party machine guns that point down all the thoroughfares. MacDonald is inserting the sweet spirit of Christ and Laborism into the hearts of the Indian masses at the point of the saber and bayonet.

From 200 to 500 Indians have been imprisoned in turbulent Bombay and vicinity so that they can reflect in their cells on the Labor Party's passionate desire to "free India". So can the 80 Indians that were arrested in Calcutta. So can the relatives of the Indians massacred at Peshawar when the British troops (with the slogans of MacDonald's pacifism inscribed on their regimental banners) retook the city from the insurgents. The pious Christian Laborites are on a Holy Crusade—to preserve the British Empire.

The international social democracy is worried. Its "prestige" is being hopelessly compromised. The French Populaire writes: "Political opinion in England—and in that country every government is obliged to reckon with it—is so attached to what it calls 'the integrity of the empire' that the cabinet which would infringe this integrity, in which India forms the keystone for the English, would be immediately swept away." Nevertheless, these professional slave traders add, "the Labor Party looks upon the Gandhi movement with sympathy". Certainly, for Gandhi who is strangling the movement he is involuntarily arousing but not for the movement itself.

The «Red» Guerilla War in China

NOTE: This article by one of the leaders of the Chinese Opposition was received after our last issue was off the press. It gives a first hand picture and Marxist analysis of the guerilla warfare now going on in Southern China and serves as a thorough reply to the falsehoods and anti-Marxist nonsense which the official Party press (particularly its Chinese "expert" Doonping) publishes on events in China. Our next issue will contain another letter from comrade Niel-Sih.—Ed.)

SHANGHAI—

To have an idea of the real importance of the official Communist Party, it should be noted that according to the official figures the membership in Shanghai does not exceed one thousand. The organization has no active life; all is concentrated in the hands of the apparatus. The situation is still worse in the provinces.

The recent congress of the Party at Dazhan-Sus proclaimed that the revolutionary situation was "ripe" and appealed for the general strike and the armed uprising in the cities, and for the development of the guerilla war in the country.

Certain strikes imposed from above were terminated either with a lockout by the bourgeoisie or with bloodshed; in the best case, by the economic defeat of the workers. A spirit of passivity prevails within the textile industry which is the principal industry in Shanghai. The bourgeoisie conducts a systematic offensive against the workers, replacing men in textiles by women and children.

Two or three Communist workers can sometimes be found in the most important industrial enterprises. For a long time nobody took the trouble to keep in contact with them. But the First of August saw the beginning of a period of artificial explosions: the Party organized demonstrations, one after the other. Outside of the kernel proper of the membership, the demonstration only attracted some chance passers-by. For the most part they proceeded as follows:

In a busy street, with many passers-by, small merchants, buyers and idlers, a bunch of Communists arrive and begin to shout: "Down with the Kuo Min Tang! Long live the Communist International!" and distribute leaflets. But this method gives no serious results: the leaflets fall on the sidewalk and street and are swept up with the dirt by the municipal street cleaners. A dozen demonstrators are led to the station house. Next day, the Party organ proclaims that the demonstration was magnificent, with thousands of participants, when only about one or two hundred Party members could be seen. Such demonstrations were frequently launched for the most futile motives.

On the other hand, Communists are sent to the Left Kuo Min Tang generals in order to help them in the constitution of new troops. It is even said that the Communists sent a delegate to the conference for a bloc against Chiang Kai Shek. This conference was recently held in Hong Kong. It goes without saying that while it maintains its collaboration with the Left Kuo Min Tang, the official Party and its organ, The Red Flag, conducts a rabid campaign against the Left Opposition.

The situation is still worse among the provincial Party forces. No campaign has been conducted against the Kuo Min Tang for a long time, on the belief that was a finished phase and that after their disillusionment with the Kuo Min Tang the workers would rejoin the Communist ranks of their own accord.

In reality they did nothing of the kind. The Left Kuo Min Tang showed considerable flexibility, even taking the lead in nu-

Norman Thomas, the spokesman for American "socialism" who is also a man of God and piety, expresses the worried "hope that the (Labor) Party will find some honorable (!) way out of the tragically difficult situation which it has inherited (?) in India." To be sure, Mr. Thomas, who has such ardent hopes of building a replica of the British Labor Party in the United States so that he may himself become a MacDonald, is more than a little embarrassed by the difficulties created for him in advance by his brother-in-Christ, MacDonald. Thomas is wiser than MacDonald only because he has not the chance to exercise power—and may Thomas' God help the Filipinos and Cubans if he ever gets the chance. There is no reason in the world to believe that Mr. Thomas will act any better in Havana or Manila than Zoergiebel in Berlin or MacDonald in Sholapur or Cairo.

Puzzled and Powerless!

Thomas is not the only apologetic and embarrassed socialist. His colleague, James Oneal cables the Labor Party: "American workers puzzled regarding Labor Party's attitude toward India." The evangel of timid "progressivism" Muste, declares that MacDonald has done things "which leave his friends powerless to say a word in his defense". We know of no better characterization of these two men than the ones they themselves employ: Oneal is puzzled about how to defend the scoundrelly record of his fellows in India (he is puzzled in general, by any important question), and Muste is as powerless to defend it as he is careful not to attack it.

But what Muste is careful not to do, Lovestone does. He is, as he will explain, an enemy of British imperialism and Laborism. So that on May 10, he called a mass meeting at Columbus Circle to "DEMAND FREEDOM FOR GANDHI!!". Lovestone is bitter at MacDonald too. He wants to "restore" Gandhi to the Indian masses! Lovestone is the most violent opponent of the "permanent revolution" in India. He does not want to "skip any stages of development". Gandhi has not yet had the opportunity to massacre the Indian masses like Chiang Kai-Shek did in China. The "only" thing he has done so far is to betray them in his own way, hand the militants over to the British jailors by disowning their "violence". Consistent Lovestone! For the alliance with Chiang Kai-Shek in the Chinese revolution in 1925-27 and for the defense of the strangler of the Indian revolution, for "the freedom of Gandhi", in 1930!

As for the Daily Worker, and the rest of the Stalinist press, it is as puzzled as Oneal and as speechless as Muste—from another point of view. It has an unusual opportunity to draw pointed lessons from the Indian revolts and the attitude of Laborite reformism. But it is strangely silent. Its Indian news is buried somewhere on an insignificant page. It fears to speak of a genuine revolutionary movement in India because there is no Communist Party there. AND THERE IS NO COMMUNIST PARTY BECAUSE STALIN HAS BEEN TOO BUSY PLAYING WITH INDIAN NATIONALISM AND PETTY BOURGEOIS "WORKERS AND PEASANT PARTIES" TO BUILD THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT. The Indian masses are paying heavily for the crimes of Stalinism.

Co-operatives Confer at Superior

The annual board meeting in Superior, Wisconsin, of the Cooperative Central Exchange has just registered a severe defeat for the official Communist Party and at the same time put squarely the problems of the immediate future of the Finnish revolutionary movement in the United States.

We have previously described the features of the crisis in the Northwest co-operatives, which are in many respects a pivot of the Finnish labor movement in the country. For virtually ten years, this powerful movement has been dominated by the Communists. For at least half that time conflicts of greater or lesser severity have gone on constantly between the leaders of the Finnish Communist (and co-operative) movement and the Communist Party to some extent because of the important role played by the Finnish Party members in the various Party factional fights, but essentially because of the increasing weight of conservatism, sluggishness and opportunism developing in the Finnish movement and restraining its revolutionary progress. Nevertheless, the Party managed to retain its influence and hold on to the movement for quite a time.

Conflict Comes to a Head

The conflict came to a sharp point only in recent times. The victory of the Lovestone faction in the Party resulted in the violent imposition upon the large Finnish movement of discredited and incompetent hacks (Puro, Heikkinen, Suvanto and Co.) Then the impure chemical concoction recently foisted upon the Party as its Stalinist leadership (Browder, Bedacht, Foster, Minor, Amter, etc.) together with their irresponsible ultra-Leftist course, brought the mess to the boiling point. In a sudden, Leftist outburst, disfigured by adventurism and criminal unconcern about results, the Stalinist crew created such a state of affairs in the Finnish movement that they not only alienated the great bulk of the Finnish workers in the Northwest but enabled a group of opportunists (and Halonen in particular) to win these workers to their side against the Party. What is worse, the Stalinist freebooters succeeded in lining up on Halonen's side some of the best elements in the Finnish revolutionary movement—a fact of considerable significance for the future.

The struggle centered around the annual meeting of the Cooperative Exchange Board, with both sides mobilizing all forces. When the delegates assembled, the Party at best had 20% of the delegates, with the opposing forces holding the rest. The majority was not even swayed (such is the loss of C. I. prestige!) by the cable from the Cooperative Section of the Comintern, whose slogan was: "Wrest the leadership of your Central Exchange from the hands of Halonen and place it in the hands of a reliable fighter for a proletarian class policy." "Reliable fighter" is apparently the pseudonym of Matti Tenhunen leader of the Party forces at the meeting, and as unreliable an opportunist as ever led the Finnish movement.

The "Reliable Fighters"

It is characteristic of the "reliable fighters" who were entrusted with fighting for the Bolshevik line that they were quite careful to do no such thing. Corgan spoke on policies only once, and that in connection with a motion to remove him. Tenhunen fought with the greatest violence on technical questions but he assiduously avoided the "Left wing program" as though it were poison ivy. Vainionpaa took the floor only once to make a defense not of the Party line, but...his ability as a functionary who has been trustworthy and efficient. Corgan, Tenhunen and Vainionpaa are waiting—waiting to see how the line-up will look when things settle a bit.

For all of that, the Halonen forces were a thousand times wrong, and set an even worse precedent, by removing the three named above from the Board, although it was found possible to elect one I. W. W. and one socialist to it. That is the method used by the Stalinists, in reverse English, and indicates a profound weakness and fear in the Halonen group.

The meeting of the Board, with more than 250 representative delegates attending, was unmistakably a bitter defeat for the Party which a competent leadership and correct policy might have avoided. The manner in which the Party conducted its side of the fight was literally blockheaded. The Finnish Party press was simply filled with outrageous lies, misrepresentations, personal slander, scandals and the like, probably under the impression that this was the way to win workers from the other side. It accomplished just the opposite—as was easily predictable—particularly since the Party had only a weak leg to stand on to begin with and had compromised itself in the eyes of the workers by absolutely indefensible gangster methods against Halonen's group. It succeeded in pushing genuinely revolutionary elements over to Halonen; it is "making up" for this blunder by calling them all "a pack of social-fascists". All the worse for Stalinist confusionism.

What Next?

But the fact that these fine workers are temporarily with Halonen and the group of officials around him—people primarily interested in substantial labor cooperatives, not in the revolutionary class struggle and its basic principle—is of the highest importance. Some of these officials had a very platonic and fleeting interest at one moment for the Left Opposition, as a sort of cover for their essentially Right wing fight. That's gone, of course. And just as water finds its level in the end, so a section of these functionaries is already leaning towards Lovestone, who conducts a very democratic group, open to all stages and varieties of opportunism.

It is the younger elements, however, and the workers, who have a decisive word to say. Many of them have waited before speaking on the fundamental principle questions, on the basic disputes in the revolutionary movement (of which the co-operative situation is only a reflection) until "the crisis is over". The organizational victory over the Stalinists confronts them more than ever with the necessity of defining their perspective in clear words and firm deeds. Not even the cooperative movement, not even Halonen, can remain "neutral". The differentiation that must take place in the ranks of the confused, and so to speak, "all-embracing" Halonen group is of greatest consequence. A position must now be taken on the political questions of the hour. Right wingers will inevitably go with the organized Right wing. What is urgently needed is an organized, outspoken group of revolutionists, a Marxist core in the Northwest movement that knows how to fight and what to fight for. That is the guarantee for the movement's future.

merous strike movements. In short, after the defeats of the demonstrations organized on the initiative of the C. P., many workers can be seen abandoning the Party and going over to the Left Kuo Min Tang and joining the yellow trade unions. This is what happened especially among the miners of Tang-Chan, near Tien-Tsin.

In the provinces, the strikes, acts of sabotage and other conflicts were often provoked in an entirely artificial manner in order to justify the schema of a revolutionary recrudescence. This sort of demonstration succeeded in embracing only a restricted part of the workers' forces and contributed more to weakening than strengthening the movement.

Rich Peasant Elements in Party

The very small proportion of proletarian elements within the Party frequently leads to the decay of the movement in the villages. Also, the rich peasants often join the Party. Easily solidarizing with the struggle against taxes, the assessments on domainal land leases and other state impositions.

Conversely, these same rich peasants show themselves basically hostile to the directives of the Party on the leases between individuals and usurious loans. In those regions, the poor peasants break away from the revolution, become discouraged and go to sleep at meetings. The movement has no hold on the class of poor peasants because it does not constitute a struggle against the rich peasants.

In the villages of the Tung-Cheiu and Kwang-Si provinces, the Party organizations are peopled with lumpen-proletarian elements or bandits whose armed detachments often cover themselves with the name of Red Army. Further in the same province of Tung-Cheiu the rich proprietors call themselves Communists in order to seek an alliance with these armed groups. Such proprietors often pay the "Red" chiefs so as to be authorized, under their protection, to levy rental rates on the poor peasant. When the peasants ask why these Communists levy rents, they are told that it is for various needs, including the provisioning of troops. Such troops of so-called Communists do not limit themselves to levying contributions on the rich, but also on the poor, and in general carry on numerous exactions and violence, arousing the hatred of the peasants and compromising the names of Communism and the Red Army.

Everything shows that with such a weak development of the revolutionary spirit in the villages and such an oppression of the proletariat, the guerilla war in the country can lead to nothing but pure banditry. In any event, that is the situation in the province of Kiang Su.

Frequently, also, troops of partisans proceed to the temporary occupation of small localities only in order to give their chiefs the opportunity to enrich themselves at the expense of the population and the State treasury. This it what is happening especially in the Hupei province.

Tchu-Deh's Forces

The detachment of the Communist Tchu-Deh, composed of the remnants of Ye-Tin's forces, has been reinforced by new groups of rebels. Pursued by the regular forces, this detachment goes from Right to Left, utilizing the lack of any contact between the governmental forces of the four provinces of Hunan, Kiang-Si, Kwantung and Fukien. This detachment, or at least its nucleus already exists since 1927. It wages war without cessation. It escapes all pursuit, taking refuge in the mountainous parts of the four provinces mentioned above. Tchu-Deh's detachment distinguishes itself advantageously from the groups of bandits in that it really pursues a revolutionary aim. As soon as it invades a new region, it proceeds to share the land among the peasants, proclaims the annulment of debts, constitutes village Soviets, furnishes the poor peasants with provisions as far as it is possible, so that as soon as the government troops arrive the detachment leaves nothing but regrets among the peasants.

Personally, Tchu-Deh is a former Chinese student in Germany, a Communist, formerly a divisional general under the Wang Chin Wei government. The operations of this detachment, however, produce only a weak impression here because in the present general circumstances, they lack perspective. What the Moscow Pravda says, cited by the Left Opposition press, is manifestly exaggerated in order the better to serve the needs of the "Third Period".

Our group has just issued its first appeal for the establishment of a Left Communist League. The work is only beginning. January 25, 1930.

Plan Two Toronto Dress Strikes

Two unions in Toronto have issued the call for a "general strike of the dress-makers". The corrupt International, led by the bureaucracy of the socialist party, and the Industrial Union under the leadership of the Communist Party are both preparing to bring out the workers.

Trade Conditions Rotten

The conditions in the cloak industry are very bad but those in the dress industry, where the overwhelming majority of the workers are young girls, married and unmarried women, they are even worse. As in the cloak trade, the conditions continue to grow worse from year to year and this is reflected in the seasonal migration of workers from shop to shop, hoping in vain that maybe the next place will be a little better.

Preceding the organization of the Industrial Union two years ago, no attempt was ever made by the International to organize the trade. The answer the militants always received to their request for the International to organize a local was a typical expression of the successful self-satisfaction of all bureaucrats: "Too many 'shickses' (gentiles)," who were supposed to be impossible to organize.

When the Industrial Union was first organized, over 300 young dressmakers flocked to join the local, a striking answer to the lie of the International about the impossibility to organize them. Unfortunately, the golden opportunity was allowed to slip by, mainly because of the failure of the Left wing, dominated by the Party, to give the young leadership of the local the necessary lead and advice. The local afterwards went completely out of existence, to be reorganized later. Today it numbers about 75.

The International's dressmakers' local was organized following the success of the International in tying the cloakmakers to a typical Right wing agreement in the semi-company union. The loud bally-hoo that the bureaucracy raised during and after the strike succeeded for a while in pulling the wool over the eyes of the great majority of the cloakmakers and the mass of the dress makers, who believed that a great victory had been won.

The soap bubble, however, has burst on the rock of reality. The conditions of the cloakmakers are as sad as they were before the strike and even worse. Dissatisfaction in the shops is universal. The cloakmakers are chained to an agreement that binds them hand and foot, and on top of that they have to pay the self-satisfied bureaucracy $5.00 in taxes.

Why Left Wing Fails

The failure of the Industrial Union to make further headway is due mostly to lack of strategical approach and orientation to the dress makers, as well as to the loss of prestige they sustained from their previous mistakes. With a correct approach to the workers they should be able to win back the majority of their lost membership, who are now passive on-lookers. The extent to which the Right wing bureaucracy has compromised itself with the bosses should have definitely killed their chances of leading the dressmakers had the Industrial Union acted correctly.

The basis on which the bureaucracy stands is the I. L. G. W., against whom the Party has completely abandoned the fight. Not only do they absolutely refuse to organize a Left wing fraction in the I.L.G.W.—for which there are very good opportunities—but the Party members who were forced to join the International to hang on to their bread and butter were expelled from the Party and branded as traitors. The future of the Industrial Union lies in the hands of the clear-headed militants. They must know how to choose properly between deceptive phrase-mongering about winning the masses and realistic, fruitful work in every field of the class struggle. Thus far the Party bureaucrats have made the wrong choice. —YOUNG DRESSMAKER

Johnstone's 'Self-Criticism'

Crisis in the Needle Trades

The essence of Stalinist "self-criticism" can be summed up in one sentence: The central leadership is infallible and must not be criticized under any circumstances but as blame must be fixed for the constant blunders and debacles, let it be loaded upon the shoulders of the rank and file or the second, third or fourth layers of functionaries who only carried out the ruinous policies imposed upon them. The bureaucratic idea dominates every line of the sensational article (Daily Worker, 5-7-1930) by Jack Johnstone (endorsed by the Political Committee of the Party) which has caused a furore in the ranks of the Left wing needle trades workers. By what could only be ironical humor, the article is titled "Building the Needle Workers Union!"

The article is sensational, and was obviously intended to create a sensation. After many long months of unstinted praise for the Left wing Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, of bluff about the progress and the strength it was enjoying, and of the revolutionary class leadership it was giving to the needle workers, Johnstone establishes the following astounding facts:

A Scandalous Record

The whole past period in the union has been one of defeats. Virtually the whole union has become corrupted and has betrayed the workers. The leadership is permeated with class collaboration ideas indistinguishable from Sigman's. It has worked hand in hand with the bosses and has even organized one group of them into an association in order to arrange contractual relations with it. It has used Tammany Hall police during strikes, bought immunity from the bourgeois state by employing Tammany Hall lawyers and refraining from criticizing the city administration, and has deliberately covered up the treachery of Ryan Tammany Hall president of the local A.F. of L. council, in order to gain his support. It was being hooked up with Mr. Broderick, head of the infamous Industrial Police Squad, the professional skull-crackers of the workers. It sold out to Sidney Hillman by pledging its tacit support to him in exchange for support against Sigman and Co. It even made deals behind the scenes with the blackest I. L. G. W. bureaucrats (Ninfo, etc.) and helped Schlesinger to oust Sigman. It accepted the worst kind of "impartial chairman" settlements in strikes it led. Collaboration with the police flourished among the leadership of the Left wing and of the new union and "produced such jewels as Shapiro whose itching hand and stool-pigeon (!) proclivities were allowed to flourish... The real inner union politics consisted of a maze of 'clever' intrigues, maneuvers with so-called progressives, Shelly Sorokin, sections of the bureaucracy, the police, the bosses and the underworld, but never laying a base among the workers."

The whole hair-raising paragraph written above is taken practically word for word, from Johnstone's article. He is not referring here to any "counter-revolutionary Trotskyists", who are "agents of the bourgeoisie and its police" but to the leaders of the only Left wing union that has had any semblance of mass influence. Worst of all, every important charge that Johnstone makes is true. There remains, however, the job of looking into the reasons for Johnstone's article at this time and the ADDITIONAL facts and charges which he and the Political Bureau of the Party which endorsed his article omitted to mention.

The Left wing union in the needle trades is in a severely critical state. From ideological and organizational control of the decisive sections of the workers in the industry it has steadily sunk in the last two-three years to a position of impotence and passivity. The Right wing, effectively crushed at one time, has succeeded in reestablishing its stifling control of the organized workers. The Left wing has neither a perspective of its future, nor an effective program of action to extricate itself out of its present stagnation and decline.

Lovestoneites Mainly Responsible

It is quite beyond doubt that the main burden of responsibility for this state of affairs rests upon the shoulders of the Lovestoneites whose representatives and policy have dominated the course of the union in the past period. The rankest opportunism and all the elements of degenerating corruption were consciously nurtured by this group, from Lovestone, Gitlow and Wolfe, down to Zimmerman Wortis and Gold.

But with the removal from control of the Lovestone group and the imposition of the "new leadership" the situation has not improved, but if anything, been made worse. There is no reason to doubt that Johnstone's article was dictated by essentially factional motives—to discredit the easily discredited Lovestone leadership, to lay it on thickly in order to cover up Johnstone's own share (and that of his fellow "leaders") of the criminal responsibility. For example:

Johnstone constantly fentions Gitlow, Zimmerman and Gross as the culprits. Why does he fail to write that Gold, Potash and Burochovich are at least equally guilty? Purely and simply because the latter trio have "accepted the new line" and thereby automatically guaranteed themselves from criticism for their past misdeeds. Were they any less involved in the dealings with Tammany Hall, with Broderick with the police, with the I. L. G. W. fakers with the shrewd Hillman machine than Zimmerman and Co? Not a whit less!

Is Johnstone animated by the interests of the Left wing and working class, or merely by the desire to take a factional crack at Lovestone when he conveniently forgets that Gold proclaimed Shapiro's "innocence" only up to a couple of months ago? or that it is precisely the now white washed Gold who had the financial dealings with Hillman by which the Left wing's "neutrality" in the A. C. W. fight was purchased? or that Gold and Burochovich are far from being strangers to the police? or that Wortis has always been the "ideological" inspirer of opportunism in the needle trades?

Or perhaps Johnstone will tell us why he "forgot" in his cataloging of opportunist crimes, to mention that both he and Browder advocated a policy for the I. L. G. W. Philadelphia convention which would have allied the Left wing with a temporarily disgruntled gang of the bureaucracy in order to "divide the power" in the union? The record of this shameful proposal and our fight against it is in the minutes of the Political Committee for that period. As on a previous occasion, we again demand: Publish that record! Where was this vulgarly opportunist policy, which we fought so sharply in the Party, any better than the maneuvers of Gitlow-Zimmerman with Sigman and Ninfo? Or perhaps Johnstone will find for us a record of his protests in the past against the corruption rampant in the Left wing?

Johnstone Then and Now

Johnstone speaks indignantly about the "Zimmerman-Lovestone" policy of the Left wing during the cloak and dress makers strikes of the Right wing last year. Has Johnstone so quickly forgotten that the policy was HIS and Foster's and that of the rest of the "new leadership"? When he now criticizes the "negative" slogan of "Don't Join the Fake Strike!" why does he not add that this was the official Party policy for criticism of which the Militant was denounced as counter-revolutionary, just as was done when we demanded the application of the united front tactic? Why was it counter-revolutionary to criticize Johnstone and Foster IN TIME for the same stupidities which Johnstone A YEAR LATER accuses the scapegoats of having committed?

The answer is not hard to find: "Self-criticism" under Johnstone and Co. is the mean and cowardly device by which scapegoats and whipping boys are made to take the blame for disastrous results of policies that the Johnstones themselves impose. Stalinist "self-criticism" means the gag for the workers and the shield for the bureaucrats. In this case, it happens that Johnstone is really able to make out an excellent case against the Lovestoneites, but he will not be able to conceal the principal culprits: the new Party leadership. No, not even though tomorrow, when things continue to grow worse, Johnstone tries to pick new scapegoats out of the ranks of the still anointed leaders. Let Burochovich and Wortis look to their posts! Uneasy rests the head that wears a crown—even the paper crown of a Stalinist functionary. Is it not already known that Browder, Johnstone, and Co. are feverishly organizing a new faction struggle to "clean out the old Lovestoneites"? The demand that Wortis, Gold, etc. "acknowledge their errors while associated with Gitlow, Zimmerman and Co." is advance thunder of this struggle.

The reader will ask: What does Johnstone propose now? The cold truth is that he proposes nothing because he has nothing to say. His principal aim is achieved when he succeeds in crushing his Party faction opponent. He writes a few vague, non-committal words about 'the closest application of the R. I. L. U. class struggle policy laid down by the 4th World Congress and the 6th Plenum of the R. I. L. U. for this period of imperialist wars, mass class struggles and proletarian revolution.'

That costs nothing and means nothing, because Stalinist resolutions are raw cloth out of which any policy you want (except the correct one) can be manufactured at a moment's notice. But there is a significant silence about the immediate perspectives of the Left wing union, about the program of action it should pursue, about the attitude it must have towards the masses of workers now dragooned into the I. L. G. W. U., and about the dozen other concrete decisive problems in which the Stalinists have so thoroughly demonstrated their bankruptcy and blunderings. What Johnstone fails to say, what he fails to propose as a means of issuing forth from the crisis that is wrecking the Left wing in the needle trades, will therefore have to be said by others. Space requirements compel us to postpone that for the next occasion.

The Militant invites Left wing needle trades workers to write for its columns on the situation in the union and to give their views on the problems of their movement. Articles written in any language will be translated into English and printed. The Daily Worker is the closed organ of the cynical bureaucrats—the Militant aims to become the voice of the militant rank and file.

FROM BAD TO WORSE

The C. E. C. of the Party has replaced Roy Stephens as district organizer in Boston with Nat Kaplan. Stephens, after having ruined the Kansas City district, was promoted—not for ability but for fidelity—to Boston. The results are too well known. Kaplan, after having done his level best to ruin the New Jersey sub-district last year, is now also promoted to Boston, again, not for ability but for servility. We know that it would require a plenum of the Party C. E. C., with an open letter from the Comintern, to decide officially which of the two organizers is worse. But the Party members in Boston cannot be permitted to suffer so long without aid. Until the plenum is held, we are willing to open a fund drive for the Persecuted and Intensely Suffering Party members in Boston.

Prelude to a President's Swan-Song

The United States has recently produced two distinct types of presidents: Coolidge, a mediocre politician, an upright marionette who screens his masters' corruption, one who knows little and does less—in other words a mere figurehead. During a period of "plenty and prosperity" such men even become little heroes. Simpletons ascribe the good times to their expert leadership. The other is the Hoover type, the engineer of high finance, one who can take leadership in capitalist aggression. During hard times, it is this type that capitalism needs.

Louis Hyman, president of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, is rather the Coolidge than the Hoover type of president. While he rode the prosperity wave of Left wing influence among the needle trades workers, he even became a little hero. Some simple-minded people thought he had something to do with the wave. But when matters took on a different shape, when an aggressive policy, hard fighting and clarity of purpose were required, president Hyman became impotent, useless, and in some respects even an obstacle. Whole weeks passed with the president's chair vacant. It is during this period that he was given a trip to Moscow. There he spent several worth while months—worth while insofar as the president's absence from activities and the office could at least be easily explained.

But there is one thing that must be mentioned to Coolidge's credit: because he has nothing to say he is silent. President Hyman, however, frequently speaks out of turn. One of these occasions was at the Left wing needle trades mass meeting at Cooper Union on May 9th, where a campaign "for 6,000 new members" was supposed to be started. I suppose the Militant will deal with other interesting aspects of this meeting; I have in mind the unsigned article of "self"-criticism by Johnstone.

In his speech, Hyman said, among other things: "When Trotsky was asked why it was that he lost the power, it did not take him long to think up an answer. 'When the revolution was at high tide it needed great leaders, but when it was at ebb such nobodies as Stalin got into power.' As a matter of fact, if Trotsky's policies had been carried out Russia would be ruined today."

President Hyman who, because of his own faultless policies, wields such enormous power over the mass, revolutionary industrial union of Left wing needle trades workers, cannot see why anyone should "lose the power" except as a result of bad policies... But that is something else again. Suffice it to ask: Does Hyman know what the Opposition demanded and still demands? Did he read it from their documents or out of the fabricated handbooks containing ideas maliciously ascribed to the Opposition by Stalin, handbooks given gratis to all official visitors to the Soviet Union? These questions are not difficult to answer.

Where Hyman Has Fallen Down

There is, however, another side to the matter, and that is the tactlessness with which Hyman spoke about "losing" power. We needle trades workers have known for a long time the unfortunate role to which Hyman's lack of genuine independence has condemned him. Hyman is essentially a screen—an honest, an unwilling screen but nevertheless a screen. He has used his prestige as a militant, his standing as a "non-partisan" to cover up the chicanery, first of Zimmerman, Gross, Gold, Wortis and Co. when they were in power, and now of Gold, Potash and Co. alone. He has not had very much heart for this sort of job—that is true. He has frequently excused it to himself and his closest friends by pleading: "What else can you do? It's in the interests of the union." He has not even done this work very actively or energetically—and that accounts for his long passivity in union affairs. Nevertheless, the accomplishment, however feeble, of this task has enabled him to retain his formal "power" in the union, at least until now.

Alas, his recent needless assault upon Trotsky, even though it earned him the praise of Gold and the other Potashes, is only the operative prelude to his own swan song. It is an open secret in the needle trades market that Hyman is among those slated to go. Coolidge was at least followed by Hoover, but Hyman cannot even have that poor consolation. He is to be replaced (isn't the decision already made at 125th Street?) by that giant intellect and darling of the needle trades masses, H. Sazer. In cold truth, Sazer is already loitering around the corridors and offices of the union, an ominous shadow to Hyman, preparing for his historic task of leadership by an apprenticeship of licking postage stamps and folding envelopes.

So we see that comrade President Hyman is precisely the man to talk about "lost power". He ought to know. —B. T.

Only recently, March 8, 1930, Pravda expounded Stalin's unfortunate theory anew, in the sense that "socialism, as a social-economic formation", that is, as a definite order of productive relations, can be fully realized "on the national scale of the U.S.S.R." Quite another matter is "the complete victory of socialism in the sense of guaranteeing it from intervention of capitalist encirclement"—such a complete victory of socialism "actually demands the triumph of the proletarian revolution in several advanced countries". What abysmal decay of theoretical thought was needed for such sorry scholasticism to be expounded in a learned form on the pages of the central organ of Lenin's party! If we should assume for a minute the possibility of realizing socialism as a finished social system in the isolated frame of the U.S.S.R., then that would be the "complete victory"—what intervention could be talked of then? The socialist order presupposes high technique, high culture and high solidarity of the population. Since the U. S. S. R. at the moment of complete construction of socialism will have, it must be assumed, not less than 200, or perhaps even 250 million in population, then we ask: what intervention could be talked of then? What capitalist country, or coalition of countries would dare think of intervention under these circumstances? The only conceivable intervention could be on the part of the U.S.S.R. But would it be needed? It is doubtful. The example of a backward country which in the course of several "five year plans" constructed a mighty socialist society with independent forces would mean a death blow to world capitalism, and would reduce to a minimum, if not to zero, the costs of the world proletarian revolution. This is why the whole Stalinist conception leads in essence to the liquidation of the Communist International. And really, what could its historic significance be, if the fate of socialism is to be decided in the last resort... by the Gosplan (State Planning Commission) of the U. S. S. R.? In such a case the Comintern has as its task along with the illustrious "Friends of the Soviet Union", to guard the construction of socialism from interventions, that is, in essence, it is reduced to the role of a frontier guard.

The already mentioned* recent article attempts to prove the correctness of the Stalinist conception with the newest and freshest economic arguments: "...precisely now," the Pravda says, "when the socialist type of productive relations, besides industry, begins to take deeper root in agriculture through the growing Sokhoz (Soviet farms), through the gigantic growth in quantity and quality of the Kolkhoz (collective farm) movement, and the liquidation of the Kulak as a class based on complete collectivization, it shows more clearly the sorry bankruptcy of Trotsky-Zinoviev defeatism, which has meant in essence 'the Menshevik denial of the legitimacy of the October revolution' (Stalin)" (Pravda, March 8, 1930).

These lines are really remarkable, and not merely for their glib tone which covers a complete confusion of thought. Together with Stalin the author of the Pravda article condemns the "Trotskyist" conception "for denying the legitimacy of the October Revolution." But it was exactly on the basis of this conception, that is the theory of the permanent revolution, that the writer of these lines foretold the inevitability of the October Revolution, 13 years before it occurred. But Stalin? Already after the February Revolution, that is seven and eight months prior to the October overturn, he came forward as a vulgar revolutionary democrat. It was necessary that Lenin should arrive in Petrograd (April 3, 1917), with his merciless struggle and ridicule of the self-conceited "Old Bolsheviks", for Stalin carefully and noiselessly to climb over from his democratic to a socialist position. This inner "re-growth" of Stalin, which by the way has never been completed, took place, at any rate, not earlier than 12 years after we gave the basis for the "legitimacy" of the seizure of power by the working class of Russia before the beginning of the proletarian revolution in the West.

National Revolution and World Economics

But working out the theoretical prognosis of the October Revolution, we did not at all expect that, winning state power, the Russian proletariat would exclude the former empire of the czars from the world economic sphere. We Marxists know the role and significance of state power. It is not at all a passive reflection of economic processes, as the social-democratic servants of the bourgeois state fatalistically describe it. Power can have a gigantic significance, reactionary, as well as progressive, depending upon which class holds it in its hands. But the state power is nevertheless a weapon of superstructural order. The passing of power from the hands of czarism and the bourgeoisie into the hands of the proletariat, does not remove the processes, nor the laws of world economy. It is true that for a certain time after the October overturn the economic ties of the Soviet Union with the world market weakened. But it would be a monstrous mistake to generalize a phenomenon which was merely a short stage of the dialectical process. The world division of labor and the supra-national character of modern productive forces, not only remain, but will increase twofold and tenfold their significance for the Soviet Union, depending on the degree of its economic rise.

Each backward country adapting itself to capitalism, has gone through diverse stages of decreasing or increasing dependence on the other capitalist countries, but in general the tendency of capitalist development leads towards a colossal growth of world ties, which expresses itself in the growth of foreign trade, including, of course, trade with their capital as well. The dependence of England upon India has, of course, a qualitatively different character than the dependence of India upon England. But this difference is basically determined by the difference in the level of development of their productive forces, and not at all by the degree of their economic self-sufficiency. India is a colony, England a metropolis. But if today England should be subjected to an economic blockade, it would perish sooner than India. This is one of the convincing illustrations of the reality of world economy.

Capitalist development—not in the abstract formulae of the second volume of "Capital" which retain all their significance as a stage in analysis, but in historic reality—capitalist development took place and could only take place, by means of systematically widening its base. Consequently, in the process of its development, in the struggle with its internal contradictions, each national capitalism turns in a growing degree to the reserves of the "external market", that is, of world economy. The inevitable expansion growing out of the permanent internal crisis of capitalism, is its progressive force until it becomes fatal to it.

The October Revolution inherited from old Russia, besides the internal contradictions of capitalism, no less deep contradictions between capitalism as a whole and the pre-capitalist forms of production. These contradictions had and still have a material character, that is, they are hidden in the material relations between the city and the village in definite proportions or disproportions of various branches of industry and the economy of the people in general, etc. Some of these contradictions are rooted directly in the geographic and demographic conditions of the country, that is, they breed on the surplus, or the lack of one or another natural resources, and the historically created distribution of the masses of the people, etc. The strength of Soviet economy is in the nationalization of the means of production, and their planned direction. The weakness of Soviet economy, besides the weaknesses inherited from the past—is in its present post-October isolation, that is, in its inability to utilize the resources of world economy not only on a socialist, but even on a capitalist basis—in the form of normal international credits, and generally "financing", which plays such a determining role for backward countries. In the meantime the contradictions of the capitalist and pre-capitalist past not only do not disappear of themselves, but, on the contrary, rise out of the accumulations of the years of decline and destruction, revive and sharpen together with the growth of Soviet economy, and for their removal, or even softening they demand at every step the bringing into circulation of the resources of the world market.

The Growth of Contradictions

To understand what is now happening in the gigantic territory which the October overturn aroused to new life, we must always picture to ourselves clearly that to the old contradictions which were recently revived by the economic successes, was added a new one, the mightiest contradiction: between the concentrated character of Soviet industry, which opens the possibility of hitherto unheard of tempos of development, and isolated Soviet economy, which excludes the possibility of a normal utilization of the reserves of world economy. The new contradiction added to the old ones, lends to the fact, that alongside of the exceptional successes, painful difficulties grow up. The latter find their most immediate and painful expression, felt daily by every worker and peasant, in the fact that the conditions of the toiling masses not only do not rise in relation to the rise of economy, but even worsen now as a result of the growing food difficulties. The sharp crises of Soviet economy are a reminder that the productive forces created by capitalism, are not adapted to a national framework and can be socialistically coordinated and harmonized only on an international scale. In other words, the crises of Soviet economy are not merely sicknesses of growth, a sort of illness of childhood but something immeasurably more significant, precisely the rigorous pull of the world market, that same one, "to which," according to Lenin's words, "we are subordinated to which we are tied, from which we cannot break away" (at the XI congress of the Party, March 27, 1922).

From this, however, the denial of the historical "legitimacy" of the October Revolution does not at all follow, a conclusion which smells of shameful philistinism. The seizure of power by the proletariat cannot be a simultaneous act. The political superstructure—and a revolution is related to "superstructure"—has its own dialectic, which breaks powerfully into the world economic process, but does not remove its deeper laws. The October Revolution is "legitimate" as the first stage in the world revolution, which inevitably drags out for decades. The interval between the first stage and the second turned out to be considerably longer than we expected. But it nevertheless remains an interval, and does not at all turn into a self-sufficient epoch of constructing a national socialist society.

Out of the two conceptions of the revolution have grown two leading lines on economic questions. The first rapid successes, which were completely unexpected by him inspired Stalin in the Fall of 1924 with the theory of socialism in one country as the crowning of a practical perspective for an isolated national economy. In the same period, Bucharin gave his famous formula that by fencing ourselves off from the world economy by a foreign trade monopoly, we can construct socialism "even at a snail's pace". This was the common formula of the Centrist-Right bloc. Stalin was then tirelessly expounding the idea that the tempo of our industrialization is our "internal business", having no relation to the world economy. Such a sort of national self-contentment, however, could not last long, for it was reflecting the first, very brief stage of economic revival, which inevitably revived our dependence on the world market. The first shocks of intra-state dependence, unexpected ed by the national socialists, created an alarm, which in the next stage turned into a panic. To gain economic "independence" speedily with the aid of the fastest possible tempos of industrialization and collectivization!—this is the change that has taken place in the economic policy of national-socialism during the past two years. Crawling was substituted all along the line by adventurism. The theoretical base under both is the same: a national socialist conception.

The basic difficulties, as was shown above, result from the objective situation, first of all from the isolation of the Soviet Union. We shall not stop here to consider to what degree this objective situation is itself a result of the subjective mistakes of the leadership (the false policy in Germany in 1923, in Bulgaria and Estonia—in 1924, in England and Poland—in 1926, in China—in 1925-27, the present false strategy of the "third period", etc., etc.). But the sharpest convulsions in the U. S. S. R. are created by the fact that the present leadership tries to turn necessity into good fortune, and, from the political isolation of the workers' state, produces a program of an economically isolated socialist society. From this has resulted the attempt of complete socialist collectivization of peasant holdings on the basis of the pre-capitalist inventory—a most dangerous adventure which threatens to undermine the very possibility of collaboration between the proletariat and the peasantry.

The "Mad Gallop" and the Panicky Retreat

And it is remarkable: just at the moment when this began to appear in all its sharpness, Bucharin, yesterday's theoretician of the "snail's pace" composed a pathetic hymn to the present "mad gallop" of industrialization and collectivization. It is to be feared that this hymn will soon be declared the greatest heresy. For there are already new melodies in the air. Under the influence of the economic material, Stalin has been compelled to beat a retreat. Now the danger is that the adventurous offensive dictated by panic of yesterday will turn into a panic-stricken retreat. This sort of alternating stages result inevitably from the nature of national socialism.

A realistic program of an isolated workers' state, cannot set itself the aim of accomplishing "independence" from world economy, or even more, to construct a national socialist society in the "shortest time." The task is not to accomplish the abstract-maximum, but the optimum tempos that is such that flow from the internal and world economic conditions, strength on the positions of the proletariat, prepare the national elements of the future international socialist society and at the same time, and before all systematically improve the living level of the proletariat, strengthening its union with the non-exploiting masses of the village. This perspective remains in force for the whole preparatory period, that is until the victorious revolution in the advanced countries will bring the Soviet Union out of its present isolated position.

Some of the thoughts expressed here are developed with greater detail in other works of the author, particularly in the "Criticism of the Draft Program of the Comintern". In the nearest future we hope to publish a pamphlet especially devoted to an evaluation of the present stage of economic development in the U. S. S. R. To these works we are obliged to direct the reader who seeks a closer acquaintance with the way in which the problems of the permanent revolution are posed today. But the considerations brought out above are sufficient, let us hope, to reveal the whole significance of the struggle of principles that was carried on in recent years, and is carried on now in the form of counterposing two theories: socialism in one country and the permanent revolution. Only this timely significance of the question justified the fact that we present here to foreign readers a book, which is largely devoted to a critical reestablishment of pre-revolutionary prognoses and theoretical disputes among the Russian Marxists. We could of course, have selected a different form of expounding the questions that in-

N. Y. District Plenum

If the Plenum of the C. E. C. demonstrated the utter bankruptcy of the present Party leadership and its line, the New York district Plenum can be said to have surpassed it in that respect. Needless to say, the session was held up for hours on Saturday (May 10) while the best thinkers in the Party were working out the most proper thesis. Then came the reports of Hathaway, for the Central Committee, and Benjamin for the district.

Hathaway's report gave neither analysis nor perspectives. "There is a disparity between the resolutions adopted and their execution by the Party members, as well as between these resolutions and our organizational strength. There must be a sharp turn (again!) in the Party orientation because so far all decisions are accepted in words but not in deeds (because the comrades have no real belief in your idiotic decisions!). Discipline is needed and there cannot be any neutrality on decisions, as for example in our Czecho-Slovakian organ which accepts all the criticisms made of it but refuses to publish critical articles." It never occurred to him to explain that the "disparities" result from the fact that his decisions have little if any relation to the realities of the situation.

"Our Negro department is bankrupt," he reported. Then why does he print all the lies in the Daily Worker about the successes with Negro work, and then tell only the assembled bureaucrats the truth behind closed doors? "There are no new cadres or forces in the Party. The T.U. U. L. is really going through a crisis and there also there are no cadres for leadership." Why then do you expel and remove all the capable comrades, just because they fight your weekly zig-zags of policy? Why do you crush all our initiative in the Party ranks, killing every possibility for the development of members and poisoning them with your misconceived theories? Why don't you really carry out workers democracy in the Party instead of just writing junky resolutions about it? When you do that and change the present Party course, maybe you will not have to admit so shamefacedly to a Plenum that "in the membership drive we got 1,400 applications (in the press you exaggerated again!) and only half remained." We got these applications at mass meetings and demonstrations but not from elements in the shops."

As for his analysis of the American situation, it was miserable. We sent him to school in Moscow to get a Marxist education and he came back to tell us that there is fascism of the state here because the government has become super-organized, because Hoover conferred with the business men, because financial capitalists are in the government, and power is being concentrated in the president and judiciary. Nor did we need his trip for him to report "the crisis in America is deepening" without adding a single word of explanation, elaboration, proof or analysis to those six words.

If anything, Benjamin only painted the coal blacker. The district has failed here and there and everywhere. "We are still lagging behind the masses." In Patterson, a spontaneous strike, but the Party is nowhere to be seen. (What has happened here?) But this form was never created, by the author, and was not selected by him voluntarily. It was imposed upon him partly by opponents, and partly by the very course of political development. Even the truths of mathematics, the most abstract of the sciences can best of all be learned in connection with the history of their discoveries. This holds all the more truly of more concrete, that is, historically conditioned truths of Marxist policy. The history of the origin and development of the prognoses of the revolution in the conditions of pre-revolutionary Russia will, we think bring the reader much nearer and far more concretely to the essence of the revolutionary tasks of the world proletariat than a school-like and pedantic exposition of political ideas, torn out of the circumstances that gave birth to opened to the general silk strike you were boasting about?) Our women's department has collapsed; the Negro department is completely bankrupt; the building trades fraction is impotent and unorganized; our demonstrations were not utilized at all; the same forces that are always with us were there at the May Day conference, but no new ones (why didn't you adopt the Trotskyists' proposals for a broad united front?); the department work is uncoordinated; etc., etc., etc. The only "success" Benjamin mentioned was the "elimination of the language branches"; only he forgot to say that the members were eliminated too.

Comrades, let us demand a real discussion, not of trifles and not bureaucratically but on the basis of the vital questions of principle, of strategy and tactics that our expelled Trotskyist comrades have raised. And let's fight to reinstate them! —ROGER

The Pittsburgh Expulsions

PITTSBURGH—

The latest news in the Communist Party is that John Kaspar has been expelled from the Party and M. Garfinkel suspended for six months. Unit No. 2 protested in favor of Garfinkel and Kaspar with the results that a squad of officials, headed by the acting district organizer, Salzman attended the meeting to pass the resolution against Kaspar. Salzman is the boy who walks around with a diploma from the International Stalin School and won his spurs as a leader by wrecking the Pittsburgh district of the I. L. D. The unit elected its own chairman but Dunne took the chair without asking the membership. The membership was terrorized so that they were even afraid to speak.

Salzman read my article from the last issue of the Militant to the membership in order to show that Kaspar is connected with the Opposition. After long speeches from Salzman, Dunne, Overgaard and the rest they approved the resolution by asking the members one by one to say Yes or No. Eight comrades didn't say either Yes or No and now they are also in danger of expulsion. These eight comrades are old members of the Party, real proletarians, very active in the Party's work, leaders of the unit and well acquainted with the bureaucrats of this district. All those that voted in favor of the resolutions spoke against it when the meeting was adjourned, which indicates how fearful they were to express their real opinions openly.

All honest comrades must see, and that soon, that such a leadership only wrecks the movement. It must be got rid of. The comrades know what a failure the May Day demonstration was, for which Salzman and the rest of his crew are to blame. At the park demonstration, there were about 400 people and only about 200 paraded in the street. At the evening mass meeting where there were only 50 or so Salzman spoke, and without blushing, told the workers who had participated in that day's demonstration that there had been 2,500 workers on the streets. When I heard that I said to myself that the Stalinist school in Moscow sure graduated a good diplomatic liar.

May Day in Youngstown

YOUNGSTOWN—

Tens of thousands of workers and business men gathered in the streets of Youngstown to see our small parade to hear the speakers in the Public Square, but the slogan of a mass political strike failed entirely. Not only did the steel workers not respond at all but even the Party members largely failed to act. The official Party here failed to mobilize the members and sympathizers with their families in order for the parade to be more successful, and there were neither women nor children in it. (Which doesn't prevent the Daily Worker from publishing its customary monstrous exaggeration about the May Day demonstration in Youngstown. —Ed.) The way to make the workers understand our political slogans is to organize them on the basis of concrete issues in the class struggle, and through hard fighting against the capitalist class to develop a working class understanding and political maturity. The Party leaders don't seem to understand this at all.

In Italy

Crisis in the Communist Party

MOSCOW—

It seemed that the Italian Communist Party was an exception in the Communist International by its escape from the crises which have up to now ravaged its sections. And this fact was very disquieting for the leaders of the C. I. How is it possible, they said, that in the Italian C. P. the phenomenon of opportunism can be limited simply to the case of Tasca?

Italy is the country of the most ferocious capitalist dictatorship; the country where our Party, by great and constant bloodshed has been terribly decapitated. All the old directing cadres and also all the intermediary cadres of our Italian Party and then the cadres successively formed after the exceptional laws, have been swept away, destroyed by the enemy.

Opportunists, Real and Faked

Now however, the Heckerts, the Ferrats and their friends can be satisfied by the discovery that, within the Italian C.P. also a strong current of "Opportunism" has manifested itself, which has literally shattered in two the leading organs of this same Party. Every comrade, no matter how little initiated in the practices of the C. I.'s life in recent years, can guess immediately that you will not find among the opportunists the Ercolis and Garlandis who, in the same way that they spit on the "corpse" of Bucharin after having been its most fervent lackeys, have, themselves, hoisted the flag of the struggle against opportunism.

First of all, a preliminary remark: the fact that in this minority are the best elements who after the exceptional laws, all occupied the most perilous posts in the illegal work in Italy, as well as the proletarian elements of the former leadership elected by the last congress of the Party (Lyons, 1925); and the fact that on the other side there are all the petty bourgeois elements who made their revolutionary career in Party offices (these elements are under the direction and guidance of the attorney, Ercoli, precisely defined by comrade Trotsky, as "the attorney for all causes")—these facts are therefore already filled with significance by themselves to prove to us where the home of opportunism really is in the Italian Party. The very serious discords that have cut in two the leadership of the Italian Party which had up to now retained its unity at all costs, relate at once to political and to organizational questions.

The majority, headed by Ercoli—in an endeavor to have his past errors, his Bucharinist and Tascan loves forgotten—has repaired, as usually happens, to the most advanced position of the "Leftest" Leftism. In accordance with the decisions of the 10th Plenum on the famous "Third Period", Ercoli and Co. say they see "the coming to maturity in Italy of all the elements of an acute revolutionary situation". The formula is typically "opportunistic" for it affirms: 1. "seeing the coming"; 2. "to maturity"; that is, a process is indicated which may last months or years. But it is for the coming months that Ercoli and Co. put on the order of the day the anti-fascist insurrection in Italy. "The catastrophe is imminent... The crisis sharpens every day... The masses are on the streets... We must accomplish a political and organizational turn... The organizational work, they say, must be adapted to the 'new situation' and to the 'new tasks' posed by the situation that is being precipitated."

The Minority Viewpoint

The minority objects, in the first place: Is it possible to accomplish a turn, no matter which, without taking the Party situation into account? A turn which takes no account of the Party situation instead of bridging the gap existing between the Party and the objective situation, can only make it deeper, extend it. This is the sad experience that the Italian Party itself has had in the years of absolute illegality following the exceptional laws.

In the second place: The signs of militancy of the working and peasant masses are multiplying, it is true, every day (Faenza, Sulmona, Avellina, unemployment demonstrations etc., are a proof that a change is beginning to take place in the general state of mind of the working population). But what still characterizes the Italian situation is the very grave state of disorganization of the workers, their condition of passivity and terror. It suffices to consider the following fact: even though the wage of the Italian workers has been reduced to almost 40 percent only in these last years, the industrialists today can permit themselves a new reduction of 10% without meeting open resistance. (Unemployment has assumed such proportions that the workers accept these reductions out of fear of seeing jobless hired in their places). To adapt the tasks and the work of the Party to the situation means to understand in the first place, where the masses are, so as to have the possibility of moving the forward. But the tasks of the Party towards the masses are not independent of the internal condition of the Party, in the working class of its effective bonds with the masses.

If the Party is not connected with the factories, it can have nothing but phrases when it speaks of the political general strike and the insurrection. If the Party is not in a position to organize the workers in the struggle against the bosses for their defense of their wages, it can have nothing but phrases when it speaks of guiding the masses in the civil war, in the battles of the street etc.

Another discord involves the disposition of the forces of the revolutionary bloc. "In Italy today," declares the Ercoli majority, "everybody poses the dilemma: fascism or Communism?" Everybody? Yes, everybody: workers, peasants, city petty bourgeoisie. So there is nothing more for our Party to do for the conquest of the working class, its allies the peasant, to neutralize the middle sections, etc., since everybody in Italy poses the dilemma: "fascism or Communism". How could all this have happened when our Party, since the exceptional laws has been reduced to absolute illegality, has been chased from the factories by the harshest reaction, has lost its contacts with the country, etc? It is a matter, as all can see, of the theory of the revolution that matures of itself, the theory of the spontaneous revolution, which is at the basis of the whole system of the "creators" of revolutions who think that it is enough to write in a paper—which reaches only a very limited number of workers—that the insurrection is maturing in order for us actually to face the insurrection.

The Role of the Vanguard

Against the ridiculous infantilism of those who announce everything ripe, easy ready for success, the minority affirms the need of fighting bitterly against the social democracy because it is not true that the democratic illusions (which, as Lenin taught, find their most favorable ground in every reactionary situation) have disappeared in Italy because it is not true that the dilemma is today posed: "fascism or Communism"; but on the contrary, it is the role of the proletarian vanguard organized in the Communist Party to see to it that this dilemma: "fascist dictatorship or proletarian dictatorship" becomes the dilemma of the whole toiling population.

The minority characterizes the ultra-Left position of Ercoli and Co. as a position of real capitulation in the face of difficulties. To substitute the revolutionary phrase for the old opportunist positions held in the past by Ercoli and Co. does not mean to give the Party a more radical policy. Petty bourgeois opportunism can mask its wares by revolutionary phrases: if it is under the banner of the official leadership of the C. I. that the endeavor is made to introduce these wares into our Parties, then the fight against opportunism appears once more as the fight for a firm really Bolshevik leadership of the Communist International.

The Socialist Party and the Prospects for Communism

By ARNE SWABECK

In various sections of the country the Socialist Party has during the last few months been unfolding a greater activity than hitherto. It is attempting, and with some success, to plant its roots in the present favorable soil of mass unemployment. In inverted form it becomes a testimonial to the fact that among the American workers there are now visible trends toward the shaping of a class movement.

The Socialist Party is very consciously "radicalizing" in phraseology its general slogans and platform demands, although the fact that all references to the class struggle have long since been obliterated from its program is momentarily glossed over. The object is clearly to head off the working class movement, to prevent its natural development towards a revolutionary position and to harness it within "safe" reformist channels, in order ultimately to strike the blows of defeat. The capitalist political strategists of the somewhat moderate type, will not be slow in taking advantage, for their own purposes, of this situation and help push the S. P. forward to extend its influence and thus enable it to fulfill that role. These are ominous signs for the future. But firstly, success for such designs have to count with the tempo of growing working class consciousness which may become so accelerated as to confine the reformist ideology to a rather brief period. Secondly, much depends upon the degree to which the Communist movement can establish its mass influence.

The S. P. and the Middle Class

Whom does the Socialist Party represent and of whom are its ranks composed? In the United States it has by no means established the traditional influence upon working class ideology or the broad mass organization enjoyed by the social democracy in the foremost European countries. In fact it became almost obliterated by the 1919 split which resulted in the founding of the Communist movement. Ever since, its existence has been a rather obscure one, finding scant support largely from the lower middle class strata with a sprinkling of immigrant trade union officialdom. Today the hard pressed middle class, in its lower sections, the small business and professional man, becoming "radicalized" by bankruptcies, are undoubtedly the first to harken to the message of the S. P. But there are also evidences of its penetration into working class ranks through trade unions, through gaining labor votes at election times and otherwise. It is quite understandable that among American workers, now developing radical thoughts nourished by the unemployment crisis and consequent disillusionment with Republicans and Democrats, there should be many whose first steps are directed towards support for the Socialist Party.

In the United States the Socialist Party has as yet no governmental responsibilities. It can therefore still afford to appear as an "opposition" party and keep a gentle rhythm in accordance with the throbbing vibrations of the class struggle. With the cunning adroitness, which for a long time "distinguished" the more experienced European social democrats their American counterpart has, since the beginning of the present crisis given much more front page publicity to demands for social insurance in general and unemployment insurance in particular. It is now inaugurating a sort of a national campaign for the six hour day slogan. Naturally this is designed to catch the mass sentiment and gain influence among such workers just casting off from their old moorings of capitalist ideology. Having had little experience in a proletarian movement such workers do not immediately distinguish the objective role of the Socialist Party nor the fact that its leadership has not the slightest intention of ever fighting for these demands. They do not as yet notice that the methods of the S. P. are not at all those of class struggle but merely of giving lip service to social reforms in order to gain the mass influence necessary to play its ordained role.

Growth of the S. P. is noticeable today in three main directions: First in increased votes obtained at local elections last year as demonstrated particularly in the New York municipal elections. Undoubtedly a goodly section of the vote gain was furnished by the working class. Secondly, it is noticeable in extended influence and control in certain trade unions, mainly through the re-establishment of the Right wing leadership in the needle trades unions at the expense of the formerly powerful Left wing under Communist Party leadership. In these unions, where the workers are generally further politically advanced, the role of "socialist" union officials has also developed to a "higher" stage. Hence the more outspoken autocratic control; more outright, unconcealed co-operation with the bosses and their government in the anti-Communist offensive as well as in the severer suppression of the rank and file workers. More recently, through the C. P. L. A., the Socialist Party is making inroads into other union fields, for example, in the miners union of the Howat-Walker-Germer-Fishwick combination.

Seemingly there is a paradox in the fact that in such unions, when compared to the needle trades, the Socialist Party elements appear in a more "progressive" position. However, it is a very natural phenomenon completely in harmony with its flagrantly opportunist policy of winning mass influence and control and accordingly change its methods and phraseology whenever found advantageous. In these unions of more distinct A. F. of L. type a "progressive" front makes more rapid advance possible. Secondly the Socialist leaders do not as yet consider Communist sentiment there of sufficient strength to warrant a violent attack. Such, however, will be the course as soon as sufficient mass influence has been gained, or in the event of rapid growth of revolutionary sentiment among the workers. The whole record of the "socialist" needle trades union officialdom testifies to this.

The Socialist Party now claims a gain of 6,000 new members since September last, the founding of two new weekly papers on the Pacific Coast strengthening of its general press, greater leaflet distribution, revival of branch units in several sections of the country and more preparations made for publicity, for participation in the Fall congressional elections, etc. In the unemployment situation not only does it put forward "demands" for social insurance and the shorter workday but in New York and a couple of other points attempts have been made to create broad unemployment conferences. These conferences had, of course, no actual contact with the unemployed masses and were "safely" controlled for the S. P. bureaucrats, nevertheless they gathered quite a substantial representation from the trade unions and other working class organizations.

Communists and Unemployment

Only the Communists have actually dramatized the unemployment issue and begun to set masses into motion through the March 6th demonstration and subsequently. That alone is a distinct service to the working class cause and has increased Communist influence. But there are now serious dangers that this motion, despite the intensity and pressure of the crisis, may be diverted into social reformist channels by the Socialist Party acquiring an ever more solid organizational basis—once more at the expense of the Communist movement. Particularly does that danger become apparent when the official Communist Party advances slogans, which at this time are entirely abstract and devoid of any revolutionary content, such as the slogan of the "political general strike". The same is true of its refusal to broaden the actual organization of the unemployment movement beyond what can be gathered in under the tutelage of the "revolutionary unions", the T. U. U. L. and the Party itself.

That the Socialist Party will not even seriously struggle for its own reform demands has been amply demonstrated by experience here and elsewhere. In the European countries as the Social Democracy grew in mass influence and bourgeois respectability and in several places became the government, its upper hierarchy became the tools of capitalism to curtail the social reform legislation already gained, to use the state machinery of suppression to carry it through and to crush its revolutionary opposition. The social democratic governments pursued exactly the same imperialist policies as their capitalist predecessors in office.

One notable case in point just now is the MacDonald government of Great Britain and its attitude to the rebellion in India. MacDonald has decided to carry on more openly the imperialist policies and crush the Indian rebellion. He does it conscious of the fact that it will seriously stimulate the rebellion going on within the labor party against the reactionary leaders, a rebellion now already growing in momentum. This is inevitable. It is in the very nature of things flowing from and becoming the expression of further increased economic pressure upon the workers and growing inability of the social system of wage slavery to feed the masses of the workers.

Within the American Socialist Party can now be noticed some faint ripples, expressed in New York in proposals for a more "progressive" trade union policy and for opposition to the black reactionary policy of the Daily Forward. Even the S. P. is not immune from the economic pressure upon the workers. But the present stupid attitude of the Stalinized Communist Party blankly characterizing it "social fascism" strangles all possibilities of taking advantage of such developments and plays directly into the hands of the Right wing reformists. There could of course, be no reason whatever to place any reliance upon the leaders of the "oppositions" within Social Democracy, unless they were ready to break with that ideology and accept the revolutionary position. In England at this moment, for example, the "Left opposition" leaders take that position fearing that the rapid swing to the Right, to the full employment of the imperialist forces by the MacDonald government will too seriously compromise the cause of reformism. Hence they sound the alarm to save it.

within the S. P. fear that it is not basing itself sufficiently upon winning specific working class influence to strengthen the cause of reformism and thus more effectively preventing the masses from marching to a revolutionary position. It is evident that such elements are weather cocks of the pressure upon the workers but it is otherwise with the workers themselves who are subject to the pressure. Those workers who have taken the first step away from their capitalist ideology and are going toward the S. P., as well as those who are class conscious but temporarily disappointed by set backs experienced, are precisely the ones the Communist Party must win for the revolutionary struggle. Whenever "Left" oppositions develop within the Social Democracy the ground becomes more favorable for that task.

But above all the Communists instead of lumping together all organizations and groups, based on social reformism, leaders and rank and file members, to be combated as social fascists, must make clear the role of the Socialist Party. That is, to show that in a period of beginning radicalization of the workers, the S. P. or sections of it will take on a more radical appearance and make a pretense of fighting for the needs of the workers illustrated now by its "demands" for the six hour day and for social (unemployment) insurance. When the radical wave rises to higher stages and the workers move forward, actually pressing for their needs, the S. P. will become even more of an open brake upon the movement. When the workers go over to revolutionary action for their needs the S. P. will finally reveal itself in the open as a most ardent defender of capitalism, using all the means of force of the capitalist state to suppress the workers' action. This is the history of Social Democracy and there can be no other role for a Party not based upon the proletarian revolution.

For Correct Policy Towards Socialists

The ebb and flow of the movement are part of the natural laws of motion which Marxists will not fail to understand. However, to continue shutting their eyes to this and the failure to apply correct policies in this respect by the Stalinized Communist Party, can in a large measure be responsible for any additional lease of life given to social reformism and for the strengthening of the role of the S. P. as an instrument to attempt to suppress the proletarian revolution.

It becomes quite evident that precisely today, in the unemployment crisis in the United States, the most effective method of concretely and practically demonstrating to the working masses exactly what the position of the S. P. is, would be for the Communist Party to make all efforts to win socialist workers for a united front on unemployment demands. Moreover, a broad united front with all workers, including those of the socialist ideology is an imperative necessity.

The S. P. leadership would not accept this, which would only aid in clarifying reformist workers. With the struggle going forward, their exposure could be facilitated and the influence of social reformism limited accordingly. However, it is hardly reasonable to expect that the present Communist Party leadership would be able to pursue such a policy, which would have real revolutionary content. At least not until the "third period" gymnastics have been eliminated.

It is perhaps well once more to emphasize what comrade Trotsky has already pointed out: that conditions of development in the U. S. are now such that the class struggle may become sharply intensified to a quick tempo, with turbulent upheavals. What will it bring to the workers? Victory, in the sense of marking a step forward to a stronger position from which more effectively to continue the struggle, or defeat, in the sense of giving the movement an actual setback? This in a large measure depends upon the ability of the Communist Party to prevent the extension of the influence of social reformism upon the workers and to assemble them, instead under the Communist banner.

A National Tour for the Communist League

The end of this month will see the first meeting in the national tour now being organized by the Communist League branches throughout the country to hear report by Max Shachtman on the Communist movement in Europe, the International Conference of the Left Opposition that was held in Paris a month ago, and his visit to Leon Trotsky in Turkey. Comrade Shachtman has just come back from an extended stay in Europe and the comrades from all parts of the country have already written in asking for dates on which mass meetings can be arranged in their localities. This is the first national tour organized by the Communist League, and it offers a good opportunity for the strengthening of the Opposition

Hillman's Record for Toronto

It is now over five years since the Right wing has been in complete control in the Amalgamated. Have conditions of the workers been improved? No! Conditions in New York are worse today than ever. The clothing workers work under the most inhuman conditions. Hillman went a step further than "standards of production", and reductions in wages. With the aid of local politicians he forced piece work on the New York tailors, although the workers rejected it at meetings. The liberal and socialist press hailed this move as a victory for the workers.

The Times not long ago carried an article by Louis Stark: "Amalgamated union and employers celebrate this week the success of the 'Impartial machinery' which has improved industrial relations and settled disputes."

Hillman's Kind of Labor Unity

"Next Wednesday evening the New York Clothing Manufacturer's Exchange will be host at a dinner to about 1,000 engaged in the manufacturing of men's clothing, leading officers of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and a group of distinguished guests interested in human relations in industry."

"The dinner will celebrate the fifth anniversary of the founding of the impartial machinery of the men's clothing industry in New York under the chairmanship of Jacob Billikoff, economist, social worker and pioneer in industrial relations."

"Without strikes or lockouts the impartial machinery, sometimes called 'a laboratory of human understanding', has functioned smoothly and efficiently because the union has embraced the labor view of constructive rights and responsibilities to industry and because the employers have welcomed such a constructive cooperation."

"The discussion on the question of piece work continued for three years during the course of which the inadequacies of the system of production standards became apparent to both sides. A year and a half ago the union consented to the revolutionary step of going on a piece work basis." (See the New York Times, Special Features, December 1, 1929).

This article by Louis Stark shows that the Amalgamated officers together with the employers celebrated the victory they had achieved at the expense of the workers. Yes, the Amalgamated doesn't believe in strikes any more. The impartial machinery works smoothly and efficiently. This is true. For whom? For the bosses! Yes, the employers have welcomed Hillman's constructive cooperation. It pays the employers. I agree with Louis Stark when he said Hillman's union "consented to the revolutionary step of going on a piece work basis." Have the workers given their consent? No! What the employers could not get when they fought the Amalgamated for 26 weeks in 1921, they got through Hillman's good will and constructive leadership. It is no wonder that Hillman gets medals from capitalist institutions while the workers get matzohs for Passover.

Not long ago I saw a circular sent out to the clothing workers by the three largest local unions, 5, 3 and 2, signed by the secretaries and local officers. In the circular they stated, "Brothers, arise! do not stand aside. A movement to lift the tailor from his deplorable conditions began through the united three Jewish Executive Boards. The time is not far distant when our trade will be lifted up again to the extent that we could with pride recall the name 'Amalgamated' in the city of New York. We need your help and cooperation."

These local unions have been controlled by the Right wing for the last few years since Hillman began his expulsion policies. These local officers helped Hillman to force on the workers the piece work system. These charlatans who are responsible for the present conditions because they helped Hillman to bring about these miserable conditions, ask the tailors for help and cooperation.

Moreover, letters can be seen daily in the Right wing press, the Forward and the Day, about the intolerable conditions piece work brought to the workers. I will quote one half of a letter. "I was a long time a member of the Amalgamated. A lot of workers know me well. I was one of the best workers and earned a good living. But when the union began her business ventures, and neglected the union, I could no longer make a living, and had to leave New York."

"Now I am in a small town of 1,500 inhabitants, only Gentiles. I am the only Jew. If I were in New York today, with the Amalgamated, I would surely be in the same position and would need relief for Passover. I am very sorry that they made a beggar out of the tailor." (The Day, March 26, 1930). These facts prove what Hillman and his henchmen made out of the Amalgamated under their regime. Hillman not only destroyed the best of the workers in the Amalgamated, he destroyed its very soul.

The only ones who are making a living in the Amalgamated today are the staff, the editors and the boosters (I mean the pen slaves).

The outside world and the intellectuals still consider the Amalgamated a radical and progressive organization. Where do they get their information? They go to lunches, and dinners given by the employers in conjunction with the union officials. They interview Hillman, Billikoff, the president of the Clothing Manufacturers Exchange, etc. This is how they get their information. Then they edit journals and claim they give their readers facts, that they are the authorities on labor problems, also on research work. How can these people give facts when they were never in a shop, and never investigated conditions? These professors or economists merely repeat what one person, Hillman told them when they dined together. At least they should go into a few shops and interview employers and workers alike. If not they ought to go into different union offices where workers assemble, talk to them, hear their grievances and sentiments. This I would call facts and research. Otherwise they deceive their readers when they say they give them facts. This stuff they give their readers is fake, not facts.

Did Hillman ever tell his publicity agents about corruption and graft that is going on in his organization? A few months ago Hillman removed Harry Cohen with his gang for taking graft. Hillman just discovered that Harry Cohen is a crook. I mentioned with quotations (see last Militant) from the Advance that Cohen was tried and condemned by a committee for taking checks. Who took H. Cohen back into the Amalgamated to sell out the worker? Hillman took him back. H. Cohen sold cotton and unionism to the clothing manufacturers. Nevertheless, without returning to the trade, Cohen was installed once more on the union payroll within a short period after the Chicago Convention. During the Cohen affair in 1921 Hillman at a meeting in Manhattan Lyceum said, "H. Cohen can never come back into the organization without stepping over my dead body." Schlossberg said he would resign before he would sign pay checks for H. Cohen. You can see how they kept their promise. Are they doing it for principle?

After seven years of taking graft and helping to destroy the New York organization, Harry Cohen was again removed with his staff for taking graft. H. Cohen ignored the summons and did not appear before the committee. The question is, why did not Hillman try these grafters? The answer must be that Hillman did not want the outside world and those intellectuals to know how much dirt there is in the Amalgamated. H. Cohen left enough grafters in the union to go on with their work without fear. J. B. Hardman, the pen slave, writes about cleanliness in the Amalgamated. Can you beat it? Do the liberal and intellectual boosters know anything about it?

The ninth biennial convention will be held in May, in Toronto, Canada. What are the achievements the Amalgamated can show for the last few years? The publicity agents, the pen slaves, will do their best for their masters. They will show the wonders the Amalgamated has done in the Philadelphia campaign and the unemployment insurance which Hillman's union brought the workers for the last few years. Let us examine the Philadelphia situation first.

What have the workers gained since the Amalgamated came into Philadelphia? The Amalgamated press and the boosters could not show what the workers gained. When I was in Philadelphia I met a former manager of the Amalgamated in a restaurant, for the last few years a manager for the clothing manufacturers. He took an active part in the Amalgamated campaign in Philadelphia and made a dollar or two. I asked him how it was possible to organize the Philadelphia market. He answered, "The Amalgamated spent over a million dollars and we made the workers join the union." I asked him what have the workers gained by it? He answered again, "Fool, don't you know the Amalgamated must convince the employers it will pay them to deal with the union?" I asked him, How will the Amalgamated get back the money they spent? "Through dues and taxes," he answered. Now I understand what the workers in Philadelphia gained: the check-off system, speed up and efficiency which will throw a few hundred workers out of the shops.

What about unemployment insurance? Well, unemployment insurance is a good thing but the way it is conducted in the Amalgamated it is only of use to the crooks, not the majority of the workers. I will cite a fact and let the pen prostitutes of the Amalgamated deny it. In New York, each local received a sum of money to pay out to the workers in unemployment insurance. So Harry Cohen's gang received $8,000. They paid out $5,000 to all the workers and took $3,000 for themselves. Do you see how smoothly things work in the Amalgamated? These are the achievements with which the union comes to the Toronto convention.

Hillman comes to the Toronto convention when thousands of workers are suffering from unemployment. The best workers have been expelled or squeezed out through Hillman's "efficiency". There will be no opposition at this convention because all opposition was crushed by Hillman and because the Left wing had either a bad policy or none at all.

No opposition, except the rivalry between Beckerman and the Forward gang on the one hand and the Hillman machine on the other. The serious business of the convention is to be a "new balance of power" between these rivals.

What can the workers expect from this convention? Nothing! The boys and their guests will have a good time at the expense of the tailors, playing whoopee, banqueting and boozing. It is the after-convention period that is important for that is when the Left wing will again be confronted with the need of organizing for the fight. Let the lessons of the past be our guide to the future. —A. SCHNEIDER

Hughes, a Negro, in the local court house vault. Like the National Guard and State Militiamen in other states, the Texas Rangers are always available at a moment's notice, with pistols, machine guns and tear bombs, to charge into the ranks of workers striking or fighting for a minimum living standard. That is what they exist for: the defense of bosses "law" and the "order" of capitalism. But when bloodthirsty monsters are on a lynching bee, the law-abiding Rangers—if they are on hand at all—exercise their book-sworn duty by seeing that the savage mob conducts the lynching in as quiet and undisturbed a manner as possible. Needless to add that nobody will pay the penalty for the barbarous murder. Lynching is not only the approved "extra-legal method of the Bourbon South, but also of democratic Massachusetts and pioneer Washington. George, Hughes, Wesley Everest, Sacco and Vanzetti are all victims of an identical capitalist justice. The greater brutality of the South is provoked by the anxiety of the Southern bourgeoisie to keep the Negroes terrorized in order to prevent them from coordinating their enormous potential strength for the overthrow of wage slavery. Better than the white worker, the white masters know the Negro can be our strongest ally in struggle. A common, bitter struggle of white and Negro labor against the horror of lynching and Jim Crowism therefore, is imperatively necessary.

Biography and Revolutionary Struggle

The struggle of the factions in the Comintern is in the last analysis a struggle of the classes. Once more the revolutionary Marxists are a persecuted and calumniated minority in the International they founded and Bolshevism an upstream current in the revolution it created. This turn of events can only deter those who fail to understand the dialectic process. History obstinately refuses to flow in the smooth and unruddered channels marked out for it by Fabian doctrinaires of "gradualism". Only in the brain of a Bucharin is it possible to "abstract" the Soviet Union from the development of world economy and the correlation of class forces.

Two Phases of the October Revolution

The October Revolution falls into two phases separated by the death of Lenin. The first was the stage of the conquest of political power and the military and economic consolidation of the proletarian dictatorship through the instrumentality of the conscious Communist vanguard. The second phase is marked by the growth of the elements of dual power, the economic advances of the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie the subjection of the Party to the bureaucracy, the replacement of the line of Communism by Centrism.

To screen their back-sliding the Party bureaucrats had resort to the invention and campaign against "Trotskyism". Lenin who was safely embalmed in a mausoleum could be disregarded by the bureaucrats but Trotsky remained as the living symbol of the heroic phase of October. To destroy his immense revolutionary authority therefore became the bureaucrats' prime concern. To this end history and biography were monstrously perverted. An English critic's definition of history as a "Mississippi of falsehoods" was never more fully merited than by the conscienceless fabrications of the school of Stalin.

The powerful sweep of L. D. Trotsky's Autobiography leaves the whole tissue of fraud and misrepresentations woven by the official theoreticians in shreds and tatters. In the light of this memorable work how pitiful even to his own faction must appear the scurrilities with which a Yaroslavsky like the Fat Boy in Dickens, seeks to make our flesh creep. The motley careers of those who sat in judgement on the Opposition, wearing the saintly aureole of the "Old Guard" are here passed in merciless review. Concurrently the organizer of the Red Army sets out the course of the development which led to his complete fusion of goal and method with Lenin in the supreme crisis of October. The biographical test, Trotsky once declared to an Opposition-baiting plenum is not decisive. Bernstein who was the literary executor of Engels wound up as a rabid revisionist. Franz Mehring who approached Marx in a critical spirit ended in the camp of Spartacus. But if biography is indeed to be treated as the criterion, then let us have exact biography not of Trotsky alone but of all concerned.

The owl of Minerva, that bird of wisdom, takes flight when the dusk gathers, runs a familiar saying of Hegel. The temporary cloud on the October Revolution is the last thing any of us desired but the facts being what they are, the theoretical and political contributions of Trotsky since his struggle with the epigones began, are of inestimable service in the education of a whole generation of younger Marxists. Historical Materialism is no philosophy of blind impersonal forces. In reply to the criticism of the Gotha program, the older Liebknecht declared that Marx stood high in his esteem but "the party stands higher". This is the veriest fetishism, creating an entirely false antithesis between party and principle, between organization and leadership. The choice of leaders is as inescapable today as when it had to be made between Marx and Bakunin, between Lenin and Plechanov, between Rosa Luxemburg and Kautsky. The Autobiography before us perfectly fulfills the requirements of Lassalle's dictum that the beginning and end of all great political action lies in the statement of that which is. Trotsky is the heir to the revolutionary legacy of Marx and Lenin.

Bolshevism did not spring fully grown and accounted like Pallas Athene from the head of Jove in the Greek fable. "Russia," wrote Lenin, "has attained Marxism... by dint of fifty years travail and sacrifice... Thanks to the emigration forced by the Czar, revolutionary Russia in the second half of the 19th century came into possession of rich international connections, of the grasp of superlative forms and theories of the revolutionary movements abroad as no other country had..." "The road of Bolshevism runs through the struggle with the populist Narodniki, syndicalist "economism", ultra-Left "otsovism", and Menshevik and "conciliatory" opportunism". But not the least of the obstacles it had to clear cut of its path was the conservatism of the "old Bolsheviks" who more than once, declared Lenin, have played a melancholy role in the history of our Party by repeating senseless and obsolete formulae.

These preliminary struggles of Bolshevism have significance only as they serve to prepare the Party for the conquest of political power. Not one of the epigones who called themselves the "Old Guard" measured up to the demands of the great October ordeal. Not one had advanced beyond the position of a Left democrat prior to the arrival of Lenin and his April Theses. The slogan of the democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry as Lenin conceived it bore two aspects, one that looked to the past and the other to the future. The epigones only saw the part of this slogan. They were prepared for no more than bourgeois revolution, that is Russia a free market, no repudiation of foreign debts, no assistance to the international proletarian revolution, no nationalization of the means of production.

If according to Lenin the role of Zinoviev and Kamenev was no accident, neither could it be an accident that from the distance of New York, Trotsky reached the same conclusions regarding the revolutionary motive forces as Lenin in Switzerland. On March 19, 1917 Trotsky wrote from America: "In this struggle the proletariat ought to unite about itself the rising masses of the people with one aim in view—to seize governmental power." And three days later: "If the first Russian Revolution in 1905 brought about the revolutions in Asia, in Persia, Turkey, China, the second Russian revolution will be the beginning of powerful revolutionary struggle in Europe..." Trotsky found himself in absolute accord with the April theses. He had remained outside the Bolshevik faction because he feared a tendency would develop within it to limit the revolution to democratic objectives. Fortunately the line of Lenin and the clan of the masses proved stronger than the democratic Right wing which did indeed crystallize. History fused the theory which is anathema to all bureaucrats—the permanent revolution—with the fundamental strategy of Leninism.

The Usurpation by the Bureaucrat

The crisis in the International begins with the usurpation of power by the bureaucrats. The struggle to put an end to the alternative zig-zags of opportunism and adventurism is inextricably linked up with the struggle for a correct Party regime. The base of the leadership in the Soviet Union has become more dangerously narrowed. When Marx characterized Bakunin he anticipated Lenin's characterization of Stalin. Marx wrote: "Theoretically he is a cipher but... a schemer he is in his element." To leave a disloyal figure like Stalin at the helm is, as experiences amply demonstrate, to court disaster for the revolution. The Party regimes in the various sections of the Comintern have been made over in his image—a bureaucracy tempered only by fear of the Opposition.

If the policy of the Comintern officialdom in the period of the British General Strike and the Chinese Revolution was a tragedy, that of the so-called "Third Period" has the elements of a tragic farce. What must be done? We recall that there was another "third period" away back in 1902, when Lenin was fighting one who is a present theoretician of Stalinism, namely Martinov. To the question, what must we do, Lenin wrote: "We must give the brief reply: 'LIQUIDATE THE THIRD PERIOD' (N. Lenin, 1902—"Que Faire"—Paris 1925). And we must add, liquidate the ascendancy of the epigones, purge the program of the Comintern of national Socialism, and restore the Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition to its rightful position in the Party.

T. U. U. L.

«Mass Work» in Philly

The present state of the newly created North Philadelphia branch of the T.U.U.L., the membership of which has fallen away to ten within a few weeks, is another small but instructive instance of the havoc being wrought in all Party organizations through stupid bureaucratic control.

This branch takes in the proletarian Kensington area and was started on the initiative of a few enthusiastic workers, of whom only one was a Party member. By dint of hard campaigning, and without the least help from the crackpot T. U. U. L. "organizer", Murdock, or the other Stalinist job-holders, they built up a membership of thirty native-born workers and were in a fair way to make things hum around here when the bureaucrats stepped in.

The Party Strait-Jacket

They laced the branch in a strait-jacket: programs and policies worked out behind closed doors at the Party headquarters were literally jammed down its throat; anything not contained in them was taboo. Democratic election of functionaries and committee, free discussion from the floor, suggestions for real organizational work, objections to the brazen company union procedure were squelched at once. Seeing that in the eyes of the bureaucrats they were not self-reliant workers but sucking babes, the disgusted members began dropping out by squads.

As was pointed out recently in the Militant, the Kensington area is panting for organization. The workers there are savagely exploited textile slaves of Irish-American and German-American stock with a proud and militant history. But neither during the reign of the Trotsky-phobic Benjamin, nor since, with the Trimmer Gardos on the throne, have the Party officials raised an eyebrow in its direction. The only part played by them in the heroic Aberle mill strike was that of war correspondents behind the firing line, sending preposterous bulletins to the Daily Worker about their wholly fictitious "leadership" of the strikers. And when through the efforts of rank and filers who took the "recruitment campaign" of the T. U. U. L. seriously organization in Kensington was actually begun, they promptly crushed it to death.

Proposes Fight for Jobless in Chicago Labor Body

CHICAGO—

The Chicago Federation of Labor now typical of central bodies of the A. F. of L. and quite oblivious of its past militant tradition, has shown a decided fear of venturing into as much as a discussion of the present unemployment crisis. Nevertheless at its meeting, held May 4, a discussion did take place, initiated by comrade Arne Swabeck, who has been a delegate from the painters' union for a number of years.

At the early part of this meeting a committee previously appointed made a report on prospects for the establishment of a daily labor paper, to be published by the federation, recommending that as a necessary condition for a daily the present weekly publication be first extended in circulation. In the discussion ensuing several of the delegates who spoke emphasized the need of reviving the militant spirit of the past and voiced some criticism of the present trade union officialdom in general.

It was upon the conclusion of this debate that a letter was read proposing that the Chicago Federation of Labor join in the efforts now being made unitedly by the social charities, the Illinois State Federation of Labor and various civic bodies, including the Chamber of Commerce, to conduct an investigation of the free employment agencies. Upon a question being asked the president, Fitzpatrick, explained that what we are after is not so much to investigate the free employment agencies but rather the "fee" employment agencies which are completely interlocked with the superintendents and managers of the big corporations in getting a rakeoff from the workers when placing anybody in employment.

At this point comrade Swabeck secured the floor and turned the attention towards the real problem—the unemployment crisis. He said: "If the connections of the 'fee' employment agencies are as stated by president Fitzpatrick, which I believe to be a correct statement, I cannot see what the Chicago Federation of Labor can expect to accomplish in an investigation to be conducted jointly with the Chamber of Commerce, as the main object of this body will naturally be to protect such institutions and to clamp the lid down on any exposure of this form of racketeering. It would be much more appropriate for the federation to conduct an investigation of its own. Not only that but to look up the unemployment situation in general.

"It is about time for the Chicago Federation of Labor and for the trade union movement as a whole to concern itself with this question. It has done nothing so far to endeavor to protect the workers' interests in this situation or even to begin to fight for the measures which could to an extent become alleviating and which have become a pressing need. The American Federation of Labor leadership has done absolutely nothing in a concrete way. It has even proceeded, true to its reactionary position, to oppose any form of direct unemployment insurance.

"I can think of three important measures which the Chicago Federation of Labor can take up a fight for in order to bring some relief to the unemployment situation. First, to take up the fight for unemployment insurance. Those who have done the productive work but cannot now find jobs are entitled to it. Secondly, to take up the demand everywhere for the shorter workday. I do not mean merely the five day week, but the seven hour day, or the six hour day, whatever is necessary to bring the relief needed. Thirdly, the Soviet Union, which is now engaged in building up industry for its workers is in need of large scale credit to enable it to buy machinery and material and you know the Soviet Union is the only country which has insisted upon union made products. This country has enormous funds available in the control of Wall Street which could be used for such a purpose. It would be a worthy cause for American labor to take up this demand and bring its mass pressure to bear upon Wall Street to grant such credits with which machinery and material can be bought in America produced by the American workers and thus not only strengthen the bonds between the workers of these two countries but also be a great factor in helping to relieve unemployment here."

The motion was put, and carried. The debate was closed when president Fitzpatrick, using the "privilege" of making a statement from the chair, got up and administered one of his notorious backhanded slaps. He tried to accuse comrade Swabeck of not being sincere, of being an obstructionist and a destructionist who had done everything in his power to destroy the American Federation of Labor. Some ardent claquers immediately began pounding the palms of their hands, but when the general audience failed to follow it died quickly as a fizzle.

When comrade Swabeck left the hall several rank and file delegates came to him to shake hands as a token of their agreement. One remarked: "A dirty slam is no answer and the correctness of your arguments could not be contradicted."

Sandino

A few short weeks ago the Daily Worker gave General Sandino, Nicaraguan nationalist, a clean bill of health on the charges made that he had been bought off by American imperialism. It printed the statement of the "League against Imperialism" which said that "the slanderous allegations were spread by agents of Yankee imperialism to discredit a man in the eyes of the working class and peasant masses of Latin America" and so on and so forth. Having been given the O. K. by this Kuo Min Tansque organization of the Comintern, Sandino promptly proceeded to fire his Communist secretary, Marti, and expel from his army any and all "foreigners". Immediately the Daily Worker discovered (May 19, 1930) that "the denunciation by Sandino of Communists, in the form of his discharge of Marti, appears as a prologue to the equanimity with which his entrance into Nicaragua is observed by the U.S. marines." Yesterday's thoroughly white-washed "noble warrior against imperialism" is thus transformed over night into a tacit agent of imperialism's marines. The capacity of Stalinism for "united front" adventures with bourgeois nationalists seem to be without bottom.

A. C. W. in Toronto

It was not difficult to predict the thorough valuelessness of the Toronto convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. It has never held a more empty meeting. Hillman's big achievement was Philadelphia, where he sold speed-up unionism to the bosses like a farmer sells sheep. Cleveland is to be tackled next—by the same methods. The great statesman of the A. C. W. offers workers to the bosses on this basis: "Let me handle them and you'll be surprised at the economies I can make possible." Needless to say, the Left wing is not present at Toronto: its sectarian policy excludes such a possibility. For that, however, Hillman has made his peace again with Beckerman—behind the scenes. All is now harmony in the A. C. W., with the clothing workers paying heavily for it.

U. S. of Briand

M. Briand has now "concretized" his plan for a United States of Europe and given the liberals another chance to become hysterical with joy. Needless to say that the new plan will go the way of the previous ones—the ash-heap. The British lion looks upon it with a jaundiced eye, and with reason, for it has no intention of letting France establish its formal domination of the continent. Mussolini has already screamed a belligerent reply to it, for this two-by-four imperialist has no intention of letting Briand stick his leg into the Italian boot. And not even a child can be deceived by the polite assurance that the new plan is "not directed against the United States" or the Soviets, or by any illusions about America's acquiescence in this utopian anti-dollar bloc. Naturally Briand will not succeed in establishing this reactionary bloc which immediately run its head into a dozen walls. Only the proletarian revolution in Europe can unite the continent on a socialist basis and throw off the domination of the golden heel from across the sea. The Daily Worker and Co., as usual, see only an

The Left wing movement in the needle trades is experiencing a severe crisis. With the exception of a handful of blind bureaucrats for whom nothing has changed, the crisis has been realized by everyone. The most superficial glance at the situation reveals the bald facts that while the Left wing, two or three years ago, was followed by the decisive majority of the needle trades workers and was driving back the Right wing office holders on every front, it has today accumulated an unbroken series of defeats, been reduced to the Communist fraction and its most direct sympathizers, and the Right wing has succeeded in re-establishing a large measure of its control. The picture includes not only New York, but practically every other needle trades center in the country where the Left wing contended with the Right for the support of the workers.

Neither the causes nor the remedies for the situation have yet been given by the official Left wing leadership: on the contrary, an honest and thorough analysis is prohibited by it (that is, by the present leadership of the Communist Party) because it would be the one to suffer primarily from such an investigation. It even seeks to forestall this urgently needed examination by a barrage of criticism directed against its factional opponents in the union and against the lower functionaries who merely executed orders.

False "Self-Criticism"

That kind of "self-criticism" is best exemplified by the notorious article of Johnstone's which we dealt with in our last number. For the Johnstones' is sufficient to unload their responsibility upon someone else; as for what is to be done in the future so that the blundering past shall not be repeated, they let the blueprints of the "third period" take care of that. But since these blueprints do not improve the situation (on the contrary, they worsen it), it falls to the rank and file workers in the Left wing to review its position and decide upon a proper course of action.

The Left wing is today reduced to a shadow of its former strength. One need only look at the recent "Summary of Minutes of Executive Council Meetings" issued by the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union to see this truth substantiated. There is not a single gain recorded there; not one step forward is referred to; but in every field there are numerous losses and failures mentioned. And the admissions of the Executive Council are far more to the point than all the gaseous bluff of the Daily Worker and Freiheit.

Out of the thousands that once adhered to the Left wing, the union today has a scant 3,000 dues paying members left in New York (more than one fourth of whom are Party members!) with a worse record in other cities. Out of the irrepressible enthusiasm and spirit of self-sacrifice that imbued the Left wing and won its victories, there is left only passivity and skepticism. Out of the prestige and authority its leadership once enjoyed, there remains only the distrust and suspicion of the workers.

What has happened? There can be no adequate understanding of the causes for the situation unless it is clearly seen that the crisis in the Left wing of the needle trades is part and parcel of the crisis in the whole Communist movement, a crisis engendered by the multiplication of zip-zags known as Stalinism. The apparent inability of the leadership to maintain a stable policy is a reflection of the constant leaps every national Party leadership is compelled to make in order to keep pace with the ruling machine in the Comintern and the Russian Party. Only with this clearly established can we explain how the Left wing leadership passes so abruptly from an openly opportunist line of action to a rigidly sectarian one, from ultra-conservatism to the wildest adventurism, from united front with Sigman to a rejection of the united front with rank and file

Stalinist Brutalities in Russia

Dear Comrade:

From a very reliable source we have received the following information: "In the Upper-Urals Solitary Prison, which, as is known, is filled mainly by our Opposition comrades (there are 160 of them), two new mass beatings have taken place. One on February 5 and the other on February

23. On the 23rd, besides the beatings, our comrades were drenched with water from a fire hose—this in the very severest period of February frost. The pretext for the beatings was the protest against the terrible conditions of imprisonment."

These brutal deeds of the Stalinist regime must be denounced in every working class organization and meeting. The heroic fight of our Russian comrades calls for the warmest solidarity from the class conscious militants in the United States.

A Raid on Rakovsky

We are informed:

"In the middle of February there was a raid at Rakovsky's which lasted for seven hours. Everything was taken away. Among other things it seems that they also took the completed draft of a declaration to the Party. The police agents in charge of the raid declared to Rakovsky: 'You're holding on to our coat-tails.' These ought to go down in history. It is regrettable that right now we are holding on only to the coat tails. But times will change!"

The author of this letter is right. The words of the G. P. U. agent ought to go down in history. Doubtless, they are not his own words. They came down to him through a series of stages from the very top. These are the words of the "secretarial genius" (a play on the Russian words for "general secretary", i. e., Stalin.—Ed.) At all the stages, zig-zags and turns of recent years, the victorious, mighty general faction of Stalin did not take a single free step: the "defeated Opposition"—the Left Opposition always pulls at its coat tails. It pulled it from the embrace of Chiang Kai-Shek, Purcell, and the "powerful" middle peasant. It pulled it from the bloc with Brandler, Roy, Lovestone, Bucharin. Stalin finally decided to turn to the Left so abruptly, so boldly, so definitely, as to break loose from the Opposition forever. But in vain. The Opposition once more seized his "coat-tails" and this time pulled him "backward" from the edge of the precipice. It is unbearable. It must not be tolerated any longer. Then what is to be done? What do you mean, what? Raid Rakovsky, take away his papers, arrest his correspondents. Since they have no thoughts of their own, they have to interfere with the thinking of others.

On Guard!

In one of the villages of the Byss district there was an uprising, under the leadership of... a representative of the G.P.U.! This is where the real enemies of the Soviet government are. Thousands upon thousands of brutes who beat up our friends in the solitary prisons, who torture them, are in no way different from the above mentioned "representative" of the G. P. U. The Thermidorian scoundrels in the meantime unleash their fury against Communism at the Oppositionists. The insurgents assassinated dozens of their "Party comrades" and then fled to the mountains. This is how matters stand.

In the Party

The Convention Nears

Our Communist Party convention is scheduled to open June 20 in New York. By now, the pre-convention discussion should have been in full swing in the press as well as in the Party units. The whole Party, every member should have been astir with the issues and problems confronting us. And the problems are many indeed. That they deserve discussion, or require elucidation, nobody will deny. In a very short period we "succeeded" to expel from the Party two oppositions, we left behind the "second period", and triumphantly entered the "third and final period", the "period of wars and revolution". Now is the time to make some summaries, to draw some conclusions. After all it was a big jump to take and a very abrupt one. It was virtually overnight that the historic periods were declared changed. Now is the time to count our losses and gains. How many broke their necks in the process? How many were left behind and are still lingering around in the daze of the "second period"? Or can we put the questions differently: How did our policies for this "period of wars and revolution" fare? This is the time to take stock. But there is nothing of the kind.

In one short year we created a widespread net of industrial revolutionary unions, that should make anybody green with envy. As a district representative expressed it at my fraction meeting: "Anyone not joining the T. U. U. L. will be expelled from the Party... Our unions now exist in every field of industry and there can be no excuse on that score". Hasn't any number of an. vbqkj cmfwyp cmfwyp story to tell in connection with this great task that was accomplished? Isn't this something to boast about? Or is modesty a requirement of the third period?

Passivity and Indifference

So far nobody has contributed anything to the pre-convention discussion. This in itself is a very alarming sign. The whole Party membership is permeated with a feeling of apathy and passivity. And no wonder. To write the convention theses, Bedacht was sent to Moscow. There was nobody literate enough left in the Party to draw up the theses. The consequence is that no one can open his mouth in criticism of them. To criticize the theses is to criticize the Comintern—but that is the greatest of heresies for which the axe of expulsion descends. The same applies to the policy of abandoning the old unions and the creation of a number of "industrial" unions on paper—unions with long names, wide jurisdiction, very revolutionary programs, but with only one thing missing—members. If anyone objects to this policy there is no way to express it unless he is ready to be kicked out of the Party. For isn't it a decision of the Fourth World Congress and Sixth Plenum of the R.I.L.U. to talk against that is heresy once more. Facts no longer matter, the crying realities of a situation are meaningless, that magic word "third period" is the all-powerful, most convincing explanation. When somebody dares to suggest timidly that it was exactly this kind of tactics that Lenin ridiculed so convincingly in his pamphlet on the trade unions or his book on infantile sickness, the answer is that Lenin did not write it in the third period.

What is left for the members to discuss? How much remains within the limits of "legal expression"? Evidently not a single issue, where the matter of principles or tactics is involved. The result is very lamentable. Policies are handed down from the top, nobody dares to express his disagreement openly, but the indifference nevertheless accumulate and express themselves in the passivity and apathy on the part of Party members.

Meetings Unattended

This is evidenced in every sphere of party life. The most important meetings are not attended, work assigned is not carried out, and whatever is done is achieved by the threat of expulsion. And the members do not want to be expelled. They are staying inside the Party and waiting for "better days" to come. All the letters sent out to the Party members calling for the most insignificant meeting, carry with them the warning that if the comrade does not attend he will be called before the control commission. And, by the way, this is now the busiest institution in the Party. The control commission, created originally for the curbing of bureaucratic abuses by the apparatus, has long forgotten its original aim, and become a whip against "heresy" and for spurring up activity by threats.

To cite some examples of this passivity: At the last general fraction meeting of the needle trades at which the future of the union was discussed there was no more than one eighth of the members present. This is the statement made by the chairman, Benjamin. Out of 550 Party members listed in the building trades, there were no more than 55 members present at the last general fraction meetings. I cite these examples because that is where the bulk of the New York membership is. This is the eloquent manner in which the members participate in the Party discussion and Party life in general. —B.T.

anti-Soviet bloc and nothing else. These political bankrupts are reducing the Communist movement, as comrade Trotsky puts it, to the role of a frontier guard.

A Tearful Appeal

The Berlin session of the executive committee of the Second International has just issued an appeal to the Russian workers. Its warmth should melt a stone. Messrs. Bauer, Hillquit, Mueller, Vandervelde, Longuet and MacDonald are perturbed by the Russian situation and appeal to the Soviet proletariat to preserve their revolutionary honor and achievements... by giving democracy a chance. The appeal should have been concrete and proposed Herr Comrade Zoergel for Moscow Chief of Police, the Honorable Comrade Thomas for Minister of Labor, and the Most Honorable Ramsay MacDonald as Premier. Then the Russian workers would know what democracy looks like. It should be emphasized that the Second International is concerned with the welfare of the poor Russian slave of the Bolshevik autocracy—so concerned, in fact that it "forgot" to appeal to the British and Indian workers to overthrow the government of comrade MacDonald which is shooting them full of social democratic lead. Just an oversight, we presume.

In the Factories

A Letter From Moscow

We are informed from Moscow:

At the factory committee elections of the metal workers, the following demands were put forth: genuine and not bureaucratic elections, genuine self-criticism. Various crafts brought up demands for wage increases, improvement of the food, and an increase in the allotment. These demands arise spontaneously and nobody leads the movement. Alongside of this, there is evident an increase in counter-revolutionary moods. In connection with the "one-man command" there is sharp dissatisfaction. It often rises to the surface. At the "Red Rubber Plant the worker came out at the conference in the name of a whole group, with a demand to limit the rights of the managers and foremen. As is customary, this group was raked over the coals and denounced as lazy, trouble-makers, etc., and they were expelled, some from the Party, some from the unions and some from both. In the Butyrki prison, there are about 200 of our comrades (Oppositionists). —L.

Our National Tour

New York Begins with a Successful Meeting

Despite the threatening weather and brief rain, close to three hundred New York workers filled the Labor Temple on May 15 to hear comrade Max Shachtman report on the revolutionary movement in Europe, the International Conference of the Left Opposition in Paris, and his visit to comrade L.D. Trotsky in Turkey. The meeting was the first since Shachtman's return from Europe, and it led off the national tour which has been arranged by the Communist League branches throughout the country.

Speaks on Five Year Plan

The speaker gave a detailed picture of the present critical situation in the Soviet Union and the viewpoint of comrade Trotsky, as well as an account of the big step forward taken by the Left Opposition at its International Conference in Paris. His analysis of the status and prospects of the Five Year Plan was attentively followed by the whole audience, which included numerous Party members and Lovestonites.

Questions were asked and answered and an interesting discussion took place. One Party member who made the usual "exposure of Trotskyism" was effectively answered from the platform.

During his remarks, the chairman, comrade Cannon, issued a challenge to the Lovestone faction, which has suddenly become the champion of open discussion to a public debate of the principle questions in dispute in the Communist movement. Considerable literature was sold and a collection of over $30.00 taken.

Mass meetings on the same subject are being arranged in other cities, and the schedule of the tour is printed below. Halls and addresses will be filled in as soon as local arrangements are made:

After the May Day Meeting in Boston

BOSTON—

The First of May demonstration of the Communist party in Boston was quite well attended but proved that the big crowd of 25,000 on March 6 was a curiosity, excitement-seeking crowd gathered as a result of the shouting of the capitalist press that a big fight was expected on the Common between the police and the Communists. While the police still kept up their idiotic preparation for an uprising (claiming that they were guarding all important places like the telephone exchange, railroad stations, etc.) the papers did not feature the First of May on the front page. Thus only the regular crowd of 3,000 to 5,000 people, which the Communists usually can gather, came—this time in somewhat larger numbers because of the present unemployment.

Harry Cantor, just released from Deer Island was the main speaker. His eight months martyrdom was not played up at all. While one speaker dramatically pointed out the sufferings of a person at Deer Island even during the fifteen minute period, he did not think it necessary to say that the chairman suffered there for the last eight months. Obviously, since the Stephens affair, the Party does not want to push Harry Cantor too much. They probably do not know whether they really can trust Cantor. It seems no one trusts another any more in the Party.

The smaller number of people at this demonstration perhaps helped to cure the Party members of their grandiose illusions which the March 6 demonstration developed to such a dangerous degree. Then they "saw" 50,000 people where average people could see only 15 and 20,000. They claimed 25,000 marching on the streets of Boston where my eyes could see only 200. They reported to the Daily Worker the next day (see March 7 issues) that a fight was going on on the Common "but the workers are still holding the Common"—which is a huge joke to every Bostonian.

This time, they claimed 15,000 around the bandstand. This is not so grossly exaggerated; a comrade well used to large crowds estimated it as 5,000 and those marching from the bandstand to the Charles Street Mall as 2,000 to 3,000 while the Daily Worker claimed 5,000. The differences between imaginary numbers and real ones are not as striking as on March 6. So the comrades of the Party are learning.

A meeting of the executive committee of Boston and nearby branches of the Independent Workmen's Circle was called last Tuesday to evaluate the results of the fight with the Stalinists who had left the organization to start their own Sick Benefit organization. Their boast was that they would take half of the members with them. Up to the present time about 1200 or 1400 have left the I. W. C.—that is, about one seventh of the membership—and some of these have returned already.

As one of the speakers I pointed out that we should not have been fooled by the slogan taken by the Stalinists, that this is a fight of the Lefts against the Rights. Many comrades were misled by it. It was really a fight of the Communist party officials against a Left wing organization, a foolish, childish fight for they only alienated people who had always supported them. In trying to get mechanical control over a Left wing organization, they made instead an enemy of it. We are the same Left wingers; we believe in revolutionary class struggle; we are for the dictatorship of the proletariat; we all are supporting Soviet Russia; we are against the Party only on the ground of its tactics. Otherwise we will keep up our Left wing work. Hearty applause from the majority of the executives present proved that I expressed their views.

There was a time when Branch 18, I. W. C., was entirely under mechanical Party rule. Trotskyists like myself could not speak there. Now, after losing nine or ten members, Branch 18 invited me as speaker for the May Day celebration. This is significant in proving how the Communist Party has lost valuable ground.

Comrade Schlossburg was invited to speak on May 1 for Branch 27, I. W. C. —A.K.

workers. It dances and leaps to the tunes changed each year by the Stalinist group in the movement to suit its narrow factional interests.

A Zig-Zagging Leadership

The needle trades Left wing leadership has been most prominent in executing these zig-zags. At one moment, it seeks united fronts with Sigman or Ninfo; the next moment, it vents its spite upon Sigman by denouncing the workers whom he still deludes (or who follow him for any other reason) as "social fascists" with whom it will have nothing at all to do. At one moment, it lets golden opportunities go by without forming its own Left wing union, for fear of making the Right wing bureaucrats angry; the next moment, it seeks to make up for lost time and blunders by artificially forcing events and creating "unions" where there is no basis at all for them.

All of these changes, which occur with increasing frequency, are decided bureaucratically, behind the scenes, upon arbitrary command from above, without relation to the realities of the struggle. It is precisely because of the purely administrative nature of these changes and the fact that they do not correspond to the needs of the struggle, that each change leaves the workers more bewildered. The workers are not chessmen that can be moved about unresistingly by "master" strategists. The result of these zig-zags, therefore, is that the workers are alienated from the movement, becoming a prey to the Right wing demagogues or falling into indifference and passivity. That is what has happened particularly in the needle trades Left wing movement.

Another factor of enormous importance is the cancer of corruption (we do not refer here, necessarily, to financial corruption) and bureaucratism. For shallow-minded observers and similar Johnstones, these are accidental and personal phenomena which can be wiped out by simply denouncing them. Unfortunately, the matter is not so simple. They are the natural twin products of that very regime which the Johnstones personify and defend. Why? Because to carry out a zig-zag policy which the workers would not accept of their own accord, it is necessary to have bureaucrats who will execute orders from above even against the interests and wishes of the ranks. Not the "deviations" from Stalinist policy produce bureaucratism, but the policy itself. And bureaucratism goes hand in hand with corruption and degeneration. Bureaucratism is a synonym for mutual factional protection.

Could there be a crasser expression of this than Johnstone's article, in which (by silence) he condones in the Party leaders of the Left wing union the same deeds for which he condemns Lovestoneite leaders? The knowledge that "loyalty to the line" means a grant of automatic immunity from above, is the greatest incentive to corruption. That is the theory and practice of Stalinism, and the Left wing, which gained its strength in the fight against the bureaucracy of the Right wing must immediately purge itself of the same malady before it is rendered impotent.

There is no absolute preventive for bureaucratism; but there are some excellent guarantees against it. Workers democracy is one of them. But it does not exist in the Needle Trades Industrial Union any more than it does in the other unions controlled by the Stalinists, because its existence is incompatible with their domination.

The absence of workers democracy is notorious in the N. T. W. I. U. The rank and file worker does not feel at home in the union meetings. An atmosphere of terror has been created so that when a workers rises to make the slightest criticism he is forthwith deluged with cries of "Trotskyite, Lovestoneite, Sigmanite, scab, renegade, disrupter," and the dozens of others in the choice collection of the modern Left wing bureaucrats.

The Party bureaucrats in the unions devote their greatest attention to keeping every post—no matter how important—tightly in their own hands. The worker, sympathetic to Communism though he may be, is made to feel that he can have no say in the work or the directing of the work unless he is a Party member—and sometimes unless he is a member of a particular Party faction! The methods and system of Party organization, already narrowed down out of all legitimate proportions, are automatically transferred into the union, which the Party rules like an imperialist dependency.

Re-Establish Workers Democracy

The re-establishment of workers democracy in the Left wing is an imperative preliminary to any forward step. The Left wing union must be returned to the control of the membership. The Communists and their Party must become the guide, the advisor of the union and cease to be a taskmaster armed with a pistol and a lash. A continuation of the present high-handed, autocratic, brutal Party methods in the trade unions must lead inevitably to a repetition of the situation in the French C.G.T.U. (red trade unions) where a rebellion has set in not only against the Party, but (so far as some elements are concerned, at least) against Communism as such. The French situation, in which the pure "syndicalists" are profiting by the crude blunders of official Communism should be a warning to the comrades here.

Workers democracy in the needle trades Left wing is no abstract question that can be postponed for some other time; it is an urgent, unpostponable issue involving the life and death of the organization. But its achievement—let this not be lost sight of for a moment—is conditioned upon a relentless struggle against that very bureaucracy which came into existence by abolishing workers democracy. There can be no half-measures in this necessary struggle.

To make a machine function properly—and a trade union is one of the workers machines in the class struggle—one must know how and where to direct it. It is necessary to make all the parts of this machine work smoothly and in proper relation to each other—the party and the union, the leadership and the masses. The problem in the needle trades Left wing—after the attainment of this proper coordination we spoke of above (fight against bureaucracy, corruption, for workers democracy, etc., etc.)—is to know how and where to direct this machine, that is, what policies the Left wing must pursue in order to win the workers to its side.

The essence of the problem to be solved by the Left wing in this respect is, first, to win back the workers over whom the Right wing has established its control, and secondly, to organize those workers who are outside of both the Right and Left wing unions.

Organize the Unorganized

One of the most powerful slogans, one with which the Left wing grew strong in the eyes of the workers, was the organization of the unorganized. In New York (which is typical), the MAJORITY of the needle trades workers (with the possible exceptions of the men's clothing workers) are UNORGANIZED. They are among the most exploited in the industry; they work under conditions most closely approximating the old sweat shops. It is primarily the task of the Left wing to organize these workers.

The fact of the existence of these tens of thousands of unorganized workers who do not follow the Right wing and will not be organized by it, is already sufficient answer to any tendencies in the Left wing (and there are such tendencies) to liquidate the Left wing union and filter back into the Schlesinger union to function there solely as a minority group. These tendencies to easy surrender, which are nourished by the paralysis of the present leadership and the feeling of hopelessness it creates, cannot be successfully combatted by administrative decree, or theses. They must be revealed as wrong by demonstrating IN WORK AND STRUGGLE that there remains a broad foundation for the existence and development of the Left wing union.

The difficulty of organizing these workers—depressed by previous defeats—need not be underestimated. That is true. But it is also true that they form an enormous reservoir of strength for the Left wing. They will not be organized over night, or by sensational, short-lived "campaigns". But persistent, steady activity will do it, provided that these workers are approached on the basis of a concrete struggle against their sweat-shop conditions and not on the basis of abstract slogans translated literally from the latest Molotov thesis.

They can be organized if the approach to them is based, not on the sectarian policies now dominating the Left wing, not on the virtual demand that every worker recognize the leadership of the Communist Party, but on the united front of the organized revolutionary workers with the progressive and even backward workers who want a union that really fights the bosses.

Organize the Right Wing Workers

The policy of organizing (not talking about it on paper, but really organizing) the unorganized workers for struggle (not putches, not two day strikes for the record, but real struggle) inseparable from the job of mobilizing the workers in the Right wing union for the same purpose—a job that can be accomplished only in battle against Schlesinger and Co. and their class collaboration.

There are thousands of militant workers today registered with the Right wing who were with the Left wing yesterday. They are working in many instances under virtual check-off conditions, i. e., no dues to Schlesinger? no job in the shop! The Right wing established control over them by its connivance with the employers and with the aid of the Left wing's blockheaded blunders.

It goes without saying that the Right wing has not improved their conditions, that there is great dissatisfaction among these workers, that it is possible to organize them for a fight against the joint forces of the bosses and their labor agents. In the majority of cases these workers have not ceased to be militants and Left wingers; many of them were simply compelled to register with the Right. The policy of the Left wing union makes it impossible to win them back. Its slogan is simply: Stop paying dues to Schlesinger and join the N. T. W. I. U. Naturally, this slogan has not yet registered a single success.

Out of some stupid fetish, the official Left wing has till now refused to organize the militant elements in the Right wing union for a struggle. This policy—or rather lack of policy—must be dumped overboard. It is good for nothing at all. The Left wing must immediately proceed to organize its minorities in the Right wing union, and on the basis of the daily needs of the workers which the Schlesingers so cynically disregard, mobilize a force for the disruption of the boss-controlled union and the recruitment of the workers now in it for the Left wing. An intelligent program, fitted to the needle trades workers needs, can succeed in mobilizing them for a fight—and a fight against the bosses means a fight against Schlesinger.

The workers want unity. They want to fight when there is a possibility of success. They can see none in the narrow, academic policy of the Left wing. The plank to bridge the gap between the small organized Left wing union and the thousands in the Right wing union is the united front. More than six months ago, before Johnstone was awakened by Lozovsky's prodings and the need to find a scapegoat, we wrote in the Militant (November 1, 1929) in connection with the Right wing cloak strike:

"The Left wing can make headway, and regain the strength and influence it enjoyed in 1926 and 1927, if it knows how to approach the Right wing worker, how to work for a united front. It must challenge Schlesinger and Co. openly to up-the divided ranks of the workers. It must work for joint action, joint committees in the shops. The Schlesingers and Dubinskys will expose themselves sufficiently in their actions during the struggle, but only if the Left wing shows its readiness to work side by side with the Right wing worker."

This proposal was rejected at that time by the Left wing; it paid for that by further losses. Long after the fact, Johnstone attempts a similar criticism, but he proposes nothing for the future. Our proposal then holds good in essence today and for the next period.

The United Front

The official Left wing theory of the Right wing workers as "social fascists" automatically excludes the idea of a united front on a minimum platform of struggle. The theory is false; it is also good for nothing at all—except to demonstrate the theoretical poverty of Stalinism—and must be rejected. The tactic of the united front is not a cement to unite the leaders of the Left wing and the Right the Parcells and the Tomskys—that is the perversion of the united front; the united front can be a knife cutting the masses still following the Right wing loose from their misleaders. Properly utilized, this knife can become a powerful weapon in the hands of the Left wing. Lightly thrown aside, as the official Left wing has done it leaves the Right wing bureaucrats just that much greater predominance of weapons.

The superficial argument that the I. L. G. W. is a "company union" is not worth a penny. That is the attitude of Mr. William Green towards out-and-out company unions: "We will have nothing to do with them!" That is, we will not fight the bosses for the workers they dominate. The Left wing, by its argument, says: "We will not fight Schlesinger for the workers he dominates. Let them come to us or be damned eternally in hell as social fascists."

The philosophical idealist believes the world of reality to be a mere reflection of man's ideas. The third period chiefs of the needle trades Left wing (and, for that matter, the whole Party-controlled Left wing) seem to believe that the world of reality can be made to act in conformity with their abstract, pre-conceived blue-prints, drawn up without any relation to life and struggle and facts. The Left wing must learn to look at facts, disconcerting and inconvenient as they may be, and to "proceed from that which is."

No program, irrespective of its excellence, can settle the difficulties over night; the Left wing cannot so easily pay off the debts it has accumulated through a series of past blunders and defeats. Still, the serious crisis in the N. T. W. I. U., which threatens the whole future of the Left wing movement, demands a profound and free discussion—not the contemptible, bureaucratic "revelations" of the Johnstones. The Johnstones, Golds and the rest, cannot lead such a discussion, for it means their own downfall. Therefore they prohibit it. Therefore, it must be held in spite of them. And that not only in the needle trades, but in every other industrial union controlled—and undermined—by the Stalinists. That is the need of the moment. That is the job of the rank and file of the Left wing. The future of the movement is at stake.

The Militant invites Left wing needle trades workers to write for its columns on the situation in the union and to give their views on the problems of their movement. Articles written in any language will be translated into English and printed. The Daily Worker is the closed organ of the cynical bureaucrats—the Militant aims to become the voice of the militant rank and file.

NEW YORK—The growing drive against Communist propaganda reached a climax in February and March when nearly 800 were arrested in unprecedented police attacks, reports the American Civil Liberties Union.

An Open Letter to the Members of the C. P. S. U. (b)

By L. D. TROTSKY

Dear Comrades:

The present letter is promoted by a feeling of the greatest anxiety over the future of the Soviet Union and the destinies of the proletarian dictatorship. The policy of the present leadership, that is, of the narrow group of Stalin, is leading the country at full speed towards the most dangerous crisis and the worst catastrophes.

Everything that served for years to combat the Opposition, under the pretext that it would not admit it—the question of the “smychka,” a correct policy towards the peasant,—has suddenly been forgotten, or rather transformed into its opposite. The most elementary principles of Marxism are trampled under foot. This has been particularly marked in the question of collectivization. Under the direct effect of the purely administrative measures in 1928 and 1929, in the struggle for bread, the collectivization has attained proportions that nobody had ever foreseen and which find no justification in the real state of the means of production. From that flows without fail the perspective of the collapse of most of the kolkhoz, the institution of profound internal dissensions and the endangering for a long time of the productive forces of rural economy which are already so diminished for the moment.

Kulak and Kolkhoz

But even the minority of kolkhoz that have vitality, while constituting incontestable progress, is not yet equivalent to “socialism.” With their present means of production and the conditions of market economy that accompany them, the kolkhoz will unfailingly cease to emerge from their ranks a new layer of peasant-exploiters. The destruction of the Kulak class outside of the kolkhoz is not only powerless to revive the economic progress of the peasant class but it is not even able to prevent the birth of the Kulak inside the kolkhoz. This truth will be demonstrated primarily in the arts that achieve the best economic successes. By proclaiming that the kolkhoz are socialist enterprises, the present leadership furnishes by that very fact an excellent camouflage for the Kulaks within the kolkhoz. It goes without saying that it doesn't do this deliberately but the misfortune is that its whole policy has always been that way: it thinks of nothing, foresees nothing dragging behind the tail of events and flinging itself from one extreme into the other.

To back up technically, no matter how little, the “generalized” collectivization, one is now forced to augment sharply the production program for agricultural implements. But this production depends in turn upon a series of other industrial branches. The plan of production, without this, had already reached a very high degree of tension. Even admitting that the new production program for agricultural implements could be realized—which is far from certain—the present tempo of collectivization will still exceed considerably the material possibilities.

One must never lose sight of the fact that the collectivization was not born out of a broad test that should have been made of the superiorities of collective economy over individual economy, but exclusively of administrative measures in the struggle for bread. These measures, in turn, were necessitated by the defective economic policy towards the poor peasant and towards the Kulak. It is true that the fundamental difficulties of socialist construction are outside the power of the leadership. They lie in the impossibility of establishing the socialist society in a single country, which is, moreover, a particularly backward country. But that is precisely why one must demand of the leadership a clear understanding of all the factors of evolution, and to know how to determine in time what lies within the realm of the possible and of the impossible. Within these limits, the realization of certain successes on the road of socialist construction is a perfectly possible thing, particularly the maintenance of the dictatorship of the proletariat up to the time of the revolutionary victory in the advanced countries. Unfortunately the Centrist leadership shows a fatal incapacity not only in evaluating exactly the internal resources of the dictatorship but to grasp their interdependence upon the active forces

The first five year plan elaborated in 1925 foresaw a growth of industry from 9 to 10 percent per year. Under the pressure of the criticisms of the Opposition based on the living experience of facts, the five year plan was completely revised and the co-efficient of growth raised to 20 percent. But from that moment on, the leadership, taking alarm at its own spirit of indecision, no longer knew any restraint. Behind the prescribed tempos were verified by experience, before the first successes were guaranteed, before the conditions of the workers were improved, the Stalinist leadership launched the new slogan: “The five year plan in four years!”

At the same time, the production program for agricultural implements adopted a still more accelerated tempo. As for the collectivization of the small peasant holdings which constituted, by themselves, the most dangerous and slowest task—it left far behind it all the other economic problems. As has frequently happened in history, “chvostism” (being at the tail of events) gave way directly to its opposite—adventurism. But never before had this metamorphosis attained such a scale. And above all, never before had the historical stake been so important, namely: the very fate of the October revolution.

The Threatening Crisis

Economics cannot be violated. The accelerated pace which outstrips the existing possibilities soon leads to the creation of imaginary resources where there are no real ones. That bears the name of paper money inflation. All the symptoms of it already there and they are, at the same time the symptoms of a threatening economic crisis. Before it reaches its explosive form it is already pressing heavily upon the daily existence of the masses, causing a rise in prices or preventing their reduction.

The problem of the distribution of the revenues of the collectives between the immediate daily needs and the needs of accumulation, that is, of an extended production, constitutes the basic problem of socialist construction, a problem intimately bound up with that of the mutual relations between the working class and the peasantry as well as between the different layers within the peasant class itself. These problems cannot be solved a priori, that is, bureaucratically. It is a matter of the daily life of the masses, and these masses themselves must have the possibility to bring “correctives” to the economic programs a priori. That is the place where the economic questions are indissolubly welded to those of the Party regime, the trade unions and the Soviets.

As has already been said, the fundamental causes for the existing contradictions are inherent in the state of isolation of the Soviet Union.

But instead of attenuating them, the policy of the present leadership only accentuates them. There is a basic defeat in the whole economic plan. This plan should have had its aim to consolidate the dictatorship of the proletariat and its union with the peasant class with the aid of adequate and internally harmonized economic tempos, based on the estimate of the vital necessities of the masses in the present period which is a period of preparation and transition, and that up to the next stage on the road of the world revolution. Instead of this, the plan set itself an un-realizable, utopian and economically reactionary aim, namely: to profit by our backward situation and our poverty in order to construct “in the briefest time” an isolated, independent socialist society. Previously, it had considered that this task was realizable only at a “snail's pace” (Bucharin). Now, the leadership, fleeing the inconveniences of the prolonged delays rushes headlong at a “mad gallop” (the same Bucharin, restored).

In the name of adventurist tempos, worse cadences vary in the very course of execution, which they have not even troubled to harmonize or to check up, and which often undermine each other, the workers' strength suffers the most violent pressure at the very moment when the existence level of the working classes is manifestly being depressed. The abrupt leaps of the industrialization lower the quality of the products which in turn rebound at the expense of the consumer and endangers tomorrow's production.

That is how on the plan for industry, as well as on that of rural economy or that of finances, the present leadership is leading the country to painful crises and political catastrophes.

At the very moment these lines are written, the first signs reach us of the retreat that has just been begun. First an article by Stalin, then a new circular of the Central Committee. Caught in the claws of additional contradictions for which he bears the direct responsibility, Stalin, generous with words, warns against the “dizziness from success,” his wisdom reducing itself to remarking that one should not collectivize what is only fit for “back-yard poultry.” That's just where the trouble is! As though the utopian-reactionary character of the “generalized collectivization” held only because of the fact of a premature collectivization of domestic fowls and not at all of having wanted to force the creation of large farms while lacking the technical bases which alone could have assured the predominance of these large farms over the small ones.

The Stalinist Retreat

The circular of the Central Committee already goes much further than Stalin's article. In retreat, just as in offensive, the Centrist leadership unfailingly drags along behind the tail of organic processes and their repercussion in the apparatus. After the “collectivization” had embraced—only within a few months of time!—more than half of the peasant class, the leaders suddenly perceived that the “well-known (!) recommendation of Lenin is being violated” concerning the indispensable character of the free distribution that must preside over all socialization. The circular at the same time profits by the occasion presented to accuse the “executors” of having equally violated “the code of the artel of rural economy” published by the Central Executive Committee. Now this code appeared only quite recently, that is, after the collectivization had already embraced more than fifty percent of the peasants' holdings. And moreover, this code—something far more important—is full of contradictions and gaps because it deliberately ignores all differentiation among the collectivized peasants, presenting matters as if outside of the especially excluded Kulaks, the remainder of the peasant class constituted a homogeneous mass. The whole policy of collectivization amounts to the policy of the ostrich. The circular of March 15 charges the unfortunate “executors” with all the mortal sins up to treating them (in the name of the Central Committee!) as “dangerous zealots,” thus shifting “rudely and disloyally,” as is the custom, the mistakes of the leadership on to the inferior agents who took seriously the “logan of the liquidation of the classes ‘in the briefest time’.” After the impotent and gross circular of March 15 the unlucky “executors,” and following them, the entire Party, find themselves definitely driven into an impasse. And now? More than half of the immense peasant ocean is already socialized. What share in this result falls upon the “dangerous zealots?” Five percent or is it forty? In other words, does the character of the collectivization accomplished, seen as a whole, rest upon an economic or a purely bureaucratic foundation? The circular does not reply to this fundamental question. Yet the reply is not only obvious but merciless for the “general line” of the leadership.

But the retreat will not halt at these first manifestations, not in the field of economic policy any more than in relation to the internal life of the Party. This time blindness of the leadership has been demonstrated outwardly in too striking a manner. The Party will have to stand the gaff. The de-Kulakization, the collectivization in mass, the bureaucratic transformation of the artels into communes—all these processes, still encouraged yesterday without any restraint, are today checked in full swing. Of course, a diplomatic and administrative maneuver can sometimes assume a character of brutality; but abrupt turns reverberating to the vital foundations of 25,000,000 peasant holdings and flinging them Left to Right for a whole year cannot pass with impunity for the Party. Short-sighted Centrist and bureaucratic adventurism will come out of this experience irremediably compromised.

A correct policy in the U. S. S. R. is conceivable only in harmony with an international policy of the proletarian vanguard. The leadership of the Communist International has fallen to a much lower level than the leadership of the Russian Communist Party.

The Theory of the “Third Period”

Since 1923, the Communist International has not rid itself of its tragic ways which undermine the organization and weaken its influence upon the working class. Dragging at the tail of events and stumbling each time against their echoes, the leadership of the C. I. for these seven years has constantly had an opportunist policy during the phases of revolutionary high tide and a policy of putchism during the phases of ebb tide. The most recent years, after the Chinese revolution had been lost thanks to the leadership of Stalin-Bucharin, after the saboteurs of English trade unionism had succeeded with the aid of the blind bureaucracy of Moscow, in stamping down the uprising of the revolutionary masses, the leadership of the C. I. has proclaimed the event of the “third period” as a period of direct revolutionary struggle. Since then, that is for two years, the aspect of world revolution has been systematically falsified by deforming it in the spirit required by “the third period”. Revolutionary policy reposing upon the real state of the class struggle gives way to a policy of fireworks.

Now it happens that the years of follies of the C. I. were the years of the reinforcement of the social democracy. A new generation of workers had come forward; a generation that did not live through the treason of the social democracy during the war, but which has, on the other hand, known the indecision of the Communist Parties during these six or seven years. Hoping to attract this whole mass and to kill two birds with one stone, the Sixth Congress adopted the theory of “social fascism”. As if one could conquer the power of the enemy by means of magic formulae.

In resolving to confuse the democratic bodyguard, the C. I. has rendered the social democracy a signal service. In the countries where fascism presents a real force, such as Italy, then Austria and Germany, the social democracy has not found it very difficult to show the masses not only the difference but the antagonism that there is between it and fascism. By the same token, it absolves itself from showing that it is not the democratic servant of capitalism. The whole political struggle is thus transposed to an artificial plane, and that to the greatest profit to the social democracy.

Having thus erected a wall between it and the social democratic masses, the Communist bureaucracy has in actuality ceased all struggle against the social democracy, reducing its task to tumultuous mobilizations of that small working class minority over which Communist influence extends. That is what the “Red Days” serve for.

The work within the trade unions is invested with the same character. Referring to the indubitable necessity of utilizing the economic conflicts for revolutionizing the masses and preparing the general strike and uprising, the Communist bureaucracy, under the lash of the theory of the “Third Period”, applies an adventurist tactic which can lead only to defeats. The study of the concrete conditions of the struggle by strikes gives way to quotations taken from the latest directives... from Manuilsky or Molotov. The political utilization (the “polittization”) of strikes is most frequently reduced to substituting sham slogans behind the back of the disoriented masses. For the Party bureaucracy, above all other prob-

How Does Italian Fascism Stand Today?

Many facts, of an international character as well as of one specific to the internal situation in the country, put the Italian crisis, the crisis of the fascist regime in Italy on the order of the day. Among the facts of an internal order, there is a whole series of movements characterizing the awakening of the masses and a new disposition on their part to fight. In the field of international facts, must be considered in the first place the Spanish events in connection with the fall of Primo de Rivera. The difference existing between the two dictatorships has already been remarked upon: between the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, born of a "pronunciamento" of military juntas in a country that is among the least economically developed and where the weight of old feudal elements is still very tangible; and the dictatorship of the Black Shirts, born of a long period of civil war between bourgeoisie and proletariat, and leaning upon a movement of petty bourgeois masses.

The Class Character of Fascism

Yet up to now there has never ceased to be a discussion on the character of the fascist dictatorship in Italy. For the parties of the bourgeois anti-fascist concentration, which has its seat in Paris, fascism is, in general, a phenomenon above the classes, to be studied in the cabinets of psycho-analysts (Labriola); a morbid phenomenon having its origins in the psychosis of war (Nitti); a deviation, a degeneration from the normal paths of capitalism (Treves and Co., the emigrated social democratic chiefs being still desirous of seasoning their analysis with a bit of sweetened Marxism). Others again have wanted to apply the term of Caesarism to fascism (it is even said that Bucharin, fascinated by such an analogy, once had the idea of writing a book on fascism from this point of view). But the only correct method for the understanding and analysis of fascism is always the method that Marx taught us: the method of having the class struggle at its basis and applying itself to the conditions in which the class struggle develops in modern times.

Viewed from this historical angle, fascism is only the dictatorship of Italian capitalism in its present phase. Like every definition of fascism, this one naturally also gives only the essential content: the class content. The fascist movement is not a simple, a homogeneous one. Its line of development from its origin till today, has been in the direction of the defense of lems there is primarily the problem of staying in power. The grosser its errors, the hastier it is to transpose its methods of internal Party struggle to the field of the trade union movement, consolidating for a certain time its positions in the apparatus as compensation for those it has lost in the masses.

The official press, and principally the Moscow Pravda, leads its readers into error concerning the real situation within the C. I. Nevertheless the facts are there. At the present moment, when the commercial and industrial crisis create anew a great instability of capitalist relations, socially and internationally, we see that the Communist Parties are weakened, internally disorganized, without confidence in the leadership and without the faith of the masses in the slogans of the C. I.

The gravest thing is that under the cover of "self-criticism", there has been instituted in the C. I. as much as in the C. P. S. U., a disastrous regime of servile adulation before all the zig-zags of the "general line" concocted by a group of irresponsible functionaries.

The Right wing of Communism, which directs the openly opportunist elements (Brandler, Louis Sellier, Lovestone, Jilek, Roy, etc.) who, only yesterday, were joined with Stalin in his blind fury against the Left, succeed in enrolling many revolutionary workers misled by the nefarious adventurism of the official policy. But the number of worker-Communists who fall finally into the most complete indifference is still greater.

capitalist profit and the rabid struggle against the revolutionary movement of the working class; but the stages traversed by fascism in its development are different, and each of its stages corresponds to a different moment in the development of the class struggle and the social relations of hostile forces: bourgeoisie and proletariat. These stages can be fixed about as follows:

1. Up to the occupation of the factories (September 1920), the epoch when the revolutionary wave reached its culminating point. At its beginning, fascism is a melange of combative spirit, or "arditism". It still is, so to speak, an organization of cadres, limited to the cities and composed in its majority former "arditi", former war volunteers, mutilated soldiers and demobilized officers. Its first activities against the working class are "razzias", surprise actions organized with the aid and complicity of the liberal State. (The governmental measure assuring the cadres of the fascio is a decree that bears the signature of a social reformist minister: Bonomi; it is the decree which provides for the support of demobilized officers in service activity at state expense.) In this period, the workers' movement is still too strong to be openly tackled even by the State forces. (Giolitti, instead of entering into conflict with the workers entrenched in the factories, prefers to let the social reformists operate so as to have a reason for occupying the factories). The force used by the bourgeoisie in this acute period of the class struggle to maneuver against the working class is principally the social democracy which, by the aid it brings the bourgeoisie in its struggle against the working class blazes the trail for fascism.

2. The second stage of fascism, the stage of "squadriste" and "camionnisme" (assaults by armed squads mounted on military carriages), the stage that prepares the March on Rome, opens with the beginning of the defeat of the working class (defeat of the factory occupations).

Of all fascism's stages, this one is the bloodiest. On the countryside a veritable civil war develops. The liberal state, the old liberal state, throws off its stifling legality; it organizes, supports and protects the illegal violence of the fascist bands.

In this second stage, fascism is no longer only an organization of armed bands: the defeat of the workers' and revolutionary movement in Italy—due to the internal defects of the proletarian movement and principally to the lack of an organized party of the revolution—has as its result the driving into the arms of fascism of important layers of peasantry (farmers, small proprietors) whose sympathy had been progressively alienated from the socialist party as much because of the wrong policy of "land socialization" as because of its tactic which set against it the various categories of agricultural laborers, instead of endeavoring above all to realize a political alliance between the latter and the small peasants. Coming to increase still more the ranks of the fascio, are the demobilized and jobless petty bourgeoisie, the tradesmen hampered in their business by the socialist cooperatives, and also, to a weak extent, workers frustrated in their attempt at revolution.

The Period of Civil War

Crisis of the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie; the defeat of the revolutionary labor movement (September 1920): these are the conditions fascism profited by to develop.

It is precisely in this second stage that there took place what is called, the "ruralization" of fascism. Steel and fire assure the submission of the country to agrarian slavery. The cities—where the industrialists in their turn now pass over to lockouts, "purge" the factories of revolutionary workers, applying "their" fascism to them in the shops—remain isolated from the peasants. In 1921 and 1922—up till the march on Rome—the civil war is in full swing in the cities and villages of Italy.

And it is in the furnace of the civil war that the Communist Party is born and organized. Since the working class is forced to beat a retreat, the Communist Party of Italy has as its first task to organize the workers' line of resistance, in order to lead it later to the victory that escaped it in 1920. Bitter and difficult battle, ending in a new defeat of the working class that still remained too attached to maximalist Centrism and to social reformism whose policy at this epoch consists of preaching passivity and hoping for the liquidation of the fascist bands by the very ones that armed them: by the decomposing liberal state, by the monarchy, the industrialists, the large land owners.

If in the first stage of fascism what best characterizes the treason of the social reformists is their pact signed with Giolitti for the evacuation of the factories; in the second fascist stage, the treason of the socialist chieftains is called "the pacification pact" concluded with Mussolini.

A propos of this coup d'Etat, I will recall in passing the discussions that were held at the Fourth Congress of the Comintern, meeting in Moscow at the period of the march on Rome. Bordiga then denied the possibility of speaking of a coup d'Etat, expecting that it was always the same class remaining in power. "The bourgeoisie cannot make a coup d'Etat against itself," he said. And he was right. But the coup d'Etat of October, 1922 was not against the bourgeoisie. On the contrary, it was a coup d'Etat for the bourgeoisie, for the big banks, of big industry and big landowning, for the strengthening of the dictatorship of imperialist capital against the interests of the broad masses of the people. The march on Rome consequently marks the violent break with the old liberal and democratic forms, henceforth incompatible with the defense of capitalist profit; it means the establishment of the open dictatorship of capitalism, the creation of the industrial-agrarian-fascist governmental bloc under the direction of monopolistic capital.

The Bourgeoisie Behind Fascism

It is a fact that the social composition of the fascist movement has undergone important changes in the different epochs of its development. But it is an error to believe, as is done by Lo Stato Operaio, review of the Italian Communist Party, that fascism, at a given moment of its development—notably at the period preceding the march on Rome when the urban and rural petty bourgeoisie had a very clear predominance within the fascio—had for a certain period been an autonomous political movement of the petty bourgeois masses and that, as such, it could have conceived and realized a plan of its own for state conquest against the old directing groups. In reality such an error leads to attributing to the middle classes an initiative it hasn't got and which it can have even less of in the present period of the class struggle (domination of monopolistic capital, period of the proletarian revolution). This conception also violates the Marxist conception of the modern state, the organization of capitalist domination. They forget, in pursuing this error, the class which organizes and rules the apparatus of domination (the state); and they finish by seeing only the ruling political personnel of the organization of the state, a personnel which, on the contrary, can very well be recruited and hired by various processes and in various circles (fascism or social democracy, for instance), according to the degree of the class struggle and the relation of opposing forces. Besides, there must still be noted the confusion that exists between the class content (dictatorship of capitalism) and the forms that the organization of the dictatorship can assume in the different historical periods of the class struggle (liberal, parliamentary forms or fascist form).

To sum up: It is strictly correct to say that fascism has not been, at any moment of its development, an autonomous political movement, even if the petty bourgeoisie who formerly adhered to it and still do, were able to think and still think so today. (Many are the fascists convinced that Mussolini is conducting an independent policy at Rome). But the illusions of the petty bourgeoisie are not the reality. The reality is given in the relation of forces which hide behind these illusions. Since the birth of fascism, it is a fact that it has been raised and constantly guided by the ruling classes of the Italian state, by the bourgeoisie, by capitalism. The proof of it is that those who subsidized the first fascio (bankers, landowners, industrialists), are the same ones who later subsidized the march on Rome (Confederation of Industry, Commercial Bank, Agrarian Consortium, etc.).

In October 1922, the Italian bourgeoisie had thus realized all the political conditions for the march on Rome: defeat and dispersal of the labor movement; rupture of the contact between workers and peasants (isolation of the cities, of the country); anticipation and even resignation to the coup d'Etat by the democratic sections, Amedola, head of the liberal democracy, fascist victim who died abroad, had an attitude of support and encouragement for "the experiment of Mussolini" before the march on Rome). That is how Mussolini could reach Rome and take power without a blow being exchanged.

3. It is from this moment that the third and new stage of fascism must be considered. It is the stage of the realizations of imperialist capital; the stage of the ferocious policy of squeezing and despoiling the working masses for the accumulation of capitalist profits. It is the stage of industrial and banking concentration; of the development of big capital, of big industry and of the agrarian bourgeoisie.

These few remarks on the subject of fascism are, in our opinion, necessary as to allow a reply to the question we posed at the outset. By all that has preceded this, one sees that to reply to the question "How does the fascist dictatorship stand in Italy today?" signifies to analyze the elements of the situation permitting to define; first—how does the crisis of Italian capitalism and its fascist regime stand? and secondly—how do we stand with the formation of the revolutionary bloc of the workers and peasants?

That is what we will endeavor to determine in other articles.

A Stalinist Canard

The Daily Worker of May 13, 1930, publishes a story entitled "Trotskyite Tries It Out on 3 Dogs, But First on Labor", in which it declares that comrade James P. Cannon is a staff writer on the New York Telegram. The story was reprinted in the Freiheit. The "proof" for this contemptible canard is a story in the Telegram signed by one "James Cannon, New York Telegram Staff Writer". Needless to say, there is absolutely no relation between comrade Cannon and the Telegram reporter, a fact quite well known to the author of the lie, Earl Browder. The James Cannon of the Telegram is a fairly well known New York reporter whose stories have appeared for years, first in the "tabloid" New York Daily News and lately in the Telegram. The writers on the Worker and the Freiheit seem to think that anyone working for the capitalist press is a scoundrel. So far as they are concerned, they can affirm this from personal experience. Most of the Freiheit staff, for example, from Olgin up, received its training as Abe Cahan's office boys on the yellow socialist Forward. They are the proper people to practise filthy Brass Check journalism in the Stalinist press today.

We should suggest that the Daily Worker now print a story identifying comrade Cannon with Bishop James Cannon, Jr., of the Methodist church, and thereby prove that the Trotskyists are all Methodists, and agents of Herbert Hoover. Anyone who thinks the Daily Worker incapable even of this, does not know the infantile mind of Earl Browder, or has not yet plumbed the depths of Stalinist depravity.

The I. L. P.Saviors of Reformism

The detailed reports that have arrived about the Birmingham conference of the Independent Labor Party enable us to judge its decisions with greater accuracy. As the first cabled reports already indicated, its most important act was the decision to organize as an independent faction the "loyal" I. L. P. representatives in the House of Commons Labor Party group, with a program and a discipline separate from that of the Parliamentary Labor Party as a whole.

The Discrediting of Reformism

The reasons for this radical step will best characterize its significance. The second Labor Party government has been a fiasco not only from the point of view of the revolutionary working class, but from the point of view of reformism itself. So reactionary has been its course, so essentially similar to ordinary Tory regimes has it been, so nobly has it defended the empire on every occasion, that it has awakened the enmity of whole sections of the working class, or at least laid the basis for such an awakening.

"In ten months," said Allen Young, one of the delegates to the I. L. P. conference, "Mr. Thomas has done more to enthrone in autocratic power the financiers and bankers than the previous Tory administration in its four-and-a-half years, and had made intensely more difficult the tasks of future Socialist Governments". In the field of foreign affairs, the great pacifist MacDonald conclusively demonstrated that imperialist interests could be defended as well and as violently by him as by Chamberlain or Baldwin. At the Hague, Snowden roared for Britain's blood-money like a Shylock unleashed. At the London conference, MacDonald's ardor for "our naval supremacy" was indistinguishable under the microscope from that of Lord Grey's in India. Laborite machine guns fire precisely the same bullets as the Tory type. At home or abroad, for the miner of South Wales as for the Egyptian fellahin, the Laborite government has run up a record fully as black as any of its predecessors, so black indeed that even wet-nosed liberals of the New York Nation type have felt constrained to mew a mild protest.

The socialists in power are thus proceeding to accomplish one of their most important if not involuntary tasks: the destruction of working class faith in the efficacy of reformism. The I. L. P. conference decision is a reflection of this fact from two diametrically opposed directions.

First: it is a result of upward pressure from below, the demand from the ranks for a more militant and aggressive struggle against capitalism and its most willing lackey, the Labor Party. There are thousands of revolutionary workers in the I.L.P. who are moving towards Communism, confusedly and unconsciously, but nevertheless they are moving. The pressure they exercised on the Birmingham conference was a step in this direction. From the point of view of the ferment in the ranks, the Birmingham decision is unquestionably to be greeted as a reflection of a powerful molecular process.

Maxton as MacDonald's Saviour

Secondly: the decision is a result of downward pressure from above, the desire of the I. L. P. leaders to save the miserable face of reformism to set up a new wall against the forward march towards revolution of the workers who have been jolted out of their belief in reformism by the brutal realities of its treachery. Maxton, in his keynote speech, adequately showed that he was against the Communist movement because he is against the proletarian revolution, but against the Labor Party only because it brings discredit to, let us call it, intelligent reformism. Just as the Labor Party opposition to capitalist parties is developed rigidly within the frame-work of capitalism, so Maxton's opposition to MacDonald is with equal rigor confined to the limits of reformism. Maxton and Co. have set up a concentration camp two miles to the Left of the Labor Party, and two hundred miles to the Right of the proletarian revolution, in which to intern for as long a time as possible those workers who would otherwise have no obstacles on their road of march from disillusioning reformism to militant Communism. That does not make Maxton and his colleagues revolutionists, but rather the most skillful deceivers of the working class, the Swiss Guardsmen of reformism. In a word, from the point of view of the I. L. P. leaders (in contradistinction to the progressive ranks), Birmingham marked only a clever and temporary shift of front.

The Incapacity of the C. P.

Were there in England a Communist Party capable of understanding and action, instead of a sect that chases hopelessly after Third Period mirages, this capital situation could be utilized to the utmost for the revolutionary movement. But that is too much to expect of the Murphys and Rusts. British Communism nevertheless has an excellent opportunity to tear aside the contemptible tatter with which the new saviors of reformism have clothed themselves in an attempt to rig up in England a weak-tea imitation of their Austrian prototype, the professional capitulators to reaction. Maxton and his clique will never blaze the trail of revolution in England—it is not in their blood. But the British Communists can. They need only to unlearn Stalinism and learn Marx and Lenin.

The Fight for Harry Eisman

The ruling class has few scruples in its punishment of Communists. It picks from the ranks of fighters for the working class and hits with equal severity at all challenges to its rule. Now from the picket line, now from the Party, and it does not hesitate to send to its prisons even the "tender" youth. Harry Eisman, a member of the Young Pioneers has been sentenced to five years imprisonment in the Hawthorne Reformatory for participating in the March 6th unemployment demonstrations.

It Depends on Whose Holiday It Is

The ridiculous farce of the charge truancy against school children participating in working class holidays and demonstrations is quite apparent. Countless times throughout the year holidays are officially proclaimed by the authorities—flag day, decoration day, Lincoln's Birthday, etc. Here the students are turned loose into the streets and forced to sing and cheer the "Star Spangled" capitalist and land of the slave. The boy scouts camp fire girls, etc., are released from school almost any time the jingo militarists want to show their masters what gracious and valuable service they are rendering them.

But just let a working man's son or daughter walk out to demonstrate against unemployment and the storm breaks loose. Expulsion, terrorism, and even imprisonment awaits the working class children. The capitalist class knows well the phrase: "The youth is the hope of the future." All forces are brought into play to make this

UnemploymentA Capitalist Monstrosity

A study of the world-wide unemployment which faces the capitalists of all countries reveals some very interesting facts. Capitalism in its development has come face to face with a monster of its own creation, the monster of unemployment. The breakdown of the capitalist mode of production and distribution has come to be an awful and compelling truth. The worker is beginning to realize this, to realize that it is not a matter of the personal merits of public officials but that the cause is fundamental and that the true offender is nothing less than the system of class rule under which he is exploited.

But if the worker is beginning to have some faint conception of these things the capitalist class has a much clearer conception. They realize that not only have they no solution to the two problems which chiefly effect the lives of the vast majority of workers today, unemployment and low wages, but also that there is being established through the existence of these two legitimate, inevitable offspring of capitalism a real economic basis on which a revolutionary working class driven to desperation by hunger and starvation can unite.

Capitalism has no salvation to the problems of unemployment and low wages because (first) unemployment is caused by the fact that when the workers is employed he receives about one sixth of the product of his labor which in turn produces a huge surplus, an era of capitalist overproduction, so that the worker is turned out to starve while the boss finds a market for his surplus goods. Second, on the question of low wages we find that capitalism, being competitive, is forced to sell its goods in an open competitive market and the manufacturer who sells the cheapest will be the one who get the orders. But in order to decrease the cost of production, he must either increase production through the speed-up or he must cut wages. That the worker is being victimized by both of these methods of exploitation is a fact too well known to deserve mentioning to any extent here.

During the recent unemployment parades the capitalist dictatorship, especially in America, has shown its fear by its brutality. Every move of the working class which might contain a germ of revolutionary spirit is met with the club and bayonet. Giant strides in the class conscious awakening of the proletariat will bring in their train a series of repressions of a hitherto unheard of character. The American capitalist class is the most aggressive, arrogant ruling class in the world today comparable in brutality only to the French feudal lords of 1789, and will not make any retreat except it be a forced one.

However, as the machine age and the dawn of the super-machine age forces more and more workers into the ranks of the unemployed to face destitution and starvation, and as the class struggle becomes sharper, this inevitable acceleration of the masses toward a revolutionary concept will take place. It would be idle to make any predictions as to how long before a decided development of this phase takes place.

Super-Machine Age

War is of course inevitable. Modern capitalism however, has at its command the inventive genius of the world. Never before in the history of humanity has insensate mechanism been able to perform the tasks of both brawn and brain as it does today. One of our radio engineers a few years ago waxing enthusiastic over the success of some experiments in radio-control, predicted that not only was the driverless automobile and the manless battleship here, but that the workerless factory was just around the corner. Predictions of this type are usually dismissed by the average unimaginative worker as so much "bull" until the dream becomes a reality and he finds himself out of a job as the consequence. Quite recently one of the big electric companies was demonstrating the telovox, or mechanical man, so that we see that the human supervisor of the machine is about to be replaced by the machine supervisor of the machine.

Reflecting on the tremendous advances of this inventive genius and on the driving force of various capitalist nations to secure the world markets, it is easy to comprehend that a gradual introduction of this super-machine era will take place. Searching for a way to save itself from extinction by competition, capitalism will pave the way for its extinction by revolution. Trying to save itself by avoiding one road it will be hopelessly lost by taking another. Under no circumstances is it possible for a return to the periodical resurrection of capitalist prosperity in the sense of giving part time employment to nearly all the workers. We must organize not to stop the onrush of the machine age but rather to stop any further advance of the machine age slavery. You must fight for the abolition of the capitalist ownership of the machine and the emancipation of the working class through the dictatorship of the proletariat. —G. ROBERTS

We see from the papers that a little while ago the Lovestone group sent a letter to the Senate Committee protesting the Hoover nomination of Judge Parker to the Supreme Court, evidently with the desire of getting some one into that position who would be fair to labor...Not many days later, the Senate voted to reject Parker. The American bourgeoisie must simply have been scared out of its wits by Lovestone.

Ruining a Movement

Decline of the Chinese Communist Party

SHANGHAI—

The Chinese revolution of 1925-27 was drowned in blood by the joint forces of the imperialists and the national bourgeoisie with the help of Stalin. The Communist Party suffered a series of defeats in the struggle and became completely impotent both by physical extermination of the white terror and the demoralization caused by Stalin's theories. The Sixth (last) Congress of the Party held in June 1928 did not sum up the lessons of the greatest revolution in the East and straighten our political line in order to prepare the third Chinese revolution; instead it deepened the past mistakes and disarmed the Party ideologically and politically before the bourgeoisie.

The Congress defined the character of the next Chinese revolution as still a bourgeois democratic one and refused to see that the course and experiences of the 1925-27 revolution have shown that the solution of the tasks of a bourgeois democratic revolution can only lie in the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Congress gave ambiguous expressions concerning the present stage of developments, saying that although there is no broad mass revolutionary upheaval, it is nevertheless inevitable; we can already see weak symptoms of this upheaval but we must not overestimate them.

An Open Road to Adventurism

Thus the Congress did not give correct and definite estimations of the present period as the one between two revolutions, and did not put up transitional, revolutionary democratic slogans for the conquest of the masses. Instead it opened all doors to every adventurist explanation of the resolution. Every manifestation of discontent among the masses, no matter what character it assumes no matter how sporadic and spontaneous it is, a defensive strike or a mutiny of the soldiers, or the riots of the rickshaw coolies in the breaking up of tramways—all this is put into the scheme of the approach of the great mass revolutionary upheaval is seized upon to prepare the uprising or general strike. Those who do not believe this way are, of course, Trotskyists and therefore liquidators.

By defining the character of the next Chinese revolution (or the present unfinished one, according to the Stalinists) as bourgeois democratic, the Party raised in its "Program of the Chinese Revolution at the Present Stage" ten demands, as for example: Expropriation of the enterprises and banks of foreign capital; establishment of the workers-peasants-soldiers Soviet government; confiscation of the lands of all landlords and transference of all of it to the peasants. This means that the enterprises and banks of Chinese capital shall not be touched and violated in the revolution. It also gave elastic formulae concerning the peasants' movement, such as, "It is not correct deliberately to force (or to intensify) the anti-rich peasants struggle...but this is not to mean that we should give up the class struggle against the rich peasants...."

Such formulations naturally become repulsive and excite indignation among the rank and file of the Party members under the conditions of sharp class struggle antagonisms in China after the revolution. Already in the enlightenment campaign on the Sixth Congress, the workers in unit meetings demanded why the enterprises of Chinese capital should not be confiscated by the revolutionary power. The workers were not silenced by the scholasticism of the Party functionaries and said in indignant protest: "You are the second Chiang Kai-Sheks, only without arms," and then quit the meetings.

The tactics towards the rich peasants, when put into practice, can only mean the union with them but not the struggle against them. The rich peasant in China is most hated by the poor peasants, and by the village laborers, because he is a user, robs the poor peasant by making loans at heavy rates of interest. Now the Party calls upon the poor peasants not to force the struggle against the rich ones when they should be the direct object of attack.

What did the poor peasant answer? In the province of Hupeh, for example, they said in one meeting: "We shall make no more revolutions. What good does it do us?" They slept in the meeting instead of taking an interest in it, that is, they passively resisted the official policy. In some other provinces, the rich peasants made their way into the Party, filled its ranks and even occupied leading posts there. When the Central Committee issues its directives to such Party locals, with slogan against taxes of every kind, against rent and payment of loans, then these locals only carried out the directives against taxes but not against rent and loans.

Zig-Zagging Policies

Because of the Stalinist leadership in the Comintern, the Party is left without any policy and definite line. It is helpless before events. Right on the eve of the war between Chiang Kai-Shek and the Kwang-Si clique in the Spring of last year, the Central Committee of the Party categorically stated that no war is possible between these two militarists' groups, and this in face of the feverish military preparations and transport of arms which convinced even the local Party organs of the inevitability of war. Only yesterday it spoke of not forcing the struggle against the rich peasants and denounced the Trotskyists for such a standpoint. Today, it opens a campaign in the Party press against those members of the Party who show hesitation in the struggle and announces itself ready for fighting the rich peasants to the bitter end. Yesterday it said that Chiang Kai-Shek represents the bourgeoisie against the "feudal power" of the Kwang-Si clique. Today, it says that "the Kiang-Su (the province where the Chiang government is located) ruling class is dominated by feudal elements". All these theories are changed like the weather or one's linen. What serious revolutionist can have confidence in such a leadership?

In the sphere of action, the Party leadership shows no less lightmindedness. Since the first of May, the Party has again entered the era of adventurism. Demonstrations were held in the streets according to the calendar of revolutionary festivals, if not with the masses then with the Party members alone. Instead of "taking possession of the streets", some hundred people together with the bystanders, stand on the sidewalks of an appointed street at an appointed time, then someone gives the signal with firecrackers, some slogans are shouted, leaflets are thrown into the street, and then there are some arrests, most of the participants and observers going quietly home.

Of course such farcical demonstrations can only lower the standard of Communism, make the Communist workers leave the Party's ranks, and arouse the antipathy of the workers. The attendants at the demonstrations become less as the former become more frequent and desperate. When the attendants diminish, then workers are hired to show up in the streets! No serious agitational work is developed in the factories or works, in the important big factories only two or three Communist workers remain and even then no regular meetings take place—sometimes for two months. The local organizers get in touch with them only when it is necessary to enlist them in demonstrations.

Decline in Membership

The membership under such conditions is miserable. According to an official admission in a circular of the Shanghai Eastern district (the biggest industrial district in Shanghai), the membership decreased since last August from 85 to 82. The membership in all Shanghai, according to the most optimistic figure, is about 800. There are many other industrial cities where the Communist workers do not count more than ten. We owe all this to Stalin's blind policy of adventurism, to the destructive work of the Stalinist which attacks the Party from the workers. Indeed, things have even gone so far that in some Shanghai factories, the Communist workers try to organize their own unions behind the backs of the official leadership and oppose their meddling in their affairs.

The characteristic feature of this period of adventurism is that it is combined with opportunism of the worst kind. The C. C. last year sent Communists into the army of the Left Kuo Min Tang generals to cooperate with them in the military campaign against Chiang Kai-Shek. The Party has sent representatives to attend the anti-Chiang Kai-Shek conference in Hong Kong in which the reactionary militarists and the Left Kuo Min Tang participated. Many lower Party workers were taken in by the Left Kuo Min Tang's military adventure against Chiang Kai-Shek. Others followed the tail of the Left Kuo Min Tang in the economic struggle and trade union tactics. At the top of the Party, a wild campaign is developed against the Left K.M.T. full of invective and abusive words, but behind the scenes, the official leadership coquettes with these same Lefts, organizes the armed uprising together with them. The Central task and slogan of today's official leadership is the general political strike, partisan's warfare, armed uprising, organizing the local uprisings, preparing to establish the revolutionary power, etc., that is, to run further away from the workers in order to combine with the Left Kuo Min Tang and become in fact the instrument of the petty bourgeoisie.

The Guerilla Warfare

As to the guerilla warfare, in many places it becomes "aimless burning, killing and pillaging under the leadership of the declassed elements" (from the Party circular), since it lacks a mass basis. It sometimes violates the poor peasant's property because the armed forces of the landlords and rich peasants are too strong to permit of plundering. In other villages, the guerilla warfare which has some mass basis, divides the land among the peasants and annuls loans, doing something in the interest of the peasants by exterminating the landlords and bureaucrats. But these acts are too far from the important cities to exercise any influence upon them, and besides when it assumes a more menacing character, it is overpowered and driven away by the government's troops.

Since last year, the Party has concentrated all its propaganda work in the struggle against "Trotskyism", because the Communist Opposition has begun to work in China. Since then, it has taken a series of organizational measures against us. It fights most fiercely against one slogan, the Constituent Assembly, denouncing it as the slogan of the Left Kuo Min Tang. Thus, the constituent assembly, together with the 8-hour day, the confiscation of land, and the fight for the complete independence of China and self-determination of nationalities within China, which form our transitional revolutionary democratic demands to mobilize the masses, are "liquidators' demands" in the eyes of the Stalinists. But that does not in the least prevent the official leadership of the Party from organizing the "League for the Struggle for Freedom", together with the discontented petty bourgeois elements, intellectuals and professors, which is necessarily a decorative and helpless institution like the Anti-Imperialist League all over the world: a veritable tail of the petty bourgeoisie.

THROWS HUNDREDS OUT OF JOBS

MILLTOWN, N. J.—With the closing of the Michelin Tire Co. works at Milltown, near New Brunswick, hundreds of French workers imported from Brittany are jobless here in a strange country. They staged a short walkout two years ago, in revolt against a wage which sounded good in Brittany when they left their fisher nets to look for gold in America. Arrived in Milltown, they found the $12 a week wage paid adult men didn't mean what the equivalent in francs would buy back in the old country.

- THE YOUNG VANGUARD -

The Breakdown of the Mexican League

The period from April 1929 until August of the same year when the III Congress of the Young Communist Federation of Mexico was celebrated, was one of rapid progress for the Mexican Communist Youth movement. From a small number of non-functioning units, composed mostly of peasants with a disorganized central apparatus, an organization of 660 effective members in over 30 units and a central executive in which half a dozen departments functioned regularly was built up. During this same period, it is well to observe, the Communist Party of Mexico was disintegrating and losing one important position after the other, in the trade union and anti-imperialist movements, and also in the "Workers and Peasants Bloc" that had been formed opportunistically through concessions to the petty bourgeois directors of the National Peasants League (Galvan and Co.).

The national plenum of the C. C. of the Party was obliged to recognize in July 1929 that the youth federation had a better status than the Party and it was generally accepted that the Y. C. F. had more effective members in its organization than the Party itself.

The Apparatus Men Get Busy

At this stage, preparations for the III National Congress of the Y. C. F. of Mexico were made and a representative of the Young Communist International, comrade Matlin appeared on the scene. Already there had been several minor struggles on technical questions between the C.E.C. of the Y.C.F. and the C.E.C. of the C.P. in all of which the personal political interests of E. Sormenti, representative of the Party C.E.C. in the corresponding organ of the Y.C.F., were to be seen. Sormenti utilized the C. E. C. of the Y.C.F. as a "big stick" to win his ends in the C.E.C. of the Party.

A very weak political thesis, destructive in its analysis of the past work of the Y.C.F. and with proposals for the immediate commencement of numerous new "political" tasks was presented by the representative of the Y. C. I. who, it goes without saying, had a very deficient knowledge of the situation, the strength and possibilities of the youth federation. In this thesis it was proposed to commence at once the formation of youth sections in the unions, agrarian organizations and in the Red Aid, the organization of nuclei in the army, the organization of a National Sports Federation, of a League of Youth against imperialism, and to call an early date a national convention of the Red Pioneers. It was declared imperative that the Y. C. F. commence immediately all of these tasks.

When the opposition group continued in its demands that definite stress be laid on the more important work of organization, and the trade unions, and that the anti-militarist, anti-imperialist, young peasants league and youth section of the Red Aid be considered not of immediate importance with practical rejection of the last three the "guardian of the Holy Grail" from Moscow threatened us with expulsion should we insist on carrying the points of difference to the floor of the congress. After some minor changes regarding the criticism of past work, the draft thesis was accepted. In order to prevent a split in the Federation, the opposition group agreed not to bring the question up at the congress.

The congress took place without any opposition to the line of action laid down by the presidium which was controlled by Matlin and Sormenti. Veiled accusations were made against the "liquidationist", "social democratic" and "anti-Communist" tendencies, of the oppositionist comrades and by employment of true Stalinist methods, such as declaring that "foreigners" could not form part of a Central Committee, (!) the new C. C. and C. E. C. were named. Perhaps realizing that the new C. E. C. would have to work under the dictatorship of some Party or international representative and for fear of developing leadership it was decided that no General Secretary should be named, and that all political functions should be carried out collectively by the C. E. C.

Immediately the deficiencies of the new C. E. C. were to be observed. The different theses approved at the congress were not sent to the units or even to the regional committees. All of the work of the C. E. C. fell into disorganization as no one knew where or how to begin. All the scolding of Matlin and the nearness of the "imminent" workers and peasants revolution could not get the new apparatus to function. The only work that did not become completely demoralized was the press and Pioneer work. Delegates were no longer sent to the interior to carry on direct work with the units and with the masses.

Knowing that an anti-militarist campaign would be certain to bring down a still more severe repression of the movement by the authorities, and without counting on any real mass support, this work was given not only preference by the Y. C. F. but was actually turned into the principal task of the organization. The spirit of adventure always found in the youth was appealed to, and the comrades in different parts of the country vied with one another in seeing which local could get the generals exasperated first.

No sooner had the campaign been commenced than the repression struck with full force. In a period of about two months all the leading elements of the light largest urban locals were imprisoned, including the whole C. E. C. with the exception of one comrade, besides many Party and trade union leaders. About 20 foreigners were deported from the country, five comrades (of whom four were members of the Y. C. F. and one of the C. E. C.) were exiled to the penal colony in the Pacific Ocean and the Y. C. F. of Mexico was reduced to complete impotence. The "mass" demonstrations were few, rickety and ineffective. In the midst of all this, after organizing the expulsion of the writer of these lines from the Party and the Y.C.F. for his criticism of the line in Mexico and disagreement with the general splitting policy of the Comintern abroad and greasing the slides for others, Matlin fled cowardly from Mexico, without so much as notifying the Central Executive Committee.

Expulsions Continue

At the present time the expulsion fever continues to rage full blast in the C.E.C. of the Y.C.F. which seems to be about to result in its expelling itself. It may be interesting to note that the present C.E.C. of the Y.C.F. of Mexico is composed of one alternate, named in the congress, and two comrades, both of them quite incapable of national direction and who were not elected at the congress.

There is still hope however. This lies in the reorganization of the Young Communist forces in Mexico under the banner of the International Left Opposition. When the present "Left" turn of the Comintern takes its inevitably sharp Right turn, and the same young Communist elements in Mexico (and there are many) realize the correctness of our position, we may hope for a rapid improvement of the situation. Those who have striven for the building up of the Y. C. F. of Mexico will not stand quietly by while the organization is smashing under the combined blows of the governmental reaction and the Centrist bureaucracy.

The Rank and File Is Ominously Silent!

On Tuesday, May 14, at 8 p. m., at a general membership meeting of the New York district of the Young Communist League took place. I read in one of the last issues of the Militant an article about the last N. Y. "united front" May Day conference. In that article it was stated that there was hardly any discussion from the floor, etc. Now at a Y. C. L. membership meeting which is called to act on a Plan of Action given out by the N. E. C. one would think that there would be adequate discussion.

But the fact is that there was NO DISCUSSION from the rank and file members. Of course even you might not believe it, so I will explain what took place. First, Shohan, the District Organizer, reported for about an hour. When he was through, we were supposed to have 3 minutes discussion for each speaker. Well, the first was a comrade who spoke on the Young Worker in the name of the District Committee. Then a comrade on the Needle trades, who made an announcement that all the comrades should leave the meeting and go to the general needle trades fraction meeting in Manhattan Lyceum where Bedacht was reporting. Then the district anti-director took 15 minutes to give some instructions about giving out leaflets to the fleet. He also reported that Saturday's mobilization "was a flop". Then two more, the great unknown, John Steuben and Sam Reed each gave us a speech a piece.

After this Shohan too the floor without asking the members whether any discussion is needed and "summed up".

We were separated into fractions, that is, needle trades, food workers, etc., and were supposed to join the T. U. U. L. as a start in the membership drive.

League Members, Wake Up!

I think it's about time the League members woke up. It has gone far enough this bureaucratic way of conducting work. Shohan in his report, speaking about the unemployment work of the Y. C. L., said: "As far as the League is concerned, it is a one hundred percent failure."

Just think, after Shohan, criticizing the rank and file, making insinuations that unit organizers have misappropriated funds (collection boxes were given to each unit on May 1-3, and only five units had returned their boxes thus far, Shohan asked whether they used the money for movies or to pay their rent), in his whole speech he NEVER EVEN ONCE CRITICIZED THE LEADERSHIP. He didn't even bother to take a vote to approve the Plan of Action.

Now I will ask some of the older members in the N. Y. League what has happened? Have they become robots and stopped thinking? Where are Fanny Rothman, Freema Katz, Ben Harper, H. Nussbaum, Eda Elisman, Morris, Bindler, Kucher, Mae Kuperman, Friedman, Shavelson, Slipian (Harlem), etc.?

I will end by quoting from a speech delivered to the Third Congress of the Russian Y. C. L.: "A Communist who would dream of boasting of his Communism on the basis of the ready-made conclusions taught to him, without performing the most serious, the difficult and persistent work, without understanding the facts of which he should be extremely critical, would be a miserable Communist indeed." Let this be the guide for every Y. C. L. member.

—LEO RING

All members of the Young Communist League are invited to write articles to the Young Vanguard on the condition the Y. C. L. finds itself today. The surest way to stop the wrecking tactics of the Y.C.L. bureaucrats is to expose them before the membership.

We are sure nobody will accuse us of not taking life seriously when we say that upon reading the Daily Worker (5-17-1930) we laughed till we collapsed. That irrepressible humorist, Harrison George, writes there: "The Communist Party has nothing to hide from the workers. It publishes its opinions, its programs, its resolutions, so every worker can find out just what the Communists stand for... It is going to hold a national convention next month and being a really (emphasis in original—Ed.) democratic organization it consults its members on the Thesis drawn up by the Central Committee on the Economic and Political Situation." This fellow will be the death of us yet

In the Y. C. L.

The Plan of Action

The feeling which one experiences in the Young Communist League these days is that of a man trying to lift himself by his bootstraps. There seems to be a tremendous strain, a terrible commotion, much shouting mingled with many threats, but amidst all the fury there stands the League still tugging violently at its bootstraps. Each successive resolution appears more dismal than the preceding one. In every sphere of activity nothing but failures and defeats stare the League in the face. The membership turnover has assumed the character of a rationalized factory.

"Do More Work"

Through all the discordant noise and din, shrill and relentless, rings one penetrating strain: We lag behind, we lag behind, we continue to lag behind, we never seem able to stop lagging behind, we must not lag behind but we do lag behind, lag lag, lag behind. This strain has many variations but all have the same theme. The puny League bureaucrats, devoted disciples of Browder and Foster, are not in the least, however nonplussed. They have a remedy for everything. "You must do more work!" they thunder to the membership. And then to show that they have even heard of such a strange matter as Leninist analysis in determining the cause for failures, they add: "We must fight both the Right and Left dangers". They hope to conceal their impotence behind a screen of "theoretical" verbiage.

To be sure, the Right danger is the main danger, they say. But "there is also the so-called 'Left' danger which stands as a main barrier to be overcome in successfully combatting the main danger, the Right danger." (Resolution and Plan of Action of National Executive Committee —Young Worker, May 12, 1930). Life, it seems, is indeed most complicated. And the road in the struggle against the Right danger is most devious. With so many different varieties of social fascists, time is certain to produce new dangers. Then the alarm will have to sound, and it will be observed that we lag behind. The resolutions will have to bristle with warnings like these: There is also the so-called "Middle" Danger which stands as a main obstacle to be overcome in successfully combatting the so-called "Left" danger which stands as a main barrier to be overcome in successfully combatting the main danger, the Right danger.

The League membership must call a halt to all this idiotic jabbering and criminal phrasemongering, all of which is intended only to conceal the bankruptcy of the Stalinist leadership.

The "Plan of Action"

The so-called Plan of Action, this latest innovation with which the Steubens, the Harveys, and the Greens are attempting to cover their recent miserable failures, cannot be realized with the present false policies and opportunist regime. It will be as successful as the last membership drive which it was claimed recruited 1,100 new members. The resolution on the Plan of Action says: "Every unit must be made to function so that they can hold the gains made in new members, and not lose young workers for the League as we did during the last membership drive." And Shohan, D. O. of the N. Y. district stated at a recent membership meeting: "This drive must not be like the last drive where we recruited 200 members on paper." The adoption of such high-sounding titles as "Plan of Action" and "shock troops" cannot make the present drive any different than the last.

The members of the Y. C. L. must be alert. They must not permit themselves to be deceived. They must try to find out what is wrong, and what is all this unceasing "lagging behind" all about. They must study the viewpoint of the Left Opposition. Some are already doing this.

Six workers face death in the electric chair in Atlanta, Ga. because they addressed meetings of Negro and white workers and urged them to fight against lynching and unemployment. They include two white women and two Negroes.

The six workers are held under a state law passed in 1861 which calls for the death penalty for those convicted on the charge of "inciting to insurrection". Up until the present time no one has ever been convicted under that law.

The prosecuting attorney has stated that when the six workers are brought to trial he will demand that they be sent to the chair. Only if the jury that convicts them urges clemency, can they be given a prison sentence instead of being burned to death. The Southern capitalist class wants to quickly stamp out any efforts to organize the Negro and white workers for a united struggle. There is no doubt that a maximum effort will be made to secure a conviction, hoping in that way to terrorize the workers.

Those facing the electric chair are M.H. Powers, Communist Party organizer; Joseph Carr, Young Communist League organizer; Mary Dalton, National Textile Workers Union organizer; Anna Burlak, International Labor Defense organizer; Gilmer Brady, national organizer, American Negro Labor Congress and Henry Storey, a member of the Atlanta branch of the A. N. L. C.

The International Labor Defense is conducting the campaign for the defense of these six workers. So far it has failed to arouse the masses to action. Only a few isolated meetings have been held which have hardly received any publicity in either the capitalist or Party press.

A broad united front movement must be started all over the country on behalf of the six workers. The International Labor Defense together with all labor organizations that can be brought into action must arrange mighty protest demonstrations demanding freedom for the jailed

Indian Ferment and Chinese Lessons

Reports from subsidized sources minimize it but British imperialism is nevertheless unable to suppress the fact that the Indian ferment is still gaining in breadth and in depth. The insurgents have begun to pass over from breaking the government salt monopoly to the refusal to pay taxes. Simultaneously the civil disobedience campaign which the petty bourgeoisie, in fear of real mass action strives to hold within the limits of pacifist non-resistance—is overflowing the barriers erected for it by the Nationalist Congress.

After generations of oppression and exploitation, the Indian masses moving in tidal waves of revolt are presenting the world with one of the grandiose spectacles of history. The uprising of the colonial Orient, precipitating the solution of the agrarian and national problems of the democratic revolution in conjunction with the international and socialist revolutionary whose class bearer is the proletariat—this is one of the outstanding features of the final stage of capitalism.

MacDonald—Bourgeois Agent

It is no less characteristic that the torch-carriers of the imperialist suppression of the Indian revolt, should be the "socialist" Labor government of the canting MacDonald.

How can any worker still cling to his last remnant of faith in the social democracy? The Indian situation fully confirms the justice of Lenin's contention that the "socialists" are agents of the bourgeoisie. MacDonald is prepared to repeat a hundred times over that he is a socialist.

Powers and Carr are scheduled to go on trial on June 7. The date for the trial of the others has not as yet been set. The time is short. Action must be swift. Let the campaign to free the six workers be started on a basis than can bring success.

dred Amritsar massacres to maintain the Empire. No revolutionary Marxist expected anything else from the Labor government but the continuation of the long chain of crimes and betrayals committed by the Second International since 1914. Socialist reformism inevitably becomes socialist imperialism.

But it would be a profound mistake and delusion to conceive of the present crisis in India as the decisive struggle for freedom from British imperialism. The movement of the masses still has no other leadership than the bourgeoisie and all historical experience bears out that the bourgeoisie will betray the struggle at the first opportune agreement that they reach with the foreign imperialists and at the first sign that the masses are turning not only against the foreign but no less against the native exploiter. The bourgeoisie in the epoch of imperialism is incapable of carrying on a consistent struggle for the democratic revolution, and has no intention of peacefully allowing the proletariat to assume the leadership. Here the lessons of the Chinese Revolution are an invaluable source of instruction and guidance for the proletarian vanguard in India.

India and the Proletariat

The Indian Revolution will triumph under the leadership of the Indian proletariat or not at all. It will triumph as the dictatorship of the proletariat or not at all.

This means that there are certain indispensable pre-requisites for the revolution. That the Communist International, the world organization of the revolutionary working class, should have to enact the role practically of a passive onlooker in the present crisis, is one of the most damning indictments of the Stalin regime. That there is no Communist Party in India today worth its salt is the direct outcome of the

Build Mass Movement for Mar. 6 Jailed

Growing out of the campaign on behalf of the millions of unemployed workers in the United States, and directly from the March 6th Unemployment Demonstration in Union Square, New York City, Wm. Z. Foster, I. Amter, Robert Minor and Raymond have been serving sentences of six months to three years upon trumped up charges and conviction for "inciting to riot". In unparalleled star-chamber proceedings denied bail and jury trial and an opportunity to have defense witnesses heard, the defendants, Communists, were railroaded to long, harsh prison sentences.

New York capitalism has demonstrated graphically the viciousness and hatred of capitalist class justice against workingmen and their leaders. In other parts of the country, the bourgeoisie follow the lead of New York in the extension on a national scale of the persecution of the Communists and other workers.

The passivity and apathy with which the New York convictions have been met is appalling, and symptomatic of the impasse which the official Communist Party has reached. Hardly any agitation is carried on by the Party press or Daily Worker to effect the release of the four Communists and to expose the machinery which brought about their conviction. Why has the Party made virtually no efforts to rally on behalf of the four convicted leaders those workers who it declared followed its banner at the height of the unemployment crisis? Why are there no steps taken for a wide united front to arouse the working class to demand these comrades be released forthright from their incarceration? It can and must be done. Various elements in the labor movement can unquestionably be brought into action in this case.

Rumors are widely current in Party circles that behind the scenes a game is being played to obtain the release of the framed-up men. This is wrong and will get the movement nowhere, and least of all

Maintain the Weekly Militant!

Shall the WEEKLY MILITANT continue? Our readers, the sympathizers, supporters and members of the Left Opposition have to decide this question now—and decisively.

On November 15, 1928 the first number of the semi-monthly Militant appeared, and first publicly broke the conspiracy of silence and the reign of ideological and physical terror of the Stalins and Bucharins, the Fosters and the Lovestones, carried on for years against the true standard-bearers of Bolshevism, the Russian Opposition-Bolshevik-Leninists, led by Leon Trotsky. For over a year and a half now, the actual views of the International Left Opposition have been regularly brought before the American Communists and the working class. The Militant, official organ of the Communist League of America (Opposition), has been all this time a flaming torch, burning away the poisonous roots of the Centrist and Right wings in the Communist International and the United States, and guiding the bewildered Communist movement again onto the path of Lenin's teachings.

The incomparable writings of Leon Trotsky, Christian Rakovsky and other outstanding Bolsheviks have appeared regularly in the Militant, and only in its columns.

The truth about the conditions in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the causes of the divisions and splits in it, the ramifications of the Russian struggle in the Communist movements of all countries, the program of the Russian Opposition to save the Bolshevik Revolution from the danger of Thermidorian developments, has been unfolded in the Militant.

Now more than ever the Militant must remain a weekly. The present adventurist course of the Communist Parties internationally follows upon the heels of the brazen Right opportunism of the previous period. We are now paying the price for all these years of accumulated blunders, in the prevailing apathy among Party members, in hundreds of good fighters quitting the struggle for lack of perspective. We are losing one position after another in the unions. The Left wing Industrial Unions have been reduced to impotence. Only the Militant presenting a clear line of Leninist tactics, combatting the irresponsible regime of Browder-Foster as well as the Lovestone Right wing can turn the wave of apathy into one of struggle, can prevent the Syndicalists and "Socialists" from turning the crisis in the Cominteru to their profit.

The Communist movement and the working class can ill afford to lose the Militant, or to have it retreat to an existence again as a semi-monthly publication.

With confidence and faith in the integrity of the rank and file of the American Communists and the working class, the National Conference of the Communist League of America (Opposition) held in Chicago in May 1929, decided to launch the Weekly Militant, and to rely for its continuance upon the support of the honest worker-Communists in and outside the official Communist Party.

A period of six months trial for the Weekly Militant was projected. By might and main, by heroic efforts by the members and sympathizers of the Opposition, the WEEKLY Militant has been maintained now for almost seven months.

NOW WE ARE FINANCIALLY AT A CRUCIAL POINT, and we put the question squarely and frankly: SHALL THE WEEKLY MILITANT BE MAINTAINED?

The Plenum of the National Committee of the Communist League, after thorough discussion and analysis, came to the viewpoint that the WEEKLY MILITANT CAN AND MUST BE MAINTAINED for the cause of revolutionary Communism. Again, we declare our belief, based upon the experiences of the past year and a half, that the genuine adherents of Communism will make this historic task possible. We began the Militant on a shoe-string. We maintained it as a semi-monthly. We started the WEEKLY without substantial resources, but the militant fighters of the Opposition dug deep and made it live.

We turn again to our supporters and readers and ask them to rally to the WEEKLY MILITANT. For lack of funds, we have already skipped one issue of the Weekly. We do not want to miss another. For the next period, in addition to the normal income of the Militant, we call upon our readers and supporters to donate $2,000.

Much as has been done, new ground yet remains to be broken. We have been pioneering with ideas. The ideas of the Opposition, the aspirations and needs of the working class—must triumph. By helping to MAINTAIN THE WEEKLY MILITANT, you can do your share.

DENY AID TO MEERUT VICTIMS

Comrade Maurice Spector, member of the national committee of the Communist League (Opposition), is one of the eight witnesses for whom leaders of Indian trade union and revolutionary movements on trial in Meerut, have applied to the British viceroy—hitherto without success. The Daily Worker, organ of the British Communist Party reports in its issue of May 7, 1930:

"Over five weeks ago some of the Meerut prisoners, whose trial still drags on, although the censorship allows no word of it to come direct to Britain, made an application direct to the Viceroy.

"Their application was for permission to call as witnesses eight workers in the revolutionary movement in England, Canada or Australia, the list being: Harry Pollitt, J. E. Potter-Wilson, of the Indian Workers' Welfare League. C. P. Dutt, S. Saklatvala, J. Ryan, director of the Sydney Labour Research Department, Australia, J. Tanner, A. E. U., Maurice Spector, Communist Party of Canada, J. R. Campbell.

"Out of the prosecutions 320 witnesses, 8 from England have already been examined, and one from France. They have given 'evidence' as to the actions of 'co-conspirators' such as Harry Pollitt. But Pollitt is not allowed to go to India to answer this 'evidence' and to give evidence for the defense.

"These police spies, who have brazenly admitted in court their system of opening letters in the post, photographing them, sticking them up again and sending them on, have 'produced' volumes of printed 'evidence' to prove the conspiracy. The workers who wrote or published many of these 'documents' in England, Australia or Canada are not allowed to enter India to explain, defend or justify them."

Readers of the Militant should bear in mind that this procedure, characteristic of the most brutal persecutions of the capitalist class, is being followed by His Majesty's Most Servile Government, the Labour Party cabinet of Ramsay MacDonald.

Comrade Spector was the leader of the Canadian Communist movement and chairman of the Political Bureau of the C. P. there, as well as member of the Executive Committee of the Communist International, until his expulsion from the Party some 18 months ago for "Trotskyism". He is now actively engaged in the work of the Opposition.

Shachtman Tours for Opposition

The national tour by comrade Max Shachtman, arranged by the Communist League of America (Opposition) is meeting with marked success wherever comrade Shachtman reports on his lengthy visit to Leon Trotsky at Constantinople, the conference of the German Left Opposition held and the preliminary International Conference of the Left Opposition at Paris, France. Comrade Shachtman was the delegate of the Communist League of America to both of these conferences.

Meetings have already been held in New York City, New Haven, Conn., Philadelphia, Pa. Boston, Mass., Montreal, Canada and Toronto, Canada. In Boston in addition to the mass meeting, comrade Shachtman also spoke before Independent Workmen's Circle No. 18.

Additional Cities Added

Requests to hear comrade Shachtman came in from additional cities, with the result that Youngstown, O., Duluth, Minn.,

and Superior, Wisconsin have been added to the schedule. It was not possible, because of the crowded schedule, to fill a last minute request from Winnipeg, Canada at this time.

In connection with the mass meetings, comrade Shachtman is also holding special sessions with the Branches of the Communist League of America (Opposition). At these meetings comrade Shachtman is giving detailed reports of the recently concluded Plenum of the National Committee of the Communist League, and is taking up with each Branch the expansion of activities of the organization in the next period.

The tour of comrade Shachtman which commenced in New York on May 15th will cover approximately 25 cities, extending as far west as Kansas City. It will conclude with meetings in Pittsburg, Pa.

As the Militant goes to press, the following cities are yet to be visited.

Rank and File Unrest in the Amalgamated

The convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers which met in Toronto received the usual tribute of liberal plaudits. The liberals whose miserable task it is in our times to try to soften the sharp edge of the class struggle, feel a deep affinity for Hillman and his associates. They have been thoroughly captivated by the whole pseudo-scientific apparatus of "production standards" unionism.

The convention in Toronto was organized to present the most plausible front to the world of labor. The Left wing which has been craftily outmanoeuvred by the "honest" Hillman machine, realizes fully how false this front is. Perhaps it will impress some "impartial" workers more if instead of merely repeating our own root and branch indictment of Hillmanism, we can cite the testimony of one so remote from Communism as H. Schneid in the "socialist" Wecker (May 31). In all the fine speeches of the officialdom any reference to that which is the heart of the matter—the consideration of living and working conditions of the workers—was studiously avoided. For a considerable time, he goes on to admit, conditions in Baltimore, Boston, Montreal, Toronto and Chicago, not to speak of New York have been developing from bad to worse. "All you need have done at the convention was to put the question to a delegate. 'How much do you earn' and it would have opened the wound." Here is another most significant fact. Of the two hundred delegates with 80 resolutions before them, only one delegate took the floor, apart from the official machine.

Such is the balance sheet of the Hillman-Beckerman regime in the men's clothing industry. Growing misery, economic insecurity, the delivery of workers to speed-up and more grinding exploitation; and simultaneously the intimidation of the workers by expulsion and similar threats to the point when rank and file democracy has been replaced by the rule of the officialdom, and its staff of hired experts, both of the gangster and the research variety.

It is high time for the militants in the Amalgamated to renew their struggle. The apathy of the workers will quickly disappear once they sense that the Left has again thrown down the gage of battle to the bureaucrats. But for this it is necessary that the Left wing should base its policy and leadership on the tried and tested revolutionary strategy of Marx and Lenin. It is folly of the most dangerous kind to set up old prejudices of American syndicalism and De Leonism as the latest evangel. The Left wing has practically surrendered the workers to Hillman and his well-oiled machine. Schneid's side-lights on the convention make clear that even at this convention organized without the participation of the Left there was considerable rank and file discontent and unrest, although it has been driven by the absence of the Left and the suppression of workers' democracy, to seek expression in the lobby corridors and not on the floor itself. What is the policy of the Communist Party under these circumstances? It is expressed in the statement issued by the G. E. B. of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union (Daily Worker May 22nd). That statement is a direct appeal, which if followed would have the immediate effect of isolating an insignificant group of Left wingers from the main body of the masses in the union.

THE BLUMKIN ASSASSINATION

In Moscow, only the narrow Party circles know about Stalin's assassination of Blumkin. By these circles rumors are systematically spread that Blumkin committed suicide. Stalin still does not dare to admit openly that he shot the "counter-revolutionary" Blumkin.

It is highly remarkable that the world capitalist press did not at all hurry to utilize the case of Blumkin. It calculates, and quite correctly, that the defense of the Left Communists from the Stalin atrocities is not in its interests. At the more persistently and uncompromisingly must therefore the Left Opposition carry on the campaign of exposing the Stalinist crimes.

We informed the comrades previously that besides Blumkin, two more oppositionists, the comrades Silov and Rabinovitch, have been shot. This question, therefore, takes on exceptional political acuteness: only the echo of Stalin's crimes among the advanced workers of the world will stop his bloody atrocities against the Bolshevik revolutionaries.

The former Communist Souvarine has hastened to come to Stalin's aid, declaring that Blumkin was carrying out the directives of the Opposition inside the G.P.U., and that so long as the G. P. U. exists, it must assassinate agents that break faith, Souvarine draws the conclusion that "on the thirteenth year of the revolution" (?) the G. P. U. must be destroyed.

We have no basis whatever for entering into a political discussion with Souvarine. We consider it sufficient to make the following declaration:

Comrade Blumkin never carried out, and because of the very nature of his work never could carry out the directives of the Opposition either inside the G. P. U., or through the G. P. U. Suffice it to say that Blumkin spent a considerable part of the last period in the Far East, primarily Mongolia.

To prohibit workers of the G. P. U. as well as workers of the military institutions from holding views differing from those of the Central Committee, means to deprive Communists working in the above named institutions of their elementary Party rights. Only Stalinist bureaucrats can defend such an outrage.

The G. P. U. is the organ of self-defense for the proletarian dictatorship. In so far as the October Revolution on its thirteenth year is still surrounded by a world of enemies it cannot give up such organs—the dictatorship cannot cease being a dictatorship.

Only liberals and liberalizing social democrats can pose this question on a formal plane. We raise it on a class plane: In the name of what are repressions applied? Against whom are they applied? Whom and what do they serve? It is a matter of revolutionary expediency, and not super-class justice.

The assassination of Blumkin, as well as the repressions against the Leninist Opposition in general, weaken the proletarian vanguard, undermine the Party and strengthen the class enemies. The struggle against this treacherously-cowardly murder of Blumkin by Stalin, we carry on in the name of the proletarian dictatorship.

Let this be known to our friends and enemies!

The «New Turn» in the C.I.

conformity with the new course decreed by the Stalinist leadership after the 15th of March the presidium of the Executive Committee has ordered a general turn in all sections of the Communist International.

The new turn cast its shadow before it a while ago. It was announced in the speech of Manuilsky last November during the sessions of the Young Communist International. During the course of his speech Manuilsky attacked with extreme violence the Central Committee of the Austrian Communist Party which he reproached with having "sectarian conceptions" for having spoken of an imminent revolutionary situation at the time of the aggravation of the Austrian crisis, and for having played with insurrection. He thus exposed the thoroughly opportunist character of the new turn.

For it was the leading bodies of the Comintern, with the German C. P. Central at its head which had simply thrown the leadership of the Austrian C. P. into the "zeal of insurrection". The Constance conference of September 18, 1929, declared that "today the question of the seizure of power presents itself in Austria" and Remmele declared at a meeting of the Central Committee of the German Communist Party at which were present members of the Austrian Central Committee, that it was not sufficient to propagate the idea of Soviets but it was now necessary to set about realizing them.

The Real Responsibility

The Left Opposition rose up against this playing with insurrection and showed that the Party had already let slip a decisive occasion when it neglected to mobilize the masses against the repressive regime of Schober; nevertheless it was denounced as "defeatist" and its slogan—the creation of defense committees in all factories against the threatening fascism—was not even given a hearing.

The hopeless bankruptcy of the "Left" Stalinist course was revealed in all its tragicomic aspects last fall in Austria.

The cowardly and pitiful retreat of the theoreticians of adventurism, of the Third Period inventors, before the political conclusions of their slogans and their theories in the Austrian crises clearly portrays the character or rather lack of character of the new turn.

Without appearing to do so, Manuilsky in his report set out to outline a new interpretation of the "Third Period". Until quite recently it was the period of "violent revolutionary upsurge", of the imminent collapse of stabilization; now, however, the maturing of a world economic crisis is very modestly announced and the phenomena of the crisis coming to light in the various countries are examined. "It is not yet the finish of stabilization that approaches, but only the beginning of the decomposition, for the collapse of capitalist stabilization would mean the collapse of the capitalist system, that is, the birth of an objectively revolutionary situation in the capitalist countries"; that is what Manuilsky announced while the Berlin Rote Fahne spoke, since February 1st, of the capitalist collapse that is developing at a "breath-taking pace".

But isn't such a "re-interpretation" made to reveal the whole stupidity of the theory of the Third Period? Does not the whole strategy outlined by the Sixth Congress threaten to give way under this weak attempt made at revision behind the back of the Party? And does not the collapse of the theoretical and strategical basis of the "Left" Stalinist course threaten to shake the authority of the all-powerful apparatus of the C. I.? The fear of seeing these questions posed openly absolutely dominates the exemplary bureaucrat in the first and timid attempt at revision. And that is why Manuilsky swiftly throws a morsel to the astonished members of the Communist Party; he declares that the "growing revolutionary upsurge has already mounted a degree".

These contradictions in Manuilsky's

speech are only the reflection of the contradictions of Centrist policy in general. Each attempt to correct itself must be paid for by the "deepening" of its past errors; in this manner, Centristism more and more prepares the ground for avowed opportunism and favors the development of adventurism and openly Right wing tendencies.

The Turn a la Thaelmann and Co.

The most perfect picture of internal contradictions, of half-measures and of the most dangerous opportunism is furnished us by the turn affected in Germany at this moment by Thaelmann, Neumann and Remmele. The resolution adopted at the meeting of the C. C. of the C. P. G. on March 20 and 21, declares that "all the recent events prove that the revolutionary upsurge, in spite of its unequal developments is rising upwards as before..."

And in the name of the revolutionary upsurge, the resolution of the C. C. demands "a strong consolidation of the struggle against social-fascism".

Now, the "strong consolidation" consists in the fact that the C. C. suddenly discovers the difference between the social democratic workers and their counter-revolutionary chiefs. At the same time, the resolution attacks the "Leftist sectarianism" and declares that the "fraction work has considerably diminished lately in the reformist and Christian unions."

And still at the same time, the C. C. declares that "the existing revolutionary unions must be strengthened in the most energetic manner".

Rarely has a leadership tried in a more cowardly and disgusting manner to wash its hands of its mistakes behind the backs of its adherents. It is at last discovered that "the theory of the little Zoergel (according to which the simple social democratic worker is a "class enemy") belongs to the realm of absolute cretinism. This discovery is masked by the slogan of the "consolidation of the struggle against social-fascism".

The need for working within the free trade unions (social democratic), to which more than 5,000,000 workers belong, can no longer be evaded. But to conceal the recognition of this necessity, the work is made equivalent to that done in the Christian trade unions and at the same time "the most energetic strengthening of the revolutionary trade unions" is demanded.

Effects of the Turn

This cowardly right-about-face of the Party bureaucracy which, within 24 hours, tramples underfoot what it still proclaimed to be patented Bolshevism yesterday, has had various effects in the Party. A part of the apparatus, specialists sworn to the struggle against social fascism, has responded to the turn by an apparatus rebellion. At the head of this "apparatus rebellion" is the trade union strategist, Paul Merker, member of the Political Bureau and the Central Committee. Among the members of the C. P. there is above all, an extreme agitation. The rebellion of Merker has found substantial support in the Central Region (Berlin). The Party functionaries, by 70 votes against 7, have rejected the new "turn", and demanded the exclusion of Remmele and Heinz Neumann from the C. C. It is a typical trait of the hypocrisy of the leadership that it now tries to convince the militants that the manifestation of the ultra-Leftist Merker group is... "a resurrection of vanquished Trotskyism". And this after having declared for years that the Trotskyists and the Right wing were identical! The leadership of the Party will not succeed in unloading its faults, and the responsibility for the line it defended up to now, upon the Merker group. It will succeed still less in putting into the same bag the real Left of the Party and the ultra-Leftist Merker group.

The Left Opposition which has been fighting for years the erroneous course of Stalin and Thaelmann, now fortified by the unification of the Left Opposition that took place on March 31, will fight more vigorously than ever in the Party in order to win to the ideas of the International Opposition the most advanced elements of the Party.

In France

The Impending Crisis in the Party

The Communist Party of France and the French revolutionary trade unions have had, ever since their foundation, a considerable handicap in the struggle for influence among the workers. The powerful wave of post-war revolution carried an enthusiastic majority of the old Socialist Party over into the ranks of communism, at the scission of Tours. The splitting, bureaucratic policy of the Jouhaux-led C. G. T. drove still more workers toward the revolutionary trade union center, the C. G. T. U., born under the United Front slogan. Thus, organizationally, the original post-war conditions favored the revolutionary movement, gave the Communists a considerable advantage over the yellow reformists.

The Stalinist Course in France

However the vacillating, equivocal, adventurist character of the Comintern "line" after Lenin's death, initiated, as elsewhere, in France too, a serious disintegration of the revolutionary ranks particularly as far as the political side of the movement is concerned. The membership of the Party has been almost decimated. (From well over 120,000 members after Tours, there remain now from 15 to 30,000.) The influence of the press has immensely fallen. The socialists have been able to recover and strengthen their positions—at the expense of the Communists.

An example of passive reaction among the rank and file, was offered to view on the First of May. The Party and the C. G. T. U. issued a manifesto, calling for a "Day of Struggle" appealing to their adherents to come "All into the Streets". What actually happened, was this:

In Paris and in the suburbs several hundreds of thousands of workers struck, obeying the call, not only of the C. G. T. U. and the Communists, but also that of the C. G. T. and the S. P. There were, however, no demonstrations, no meetings, whatsoever.

At the Grange-Aux-Elles, the C. G. T. U. headquarters, only the flies (cops) were to be seen in appreciable numbers. Rue Lafayette (the Party office) was likewise deserted. At the Sante prison, where the Party called for a demonstration in the evening, there was instead, a veritable demonstration—of flies...

Why this inactivity, why this apathy among workers organized in hundreds of thousands in mass revolutionary organizations? The apparatchiki, the greater and the lesser bureaucrat explain this away with "self-criticism". They didn't make a "bon boulot" (good job) of the preparation! They are in general imbued with an entirely non-Communist, non-Marxist spirit of subjectivism. Revolution to them is merely an administrative affair, a matter of stereotyped routine. As a result: Among the youth a positive abhorrence for theory, a strong inclination for "revolutionary gymnastics", for the many times over discredited and unmasked "Herveism". Among the adults, slavish execution of "instructions".

The more serious, the more sincere elements in the Party and the League have, however, lately begun to be affected by the meager results of their work. They are beginning to think things over. In the C. G. T. U. these elements are rapidly developing into a principled, pro-Party, anti-bureaucratic opposition, grouping themselves about our comrades of the Verite and the Ligue Communiste. Among the youth, a similar process is taking place.

The Stalinist apparatus-men have, in fact, become alarmed already. They are now groping about for a suitable label to tag on to these new oppositionists, before proceeding with the customary suspensions and expulsion measures. And this groping about displays a pitiful intellectual confusion, a true reflection of chained intelligence.

The editorial of the May number of the Cahiers du Bolchevisme sets itself the task of "analyzing" the new opposition. The objectives that guide the "analysis" are clear. One, to discover a scape-goat upon which to cast the guilt for the errors committed by the bureaucrats themselves since the inauguration of the "third period"—and lately condemned by the infallible Manuilsky-Stalin. The other, to discredit the real opposition as much as possible in the eyes of the workers.

The second objective produces only a barrage of abuse and slander, which the workers will hardly tolerate. The new oppositionists are called "centrists", allies of the "Popists", "hidden opportunists", agents of the reformist minoritaires" and similar epithets. But, it is well known that the militants of the new C. G. T. U. opposition have always fought the syndicalists and opportunist tendencies of the Monatte group as well as of the Rights, Comrades like Aulas, Douemanget, Villatte possess a prestige among the workers for that. After "analyzing" the opposition "currents" into "pessimists" and "left phrase mongers" (the discovery, then, of some ephemeral "Merker" group in France?!) the editorial writer proceeds with illuminations.

Finding a Scape-Goat

"As to the latter," he writes, "they displace the practical work by bombast and by mechanical procedure (!) and surrender themselves to Leftist demagoguery (exaggeration of the crisis (!) slogan of the conquest of power as a practical task (so!) etc.). A perusal of the Humanite of the "third period" in any arrangement of days whatsoever would enable anyone to call these mysterious "latter" by their real given names. But—it seems—the "texts" were, nevertheless correct; the question here deals, with such "latter" phrase-mongers, who "...interpreted the texts, falsely denatured our estimations" etc. It is clear that this to date non-existent ultra-Left "group" is to be picked in the main from the conscientious lower layers of functionaries who simply took the slogans issued by the directing organs on good faith. To these are to be attributed all the sins of the "Left turn" in the first section of the third period just finished.

However, it is extremely difficult to find an "important" personage who has gained the disfavor of the council of the All-High, to attach to this group as a sort of a loadstone. Even Vassart, among the leading until recently in the Party and the C. G. T. U. can only merit the label "pessimist" (despite his well-known attack against Chambelland of the "forty years of social peace"). This is a real dilemma for the analyst. Yet, the new opposition has been "proven" an ally of the Right wing; Vassart as "skeptical" and "pessimist" has been created a confederate of Chambelland, in the Party ranks and even those ephemeral Leftists are some sort of opportunists anyway. And so, our writer trembling for his own hide (as Lovestone, for instance, did for his, in the days of our own Trotskyist Right danger) concludes:

"In our Party we cannot speak of two battle fronts (this is already sacrilege) as among the youth (reference to Manuilsky). The few Left errors, which might have been committed by good revolutionary workers ought to be eliminated, but they should not be confused with the "Left" bombast of several braggarts (!) who by that means attempt to disguise their opportunism. There is only one opportunist front with different shadings which we have underlined above."

The Perspectives

This confusion, this uneasiness in the ranks of the bureaucracy, marks an impending crisis. Couple this bureaucratic uneasiness with the growing dissatisfaction among the better rank and file elements, who watch in pain and despair, the fluctuation and the diminution of the Party influence, who begin to recognize the disrespect, the neglect of revolutionary theory, as the source of the evil, and we perceive the dawn of a fierce inner struggle in the French Party, an important opportunity to lead to the rehabilitation of the Party as the party of the proletariat. The French section of the International Left Opposition under the leadership of L. D. Trotsky and the Russian Leninist-Bolsheviks, will be at its post in the days to come. Under the banner of Leninism. It will fight to lead the French Party on to the correct Communist path, as part of the struggle for the renovation of the Comintern.

The Position of the Left Wing

The break between the epigones of the leadership and the Leninist tradition presents itself under a well-defined form of organization: all the cadres which participated in the building of the Comintern and presided over its leadership in the period of the first four Congresses are not only thrown out of the leadership, but in their overwhelming majority excluded from the ranks of official Communism. This fact alone suffices to denounce the whole abyss that has been created between today and the revolutionary past. The new "theory", the new policy and the new regime have acquired new people. It must be said openly to the workers: at the hour of danger, at the moment of decisive combat, the revolutionary inconsistency of the apparatus of the C. I. will become strikingly obvious to all. Irresponsible subalterns, always ready to accommodate themselves to each new leadership, have never been capable of leading the assault against the ruling classes.

The Left wing (Bolshevik-Leninists) whose spirit of clear-sighted criticism and slogans have been entirely confirmed from the point of view of the internal development of the U. S. S. R. as well as the situation on the international arena, is submitted to the vilest offensive. Nevertheless, and in spite of all the lies of the official press, the Left Opposition grows in numbers and is being fortified ideologically in the whole world.

The progress has been great especially this last year. The press of the Left Opposition in Europe, in America and in Asia constitutes at the present time the only serious Bolshevik-Marxist press, analyzing events, drawing the conclusions, proceeding to the formation of new cadres and preparing the regeneration of the Communist International.

In every country, the Left Opposition has put out of its ranks all those who, under cover of its banner, endeavored to dissimulate their spirit of opportunism, their petty bourgeois dilettantism or their half-anarchist hostility to the country of the proletarian dictatorship.

In spite of all the calumnies of the official press, the international Left Opposition remains unshakably faithful to the October revolution and the Soviet State.

The false friends whom the Soviet bureaucracy draws to itself by means of concessions or alms—these Purcells, Fimmons and Barbusses of all countries—are all very good for anniversary "festivals" but not for the revolutionary struggle. The Opposition is an ideological selection which the persecutions and the fury to which it has been exposed has hardened. At the serious moment it will be found in the front lines.

The Role of the Social Democracy

The Russian Mensheviks, the Social-Revolutionaries and other groupings reduced to nothing at the same time as the bourgeoisie, anxiously scent the crisis, hoping to rise again out of the void. The "democratic" scoundrels of the exploiting classes think to find their rebirth in the fall of the Soviet power which they await impatiently. In reality, the fall of the dictatorship of the proletariat would signify the opening of a long period of civil wars for many years, with sporadic attempts at impotent Bonapartist dictatorship in various corners of the country, in the Chinese or Deniken manner, with the inevitable consequence of the arrest of economic and cultural development for many years. The way out of all this chaos could not be in the sense of a democracy—this political form being least likely in Russia, given the structure and historical past of the land—but much rather under the form of colonial subjugation or of a new October revolution.

The international social democracy does not want to and cannot take into account the economic and cultural expanse of the October revolution, whose creative force in every field is without equal in any known historical regime. All the dangers of the present moment whose source lies in the great betrayal by the social democracy which submits deliberately to capitalism, all the mistakes of the Stalinist leadership, cannot for a single instant obscure the fact that thanks to the proletarian character of the State, we have been able to attain a tempo of economic development that capitalism has never known. The very possibility of experiences in the form of plans and of collectivization, with all their contradictions and errors, constitutes a gigantic acquisition for all of humanity. Can they be compared for an instant with such "errors" as the patriotic participation of the social democracy in the imperialist slaughter or the present disgusting game of Mueller and MacDonald who crawl about in search of a recipe for the rejuvenation of capitalism?

The conquests of the October revolution show the incalculable possibilities that could be attained by Europe and humanity as a whole if the social democracy of Germany, England and other countries where it can formally become a majority (if it should "want" it, that is, if it should formulate a proletarian program) were to inscribe on the order of the day a socialist reconstruction of relations with the Soviet Union on the basis of an indissoluble collaboration.

Against "Socialist" Treachery

But that is out of the question, for the social democracy constitutes the "democratic" basis of capitalist conservatism and is the penultimate resource of a society based upon exploitation. The ultimate resource will be fascism.

The social democratic "criticism" of the Soviet regime is like the cry of the night-watchman: it is destined to maintain the tranquility of the propertied and to guarantee them peaceful slumber. To fight against the dictatorship of the proletariat, the social democracy utilizes the difficulties that it has itself created for the Soviet Union, augmented by those the leadership has caused. If, in relation to the capitalist world, the social democracy plays a role of protection towards the U.S.S.R., its aim bears a character of restoration. The struggle for "democracy" and "liberties" in the very sphere of world imperialism, one of whose guardians the social democracy has made itself, really signifies the struggle for the re-establishment of capitalism. Only thus the question is important. It indicates that to the extent that the crisis becomes graver, the more implacable will become our struggle against all the democratic agents of the restoration no matter who they are. At the same time, the further we go the more clearly we see that Communism cannot fight victoriously against the social democracy except on the road marked out by the Opposition.

The Party is the supreme political weapon. It is in the Party that the possibilities of the revolution and its future are embodied. But it is from this very source that the dangers proceed today. The adventurism of the bureaucracy does not halt with the destiny of the Party. Parallel to the generalized collectivization there takes place the generalized registry of factories and trades in the Party. This means nothing less than the dissolution of the Party into the class, that is, in reality the suppression of the Party. In this way, the bureaucratic apparatus acquires more extended power of oppression.

Its follies do not encounter the resistance of any criticism, neither correctives nor reactions, so long as life does not set itself to reply to them violently. The first warning of this kind has just been given. Everything leads to the belief that the subsequent one will be much more peremptory than all the preceding ones.

The country, even though not very distinctly, is taking this into account very profoundly. Naturally, each class in its own way. A dull uneasiness reigns in the Party. But the order that prevails in the Party is such that nobody would dare to express his fear aloud, nor even to put a question. The regime of "self-criticism" in its new stage consists of the obligation for each and every one to subscribe not only to the precision but also to the "genius" of the leadership and to hound those whom the leadership orders to hound.

Stalin's Victory over the Party

It is evident from this that the "victory" of the Stalinist bureaucracy over the Opposition was at the same time a victory over the Party. This process coincides with the withering away of a whole section of revolutionists, with the growth of bureaucracy and of the petty bourgeoisie in the U. S. S. R., with the strengthening of the capitalist reaction and the social democracy in the whole world, with the defeat of the revolutionary movements, with the weakening of the positions of Communism and the strengthening of opportunist tendencies in its ranks.

The crisis in grain provisioning of 1927-28 having led it to a blind alley the Stalinist apparatus abruptly reversed its positions and entered into struggle against a part of the petty bourgeois forces with whose aid it has set upon the Left wing. Without the slightest hesitation, the Opposition subscribed to this turn about face and declared itself ready to support in full the leadership in any of its move orientated in the sense of a revolutionary policy and a cleansing of the regime within the Party.

But it is now incontestable that the swing to the Left in 1928, constituting a particularly brutal zig-zag, did not result in a new course. It could not result in one, since it was not accompanied by an ideological regeneration of the Party. Nothing has changed: there is still the same miserable and eclectic porridge instead of a living theory; still the same bureaucratic-functionary selection of the personnel, only much narrower; still the same methods of mechanization pushed to the highest degree.

The program of the administrative liquidation of a class is in actuality no less disastrous in the political field than was the scandalous report of Stalin to the conference of Marxist-Agronomists in the field of theory. It is not conceivable that there are not in Lenin's Party thousands upon thousands of people in whose mind the politics and the theory of Stalin does not sow uneasiness and indignation. Nevertheless there was no protest at all. Nobody dared to reply, while in the press the latest brood of reptiles set about to develop the ideas of this illiterate report as being the latest revelation of historical thought.

The leading Stalinist group has arrogated the power in its most cynical form. That is precisely why its supreme point of victory—the moment when the "leaders" of the Right wing capitulated—was at the same time the point of departure for a decrease of its domination over the Party. The coronation of the infallible leadership was judged necessary at the moment when this same leadership felt itself on the eve of bankruptcy.

The Party leads an ever more, ghostly existence. Stalin is much more revoltingly impudent with the Congresses than was the Czar towards the Duma.

Furthermore, on the very inside of the schematic cadres of the Russian Communist Party there are tens of thousands of revolutionary proletarians who can and will become the creative forces in the rebirth of the Party. It is to this nucleus that we attach the destinies of our group.

Conditions of the Opposition Cadres

The circumstances under which the cadres of the Opposition find themselves placed are without example in the history of the revolutionary movement. The harsh material conditions of deportation are aggravated by the application of complete political isolation. The complicated system of State and private measures of order is especially intended to sap the health of the deportees. At the same time the official press brings the Oppositionist relegated to a forsaken spot, triumphant information on the progress of the collectivization, of the industrialization, and on the uninterrupted victories of the Communist Parties throughout the world.

Certain of the isolated and weaker elements do not resist this pressure. But the majority of the capitulations are obviously simulated: broken and exhausted, they sign what they have no belief in. A new series of capitulations is being prepared for the Sixteenth Congress, proceeding from furtive negotiations followed by secret agreements behind the scenes. This sort of stage-play is one of the most disgusting manifestations of revolutionary exhaustion and moral decay. The pathetic invocation of the so-called need of "returning" to the Party betokens only cynicism toward that same Party. For can the Party be served by deception and falsehood? That is why the most "eminent" capitulators are immediately transformed into political cadavers left unburied, while the expelled and hunted Opposition remains an active factor in the life of the Soviet republic and the Communist International.

After all there is nothing very astonishing in this. The innumerable books and pamphlets against the Opposition published since 1923, the special collections of quotations intended for Congresses and Conferences, the collections against "Trotskyism", etc...are today the most convincing proof in favor of the Opposition. We keep our Platform in reserve. They fear it mortally, while seeking to assail it by means of provocative polemics. Yet today as yesterday, the whole ideological life of the Party turns around the Oppositionist Platform as around a pivot.

The declaration of comrade Rakovsky, supported by the fundamental cadres of the Opposition, was an application of the united front towards the Party.

The Centrist leadership replied to it by sharpening the rigors of repression. The Opposition having sincerely proposed to attenuate the rigidity of organization of its struggle for a purely Marxist line, the apparatus replied by having Blumkin shot. We must say it openly to the Party and to the working class. We must explain the import of our proposal, name those responsible for its defeat, and proclaim our indeluctable determination to fight for our opinion and to increase two-fold, five-fold, ten-fold our efforts towards consolidating the Bolshevik Leninist fraction. In that alone can loyalty to the October revolution be manifested today.

A French proverb says that one must know how to fall back sometimes in order the better to leap. That is the condition in which the leadership of the Soviet state, as well as the leadership of the Communist International finds itself at present.

Both are driven by their own adventurism to the depths of an impasse. Placing its "prestige" above the interests of the world revolution, the Centrist bureaucracy draws ever more the noose around the neck of the Party. In matters of tactics, the first task is the following: to beat a retreat by abandoning the positions of adventurism. The retreat is inevitable in any case. It must therefore be carried out as soon as possible and in the best possible order.

A Tribute From a So. African Militant

Cape Town, South Africa

Dear Comrades:

It was with great joy that I received from comrade Glass of Johannesburg the first few copies of the Militant followed a while later by a complete file which you sent him and which I have eagerly read.

As a theorist of Marxist-Leninism as a proletarian strategist, as the embodiment of proletarian sagacity and courage and honesty, as a master of lucid exposition and vivid prose Trotsky is unequalled in the workers' movement. And if the American comrades of the Opposition had done nothing in the past for the movement (and they have—their records are great), and if they should do little in the future (which is extremely unlikely), they yet will deserve and obtain the deep gratitude of all honest Communists for making available in English the writing of the leader of the world Opposition.

Comrade Glass and myself were amongst the small band of comrades in South Africa who from the very first, gave adherence to the teachings of Lenin and Trotsky and took an active part in the publication of the Bolshevik, a monthly journal, at the Cape. Comrade Glass, I believe, has given you an account of the position in the South African Union and I will not dwell on it here save to state that under the leadership of a Stalinized Comintern, the gospel of Marcus Garvey is written large in the platform of the South African Communist Party.

I enclose a donation of ten shillings towards the sustaining fund of the Militant and will endeavour to make it a monthly donation. Wishing you the very best of luck in your splendid work for the cause, I remain

Yours for Communism,
—MANUEL LOPES

In Italy

Italian Fascism and the Economic Crisis

One can best explain the evolution of the fascist movement by following the transformations of Italian capitalism, its difficulties, and its vicissitudes in the course of the economic crisis provoked by the war.

Italian economy, despite its "victory" in the war, has retained its inferior position as compared with the great capitalist powers. The reasons for this economic inferiority lie principally in the lack of raw materials and capital, in the dependence on the importation of machinery from abroad, in the disproportion between the increase of population and the increase of wealth, a disproportion aggravated nowadays by the closing of the frontiers to emigration. All this lends justification to the definition of Italian capitalism as "a capitalism organically feeble" but it is not enough to recall this definition. We must at the same time analyze the changes which have taken place in the economic situation of Italy.

After the War

The war brought with it an extension of the basis of production and under the impulsion of finance capital, even a reorganization of the forms of production. Italian economy came out of the war profoundly transformed. The movement of the concentration and centralization of business enterprise had received a powerful impetus. During the war Italy was compelled to depend on its own resources in industry no less than in agriculture and commerce to provide the materials which it has been accustomed to receive from abroad and especially from Germany. Particularly active in the course of the war and consequently afterwards, were the mining, the machine, chemical and textile industries. Shipbuilding also experienced a big expansion.

As a whole Italian economy came out of the war considerably transformed and developed. But agriculture on the other hand had suffered enormously. The character of the soil was unfavorable to the change in the forms of cultivation required by the situation. In addition there was a scarcity of agricultural workers (the rural male population had been reduced by successive mobilizations from 4 to 2 millions). There was a lack of fertilizer. There was a dearth of cattle. Consequently there was a reduction in the area sown. But despite all these negative features, for the peasantry the war was a source of enrichment thanks to the rise in prices.

With the ending of hostilities, Italy entered on the period of economic crisis in which she still finds herself. In the official organs of the Italian Communist Party, this crisis is habitually characterized as an "organic and progressive crisis". In reality this feature of the crisis is not peculiar to Italy alone; it is what distinguishes in this period the quality of the world economic crisis of capitalism as a whole. It is not enough to say that we are in the midst of an "organic and progressive crisis"; one must study the origins of the crisis and the rhythm of its development.

If it is true that for capitalism to postpone its difficulties does not mean to surmount them, it is no less true that so long as these difficulties can be evaded, they can be momentarily overcome.

A country economically feeble, Italy thus experienced in the most direct and profound fashion the effects of the war crisis. As for other countries so for Italy also it was a crisis of raw materials, of lack of equipment, of capital markets, transport, etc. This raised the following problem: what class would be compelled to shoulder the expenses of the war? In other words, would it be at the expense of wages or of capitalist profits that the problems of prices (the very crux of the present economic crisis) would be resolved? The significance of the violent struggles waged in the post-war period, before and after the advent of Fascism is rendered clear by this sharp contrast between the level of wages and capitalist profits.

In industry as well as in agriculture the cost of production is very high, a fact which does not facilitate sales. Given the specific character of Italian capitalism, it must solve the problem of net costs by operating principally on wages, by increasing the length of the working day, intensifying production, by raising tariffs reducing the cost of maritime and domestic transportation, settling the problem of monetary circulation, balancing the budget, etc.

It was from the necessity of giving a solution to all these problems that fascism was conceived and developed; to gag the workers, to establish the absolute despotism of the employers in the factories, ruthlessly to defend the interests of the bourgeoisie and to give it a single-willed leadership—in a word, as a special attempt of Italian capitalism to assure its own stabilization.

The "Crisis of 1921"

Having overcome the crisis of "demobilization" (1919), the period of factitious prosperity (1920) was followed in Italy as in other countries by a serious economic depression which reached its lowest point in the years 1921-22.

1921 was for Italian economy the most serious of all the afterwar crises. The crisis was industrial, commercial and financial. By comparison with 1920 foreign trade was reduced almost by half. Every phase of economic activity reflected this depression. The value of government bonds fell disastrously. Not only the smaller but even the more gigantic businesses were hard hit. The number of failures reached enormous proportions. The most resounding failure of this period is that of the Ilva at the beginning of 1921 bringing in its wake the crash of the Banque d'Escompte and the ruin of several thousand small depositors. The army of unemployed reached the figure of 463,000 in July 1921. The one profiteer from the crisis was finance which extended its work of conquest.

We have already said that Italian capitalism came out of the war completely transformed and that the organizing activity of the banks assumed at this time a role of great importance. After the war, finance capital, its power reinforced by the war, developed its plan of conquest and domination of Italian economy at an accelerated pace and parallel with it the plan of subjecting to its control the whole state machine. This plan which went on the rocks during the "democratic" government of Nitti (against which both the proletarian masses, on the one hand, rose and the ruined petty bourgeoisie on the other) was completely realized by the government of Mussolini.

The big bourgeoisie (bankers, industrialists, landed proprietors) utilized the fascist movement to destroy the proletarian organizations (trade unions, cooperatives, etc.) but once in power, Mussolini could find no other solution for the demands of the petty bourgeoisie who had been mobilized against the workers—than that ordered by Big Business. From the very first day Fascism exposed its role as the body guard of capitalism. A whole series of measures were adopted that were anything but what the petty bourgeoisie had hoped from "their" government.

The program of financial and economic reconstruction unfolded in accordance with the necessities of the defence of the bourgeoisie. Instead of the "return to a regime of full economic liberty", instead of a "renunciation on the part of the State of these of its functions bearing a monopolist character", etc. from the day of the arrival of the fascist government in power the victory of monopolist capital spread itself over the whole of Italian economy. From this there followed the necessity of a transformation: in the mechanism of production and in that of the state by means of which the bourgeois class exercises its own political domination.

The Revival of 1923 and the New Crisis

At the end of 1922 with a general revival of international economy there was a certain expansion of production. Unemployment decreased substantially. From December 1922 capital investments in joint stock companies acquired an intense tempo. Before the war stock companies numbered 48 with a capital of 2,212,000,000 lire and in 1914, 8,138 with a capital of about 5,000,000,000 lire; in 1923, the number of companies reached the figure of 9,078 with a capital of 28,500,000,000 lire. (At the end of January 1930 existing companies number 16,278 with a total capital of 49,842,500,000 lire.)

All the figures of economic activity during 1923 show the same revival. Money is cheap and its abundance engendered by the inflation still pushes to the development of enterprise and the increase of productive capacity, especially in specific industrial groups (hydro-electric, shipbuilding, chemical industry, artificial silk, etc.). But already towards the end of 1923 there are many signs of weakness. A great discontent prevails among the working classes as a result of the constant wage reductions and the continuous rise in the cost of living. In 1924 unemployment again begins to rise; the situation sharpens. In the meantime, the working class has regained vigor and wants to fight. In this year there are 163,000 unemployed in comparison with the 66,000 of the year before. The petty-bourgeois masses, thwarted by Fascism, crushed under the weight of the cost of living and taxation are in their turn in an agitated state.

That is the situation in which the Matteotti crime supervenes with its enormous repercussions throughout the country.

Rationalization and Capitalist Monopoly

Rationalization is the current term for a three-fold process (a) the introduction of newer industrial methods and more scientific organization to which no one but Gandhi can take objection in themselves, (b) the speeding up and intenser exploitation of the workers which they must resist furiously. This phase of the process is accompanied on occasion by a nominally higher wage, an illusion since it leads to greater output by fewer workers, to more frequent intervals of unemployment and to premature exhaustion. The American engineer, Taylor, formulated the underlying theory of the speed-up some 15 years ago in his "Principles of Scientific Management", and Ford proved their most successful practical exponent. A third phase of rationalization is the weeding out of the smaller and less "efficient" enterprises through the medium of the merger movement in the direction of more complete monopoly.

Before the war bourgeois economists tried to minimize the possible extent of trustification, arguing for example, its alleged failure to make headway in retail distribution. The chain store came to give these economists (always a few laps behind facts of social evolution) something to explain anew. The "marginal utility" theory of value scarcely proved less unreal than their hopes for the "individual entrepreneur", the individual business organizer who was supposed to represent the spirit of competition. The merger movement proved to be more powerful than the cobwebs of the "pleasure and pain" psychology or the Sherman anti-trust legislation. The only question is: will the mergers stabilize capitalism or will they sharpen its dilemma?

Available statistics testify to the great merger impetus of the past few years. The Federal Trade Commission has reported for the United States that a half-dozen companies control one-third of American water power, four companies control one-half of the copper deposits, eight companies control three-quarters of the luminous deposits, etc. In Germany, the Chemical Trust controls practically the entire output of dyes, fertilizers, drugs, explosives, etc. It represents a merger of numbers of separate companies previously operating under a wide range of cartel and other agreements. In Canada the group about Sir Henry Holt brings into one vast combination the Royal Bank, British Empire Steel, Pulp and Paper, and electric power. In addition to the national there have been a number of international combinations like the European Steel Cartel, Franco-German Potash, the European Chemical Trust, International Copper Syndicate, etc.

International Monopolies

The monopolies have mostly been formed in the branches of production producing raw materials or semi-finished products, commodities capable of mass production and easily subject to standardization. The national monopolies are the basis of the international. The purpose of getting together is to increase profits, but not necessarily through a rise in prices. That may also be achieved through standardization, better equipment, all sorts of economies and worsening of labor conditions.

The aim of the international monopolies is either to raise or maintain prices, since there is no scope here for the reduction of the costs of production by more efficient management and organization of production. The rise of the monopoly is reflected in the changed attitude of the capitalist state which is no longer moved by the interests of the small businessman. Even in the United States which went through a Rooseveltian spell of "trust-busting" legislation, all kinds of loopholes are now available to get round the Sherman, Clayton and other acts against "combinations in restraint of trade".

Socialist "Ultra-Imperialism"

As to the significance of the monopolies, there are two basically opposed interpretations. The social-democratic theorist Kautsky wrote some years ago: "From a purely economic point of view it is not impossible that capitalism will yet go through a new phase, that of the extension of the policy of cartels to foreign policy, or of ultra-imperialism". And Hilferding writes: "We have taken a step towards a stable economic society for the first time since the end of the war... capitalism has surrendered the principle bulwark it erected against socialism, the capitalist principle of free competition, for the socialist principle of production according to plan" and from this he sees but a short step towards organized production under state control. In the monopolies, he sees an "economy of conscious organization by the capitalist class".

Sharpened Contradictions

In contradistinction to this view is the revolutionary conclusion of Lenin that "there can be no doubt that development is tending towards the formation of a single all-embracing world-trust which will include all undertakings and all states without exception. This development, however is proceeding at such a rate, in such circumstances, with such contradictions, conflicts and upheavals—not only economic but also political, national, etc.—that even before we arrive at an ultra-imperialist alliance of national-finance capital, imperialism will inevitably collapse and capitalism will turn into its opposite".

The "New Industrial Revolution" cannot strengthen the profit system but increases its difficulties and sharpens its contradictions. The application of the newer industrial technique and the speeding up of labor, both raising the level of human productivity to unheard of levels will further aggravate the market problem of capitalist production, and the general crisis of the whole system. The growing productivity of labor results in lessening the opportunities for employment. This can only mean a contraction of the home market, and in view of the greater industrial competition in the world, a more desperate struggle for the foreign market with the certain perspective of the appeal to arms as the final argument.

The solution of the social crisis lies in the hands of the working class. Its revolutionary political and industrial organization to take power into its own hands as the force most necessary for production, would cut the Gordian knot. The way out lies in the abolition of production for private profit, and in the rational socialist organization and distribution of the world's resources. The New Chemistry and Giant Power must be harnessed to the service of a society of producers. The horde of parasitical coupon-clippers must be abolished, and no less the standing army of the unemployed.

will educate the workers on the kind of "justice" that capitalism dispenses to the workers. Maneuvres, dickers with politicians behind the scenes, failure to rally and to count upon a mass movement of the workers to free the class war prisoners, are methods wrong both from a practical and working class policy. Such ways smack of the methods of "petty-bourgeois politicalism" so vigorously condemned by the official Communist Party in theory and, apparently, so easily adopted in its practices.

Revive the campaign to free the unemployed victims. Build a broad united front movement on behalf of Foster, Amter, Minor and Raymond. Rank and file Communists! Demand that the Party leadership

The Plenum of the American Communist Opposition

By JAMES P. CANNON

Another important step in the development of the Communist Opposition was marked by the full meeting of the National Committee of the Communist League of America—the first full meeting since our National Conference—which has just concluded its sessions in New York City, May 24-27, 1930.

Since our Committee contains representatives of most of the important districts of our organization the committee meeting had the significance of a small conference. Such gatherings are rare with us, and not because we see a virtue in this rarity.

The great difficulties under which we conduct our fight—our numerical weakness, our poverty and the great distances which separate us—preclude for the time being that frequency of representative gatherings toward which we aspire. This makes us value all the more those meetings which are possible under the circumstances and imparts to them an exceptional importance in the life of our organization. We have to expect that such meetings will yield the political maximum and not be merely formal and decorative affairs.

Our National Conference held last year at Chicago bore such a character; and the meeting of the National Committee just held in New York—a meeting, like all our activities, made possible by Spartan sacrifice—will no doubt bring fruitful results in our work for the near future.

Political Unity of Plenum

The National Committee is a unit on all important political questions. We are at one with the leadership of the Opposition on the International field. Exhaustive discussion over a period of several days demonstrated that the fundamental unity of our conceptions on the basic principles which lie at the bottom of our fight as a regiment of the International Marxist Opposition is joined with a complete solidarity on tactical questions and perspectives. This applies to our approach to the general problems of the class struggle as well as to the narrower issues of the struggle against the Centrist bureaucracy in the Communist movement. All these questions are bound together.

The platform adopted at our National Conference a year ago gave a correct Marxist answer to them.

All the intervening experience has served to confirm the platform and it retains its validity today. It forms the basis of the decisions arrived at by the National Committee for the further extension of our fight.

Opposition Platform Confirmed

The economic situation in the country has developed in the main along the line of our analysis and forecast a year ago. There are no important signs yet of a speedy recovery from the industrial crisis and there are many indications of tendencies which will prolong and aggravate it; driving the financial overlords of America irresistibly to seek for a solution at the expense of Europe. A still heavier pressure upon the American proletariat and a sharpening of the international rivalries and conflicts are the inescapable implications of the situation.

Even if the subjective reactions of the American workers proceed slowly—and that is so far the case—the soil is being prepared for a profound change in their attitude toward the capitalist system. There are many reasons to calculate upon an accelerated process of working class radicalization and a vastly expanded field for the development of a proletarian Communist movement. To prevent the reformist canalization of the oncoming movement and to develop its revolutionary implications is the Communist task in the period that lies ahead. The bungling, the corruption, the eclectic zig-zags and Leftist adventurism of the Centrist bureaucracy is the greatest obstacle to the execution of this task and an objective aid to social reformism. The Lovestone Right wing is an ideological bridge to social reformism which will become an increasing danger to the Communist movement in a period of intensifying class struggle. The fight for Marxist methods and Marxist policies falls to the Communist Opposition and is carried on by it alone. Such, in brief, was the general estimate of our Plenum which shaped its decisions regarding our future activities.

The question of perspectives in the crisis in the Communist movement occupied a prominent place in the discussions of the Plenum. On this point clear and definite answers were given. We will not relent in our revolutionary fight against the Centrist bureaucrats for a single moment on a single issue. On the contrary, sharper, more intransigent, more irreconcilable struggle for a Lenin Party was the watchword of our Plenum.

Perspectives of Party Crisis

The opposition, despite all obstacles, all perversions of our standpoint, all suppression all terror, all slander, is growing and will continue to grow in the proletarian ranks of the Party. The internal crisis from which the Opposition is just emerging in a number of European countries has passed us by. We had no capitulators worth mentioning; no elements poisoned by Zinoviev-Maslow cynicism. We unfurled the banner of the International Opposition at the time of its lowest ebb when there could be no perspective but that of a long and stubborn struggle as an expelled minority. Our tradition is the tradition of years of struggle for a proletarian movement against the petty-bourgeois current of Lovestone-Pepper-Wolfe and the trade union eclecticism of Foster-Johnstone-Browder. Thus we were "prepared by the past", as Trotsky said, and the intensity of the struggle does not pull us apart but binds us more firmly together.

Preparing New Forces

We will continue, as before, to base ourselves primarily on the Party and the Left wing workers immediately under its influence. The great bulk of the revolutionary workers are there, and this fact determines our position as a faction of the Party, not as another Party. We do not identify the proletarian revolutionaries in the Party and the Left wing with its corrupted upper stratum. The Plenum, while confirming our general policy on this question made a just criticism of the inadequate organization of our fight within the Party. Measures were adopted providing for more energetic and systematic work in this respect. The near future, thanks to these decisions, will see our unflinching criticism "from without" supplemented by a determined struggle "from within". The recruiting power of the Opposition in the Party ranks is by no means exhausted. It is only beginning as events already maturing will demonstrate. The second layer of Oppositionists will soon confront the Centrist phrase-mongers as an organized faction.

The Needle Trades Situation

An especially interesting and significant phase of the National Committee meeting was a discussion of the situation in the Needle Trades, based on the report of a prominent comrade in the Union who has recently found the way to the Platform of the Opposition. This discussion laid the ground for the preparation of a comprehensive statement of policy in the needle trades crisis, similar to our statement on the Miners' Union, which is soon to be issued in the name of our League. The trade union section of our Platform is borne out by the experiences in the needle trades in all respects and it will provide the guiding line of our concrete statement of policy. The Party leadership has brought the needle trades Left wing to a blind alley. The workers must be told the truth and shown the way out of this blind alley.

This means to give a Marxist analysis which ignores none of the realities and to draw inferences based on the fundamental resolutions of the Comintern under Lenin on the trade union question. The Party bureaucrats have attempted to deal with the crisis by the most shameful scandal-mongering against the Right wing factional opponents of today—their factional brothers of yesterday and brothers yet under the skin. The sole beneficiaries of this monstrous example of "self criticism" up to date are the Black Hundred gang of Schlesinger, Wolf and Co., and in the final analysis the employers. What is needed now is an objective Communist statement of policy that will show the Left wing workers how to regain their lost ground. The discussion of this question at our Plenum indicated the line for such a statement.

Maintain the Weekly Militant

Is it possible to continue the publication of the Weekly Militant? This question, startling in its implications to every supporter of the Opposition who knows its incomparable value, was faced and discussed by the National Committee in the most thoroughgoing and realistic manner. We have no money. The Plenum met without enough on hand to pay for the current issue and it had to be skipped. The regular income of the paper covers only half of the expense. How has the Weekly been maintained up till now? No scientific auditor or accountant would undertake to answer that question. For all the known rules of financial management have been broken and miracles have been performed. Our main resource was the fund established before the Weekly was launched. But that was used up long ago. For months now it has been nip and tuck for every issue. Special donations, loans here and there, last minute collections, voluntary labor, unpaid wages and the devil knows what other expedients tell the story. But now we are flat broke and in debt and the question posed itself categorically: shall we continue? Can we continue? And the answer of the Plenum with one voice was: We can and we will!

Weighing the matter soberly and practically we decided that, great as the sacrifices have been, we have not yet exhausted our resources. Various practical measures for raising new funds and effecting still further economies were decided on. Plans to develop the support from branches through methods employed by the Minneapolis Branch were worked out. A systematic program of meetings, affairs and money-raising devices was projected. Most important of all, perhaps was the decision to carry the appeal to the wide circle of sympathizers through a public campaign in the Militant. Up till now the members of our League—and not all of them—have shouldered the main burden. Now we must broaden out and go to every supporter and sympathizer of our historic movement with the appeal for financial support to maintain the paper.

Trotsky on the Militant

Comrade Trotsky called the Militant an inspiring force for the entire International movement of Communism. He said we should make "heroic efforts" to keep it going as a Weekly. It was with this faith that our movement is capable of even heroic efforts that the Plenum decided to launch a new campaign for the Weekly Militant.

Along with this was the working out of systematic organization and propaganda work to follow the tour of comrade Shachtman. The tour of comrade Shachtman, reporting on his work as our international delegate, cannot fail to strengthen the solidarity of our members with the embattled oppositionists of other lands and to effect a corresponding stimulus in their activity on the national field. An organization tour is to be arranged for early fall, with another meeting of the National Committee and one or more additional lecture tours in preparation for our Second National Conference in the Spring. The program of book and pamphlet publication long deferred for financial reasons, will also soon begin. The necessary organization of the Left wing workers who sympathize with our policy will soon begin to take shape in at least a few unions, according to the decision of the Plenum. All together, it can be said without exaggeration that the meeting of the National Committee will bear fruit in the development of our organization work as well as in political and ideological consolidation.

Strengthening the Center

The final important action of the Plenum was the decision to strengthen the Central administration by the addition of other qualified comrades. By this decision comrade Spector is to remain in New York and comrade Swaback is to come in the near future.

With these additions to the center it will begin to take more definite shape as the nucleus of a political committee of the Communist movement reacting to all issues of the class struggle, which is the true and proper function of the leading body of the Opposition. The progressive development of such a leading political group is unquestionably one of the great historic tasks which the Opposition must accomplish in preparation for the future. Our struggle against the stream, under a machine-gun fire of calumny, is not without its positive sides. It is a testing and sifting process in which the capacities of revolutionaries to solve problems by their own resources and to remain steadfast in the struggle for principle is determined. Without such qualities a genuine proletarian leadership is impossible. The history of the International labor movement teaches no lesson more clearly than this one.

The ruling bureaucrats have no need to bring a Marxist objectivity and moral prerequisites to their offices. They secure appointment by an infinite capacity for obedience to those "above them" and they rule by arbitrary command over those "below". The inevitable outcome of such a perverted system is not only a political, but also a moral stultification. It would be the greatest folly to imagine that such people, on the whole, can constitute the leading force of the proletarian movement on a Leninist path. Exceptions are possible in the case of individuals, but the decisive nucleus of the future leadership will not and cannot come from that corrupted circle which is today befouling the banner of Communism and undermining its influence. Our task is to develop the leadership of the future in the struggle against them. The Plenary meeting of our National Committee, by all of its work and decisions, as well as by its mature political approach to them, was a striking demonstration that our fight has already yielded positive results along this line.

Consolidation

If the Plenum registered a political and ideological consolidation within our organization, the mass meeting which followed its adjournment showed an expansion and an increased confidence and enthusiasm of the sympathizing forces around us. Suppression, terrorism, hooliganism—after a temporary "victory"—are bringing the unavoidable reaction. The Communist workers, more and more, want to hear our message. And when they hear it, it becomes their own. There was a warmth and friendliness in this audience, made up in large part of new people, which offered a sharp contrast to the partly hostile, partly curious, crowds we faced in the earlier days of our open struggle.

The successful mass meeting was a fitting culmination to the Plenum. Both events said clearly to all who want to hear: the Opposition is on the march, its road is forward.

Mexico Stalinists Continue Splitting

The Stalinist leadership of the Communist Party of Mexico continues its splitting policy, the latest victim of the present "line" being comrade David Alfaro Siqueiros, General Secretary, until his recent removal by Party orders, of the Unitarian Sindicalist Confederation. One of the principal charges against comrade Siqueiros is that he supports the Left Opposition, about which we have no exact information as yet, but which indicates the narrow sectarian policies of the official Party leadership. Siqueiros was a member of the Central Committee of the Mexican Party until recently, and was also head of the Mexican delegation at the Latin American Trade Union Congress held at Montevideo, Uruguay in 1929. Comrade Siqueiros is at present under arrest for participation in the May Day demonstration.

We are also aware of the fact that two of the five members of the Central Committee of the Young Communist Federation of Mexico have been barred from activity, an act equivalent to their suspension. These comrades, Eduardo Calero and Jorge Pino are also accused vaguely by the Stalinist bureaucrats of "sympathy with the Opposition" and causes.

Social Democratic BetrayalAnswer to a Socialist Worker

We are in receipt of a letter from H. Engelman, a socialist worker in which he takes issue with our bitterness of attack on socialists in general and Norman Thomas, American S.P. leader in particular. The glittering theory of "social fascism" conjured up by the present Comintern regime lumps together the social-democratic officialdom and rank and file in the same fascist pot. It is a theory we decidedly repudiate. We are in a period not of direct revolutionary crisis when arguments must mount the barricades but of preparing the forces of a revolutionary class movement. Accordingly we do not believe that the best way of convincing our correspondent is by cracking his skull open, say with a blackjack. We recall a speech of Zinoviev's when still an authority in which he sharply condemned the tactics of raising a physical barrier between Communist and social democratic workers. That speech published in the theoretical organ of the International retains all its validity.

"I am a socialist," the letter runs, "because I do not believe in acquiring anything through violence and blood-shed. I am a true follower of Debs. Of course our Party is infected by opportunists and traitors. Every party has them. Even the Communist Party..." And further on he adds, "while I agree with your denunciations, I fail to comprehend your conclusions. You predict that if Norman Thomas was in MacDonald's position he would do the same in regards to our colonial policy. You know this is a very dangerous argument, because the same thing can be said of you or anyone else. What is there to assure us that if Trotsky replaces Stalin the former will adhere to Leninist principles... Suppose I grant the indictment of European socialists. Are they the only workers' movement that is misleading the workers? According to yourself, Stalin is doing the same. Does that mean the Communists are unworthy of workers' support? No, you will have betrayals in any movement, no matter what color it is... You cannot indict a whole movement..."

Indictment of Social Democracy

But of course you can indict a whole movement in the sense that we indict the "social democracy", and the author of the letter would have no difficulty in understanding us if his philosophical point of departure were historical materialism instead of a vague idealism and his argumentation grounded in the realities of the class struggle instead of the sterility of social pacifism. There are well-intentioned, honest, "sincere" and "cultured" people on all sides. But the essence of the matter is the class struggle which rages throughout the capitalist world between those who live by the extraction of rent, interest and profit, determined to maintain their privileges and perquisites either by "democratic" or fascist means and the class subjected to exploitation. Leaders, parties and movements in the social struggle, their program, and their deeds are motivated by class interests.

When we indict the Social Democracy we indict the petty-bourgeois bureaucracy which is in control of the masses, and history has made it possible to predict the course of that bureaucracy with tolerable accuracy. The program of the social democracy is a program of class collaboration, of constitutionalism, of parliamentarism, of legislative reformism in accordance with the interests of the petty-bourgeoisie. It follows inevitably that the socialist leaders will oppose the developing mass action of the workers at every turn in the struggle against Capital, from choking off strikes in the interests of "conciliatory methods" to forcefully resisting the proletarian revolution. In logical accordance with their class interests the socialists practise coalition government with the bourgeoisie and reject the idea of the proletarian dictatorship. It follows inevitably that social reformism and opportunism (class collaboration on the basis of "democracy" in time of peace) will be translated into social imperialism and patriotism ("National Defense") in time of war.

A Record of Betrayals

The records of the past few decades bear this out in full. You cannot serve both the bourgeoisie and the proletariat without committing social treachery. The historic function of the social democracy, ever since its break with Marxism, has been that of an agency of the bourgeoisie inside the working class movement, and the conscious recognition of this fact by the individual social democratic leaders is not necessary to make it true. The march of events speaks for itself. For years before the world war, the Left inside the Second International warned against the ominous consequences of socialist opportunism, of ministerialism, of parliamentary cretinism. The collapse of the International on the declaration of war like a pack of cards was a complete vindication of the Left struggle against both the Right wing and the centrists.

Can it be gainsaid that the German Social Democracy ruined the prospects of the Revolution of 1918 for the working class? With every nerve they consciously worked for the restoration of German capitalism. They deluded the workers with paper plans of socialization. They called in the white guard generals to help crush the revolutionary Spartacist movement with fire and sword. They liquidated the Soviet movement in favor of the bourgeois Assembly in Weimar. They came to the rescue of the capitalists in every subsequent crisis, and notably in 1923. They

The Suicide of Vladimir Mayakovsky

The most celebrated of the contemporary Russian poets, the futurist Mayakovsky shot himself in the heart on April 14th in Moscow. He was for years at the height of renown and in the limelight. Indefatigably he spread in the gazettes a socialist optimism of the most orthodox kind. His evolution was still more marked in this direction lately. Only a few weeks ago he gave his resounding adherence to the Society of Proletarian Writers of Moscow. His unexpected end is almost inexplicable.

This audacious spirit, this enemy of romanticism and sentimentality wrote in a final note addressed "to all" that suicide was certainly not a solution, but there was no other way out for him.

He made some reference to affairs of the heart that were thwarted by the conditions of life. After which the publicist Koltsov who knows how to make fun of a reader compares in the Literary Gazette the "accident" that happened to Mayakovsky with the accident to Shelley who was drowned while canoeing, and Verhaeren who was run over by a train. One can obviously not make these comparisons without a cultivated sense of humor. At the same time there was a good deal of talk of illness. But neither affairs of the heart, nor even serious illness can entirely explain the end of such a man.

This death supervened after eighteen months of heavy literary confusion (not a production, not a single one during this whole lapse of time) but frenzied campaigns against Tom, Dick and Harry, major and minor excommunications, incessant recognition of mistakes! It is certain that we did not know how to hold this artist. The great official fame and publicity he received, the money success, were not sufficient for him, perhaps because of the element of falseness involved and the emptiness that he experienced from it. He was a magnificent "fellow traveler" of the revolution useful and courageous; he squandered the best part of himself in futile and harassing search for some correct ideological line that he could never find for many reasons, and that a handful of petty pedants and petty censors demanded from him because that was their job, their way of earning their bread and butter (not in the sweat of their brow). Having become a brilliant rhymster, the most sought after by the newspapers he suffered from this daily demand which was bound to be ruinous to his art and the richest part of his personality. He made the best of a bad job up to a certain point. His work of the last years remained very unequal and full of weaknesses. He was aware of this. He felt himself diminishing. He did not cease to justify himself and to plead superior force.

What lesson can be drawn from the finish of this career of a great poet attached delivered the German workers over to the tender mercies of the Dawes and Young Plans. And has the course of the "Labor Government" in Great Britain differed in any essential respect? What plans and election promises of socialism have they carried out even on an "installment" plan? They have not had the power? Then what are they doing in office. They are serving the class that has the power—the capitalist class.

We have adduced the classic experience of the German and the British social democrats. We could with equal truth, space permitting, have dealt with the like "socialist" evidence from Sweden, Belgium, Denmark, France or any other party in the Second International. Consider the Russian Mensheviks who strove obstinately to divert the Russian revolution into the channels of a conventional bourgeois republic for expansion of private capital; and now continually hope for a crisis which will compel the Soviet Union to retrace its path to a "democratic revolution" (denationalization of the factories, a stop to collectivization of the country-side, cessation of support of revolutionary movement abroad, entrance into League of Nations, etc.).

The Role of the Maxtons

The writer of the letter refers to the Independent Labor Party (Maxton group) as the "real" socialist party. Once more he argues from the present pseudo-oppositionist of the Maxton group as if we had no political experience of the role of the "Independent" socialists in the working with every fiber to the present—to this present which Yessenin could never completely grasp. The better part of wisdom is to leave these "fellow travelers" to find their own road, and to find their own work without pretending to baptize them, catechize them, regiment them, without imposing on them too minute requirements, without imagining that one can by the combined method of copyright, suppression, criticism and lashings in the press "bolshhevize" them to the marrow.

A Stalinized «Ten Days That Shook the World»

No proper appraisal of the Bolshevik Revolution of November, 1917, can be made without giving due consideration to all the leaders of the Russian people who played leading roles and made the Revolution possible.

That is why we of the Opposition so insistently and always expose the attempted falsifications of history of Yaroslavsky and other Stalinist historians. Comrade Trotsky's great part in the revolution cannot be explained away permanently. Future history we know must give him the credit due him.

I have just seen the picture "Ten Days That Shook the World". The great mass events of the "Ten Days" are faithfully given. The photography, direction and scenery are all wonderful and as we know from other Russian pictures, it is a refreshing change from the usual American pictures. But the point any serious student of events will notice very quickly in "Ten Days" is the entire omission of L.D. Trotsky anywhere in the acting of the picture. The impression an uninformed observer gets is that he must have played a very minor role when we all know that the names of Lenin and Trotsky were inseparably connected with the whole Revolution as well as all of the first years following it.

I could not help but ask myself, "What would Lenin say?" about the entire omission of the man who was President of the Petrograd Soviet in the crisis and of whom Stalin himself has written, "All the work of practical organization was conducted under the immediate leadership of the President of the Petrograd Soviet, comrade Trotsky. It is possible to declare with certainty that the swift passing of the garrison to the side of the Soviet, and the bold execution of the work of the Military Revolutionary Committee, the Party owes principally and above all to comrade Trotsky." (Pravda, No. 241—"Role of the Most Eminent Party Leaders".)

class movement. But we have, and it is more than melancholy experience. These "Left Oppositions" in the social democracy are always the reflection of rank and file unrest, dissatisfaction and radicalization. The function of the Maxtons is to canalize this movement, avowedly to prevent it from flowing into the currents of Communism. Their "independence" is a sham. In the course of the developing class struggle in Germany, the Independent Socialists split, the Right going to the majority socialists, the Left to the Communists. The Austrian social democracy presents one of the most shameful spectacles of verbal radicalism as a cover for a petty bourgeois policy of surrender to the pressure of big bourgeois reaction. A municipal program of bigger and better apartment houses and swimming pools cannot conceal the fact that in every crisis Otto Bauer and his associates have held the proletariat back from revolutionary action to the point where the forces of the bourgeoisie, of clericalism and fascism have never been so powerful since the war.

The Way of Thomas

In the light of all this we see no reason for inventing some unique exception to the internationally tested principles and experiences of the class struggle so as to exempt Norman Thomas.

Just now it costs him nothing gently to remind the British labor imperialists of the necessity of a modicum of internationalism in their relations with India. It would not be difficult to find an equivalent sentiment among certain sections of the petty bourgeoisie outside the socialist leadership. After all this is England's funeral. It was not hard in the past, nor in the war to whip up petty bourgeois enthusiasm for the right of self-determination of the other fellow's subject nationalities and more than once the world rocked with accusations of Belgium's mismanagement of the Congo, of Germany's brutalities in her African colonies, of Austrian repressions in Bosnia. During the Brest Litovsk negotiations even the German militarists suddenly manifested an ardent desire for the self-determination—of the Ukraine... But this Norman Thomas is the man who shortly after the New York civic elections proposed to change the name of his party from "socialist" in order to make it more palatable to and indistinguishable from, the liberals, and was only prevented by the opposition of the more cautious Hillquit.

The Line of Bolshevism

We are quite ready to have the record of Bolshevism stand comparison. The achievements of the socialist dictatorship speak for themselves. Under the Communists the Russian workers conquered political power and have held it. They are building the foundations of a socialist society. If they have encountered formidable difficulties the principal reason is not far to seek. The isolation of the Soviet Union, the retardation of the international revolution is the basic objective factor in the difficulties of socialist construction and for this isolation, the successive betrayals of the social democracy and its cooperation with the bourgeoisie, is in turn chiefly responsible. The Communists made mistakes but these mistakes were of an entirely different character from the "mistakes" of the social democrats which were sheer counter-revolution.

Certainly there is no absolute guarantee against the manifestation of conciliatory and social democratic tendencies inside the Communist movement. The present struggle of the factions in the Comintern testifies to that. Under conditions of capitalist stabilization and encirclement of the Soviet Union, of the slowing up in the pace of the world revolution, the petty bourgeoisie begins to exert a pressure on the Soviet and Comintern apparatus that is dangerous. The consequences of such pressure have in some major instances already been tragic. It has been the requirements of the resistance to this petty bourgeois pressure on the Party that has given rise to the fight of the Left Opposition for the continuity of the line of Marx and Lenin against both the Right and Centrist factions in the Comintern. With a keen memory of the reasons for the degeneration of the social democratic leadership, the Left Opposition is determined to fight to the end against every revision of the program of the proletarian revolution, against every deviation from the base of internationalism.

Towards the XVI Congress of the C.P.S.U.

Dissolving the Communist Party into the Class

At the end of January 1930, a new recruitment of workers into the Communist Party of the Soviet Union was proclaimed. The February issues of the Pravda are full of information about the "great upsurge", about "the mass flocking of workers into the Party" etc. The Central Committee has already given the directives: "To get not less than half the Party membership from workers in industry until the Sixteenth Party Congress" (Pravda, Feb. 11). Translating this into the language of figures it means that in approximately two months the Party has to admit a minimum of about 150,000 new members*. Up till now there are already about 200,000 applicants. In a few weeks the number of members and candidates in the Party will exceed 2 million.

Collective Admission

All the newspaper statements underline the collective character of submitting applications for admission to the Party. They enter in brigades, shifts, crafts, and even whole factories. Factory crafts, that "is several hundred men, with the foremen at the head, and often even with the technicians and engineers, are poured into the Party. The nuclei grow, 100, 200 and more percent. Formally, the procedure for admission is as always, individual, but in reality the admission is collective. The newspapers and the Party leaders insist that the commissions for recruitment rush with the formalities. The Central Recruiting Commission decided to "simplify the admission into the Party" (Pravda, March 4). This is why, in view of the purely formal character of the procedure, the percentage of rejected applicants is extremely insignificant. The lack of the least serious judgement of candidates, in a word, all this really anti-Party method of the campaign is already alarming the less short-sighted Communists.

The pursuit of high percentages (almost always fictitious) result in the fact that a recruiting agent, grabbing by the sleeve one who refuses to join the Party begins to persuade, advise, etc. As a result—a worker correspondent remarks in the Pravda—"political illiterates having insignificant industrial experience go into the Party". What this policy leads to can be seen from the partial cleansing of the Party. For example, in one of the Donbas districts (Usovca) one third of the members in the industrial nuclei were expelled (Pravda, February 1). The results of the cleansing in Sumara speak still more eloquently that the apparatus has wiped out the boundary line between the Party and the class, taken into the Party a raw mass, which is not only not transformed in the Party melting pot but in view of the terrible condition of the inner-Party regime, is pushed away, either by expulsion, or by falling away. In place of those falling out, new raw material is poured in. The Party entrance and exit gates are wide open.

A Premium on Political Illiteracy

Almost the only, at any rate, the decisive criterion for admission into the Party is the question of the productive work and the "model discipline" of the applicant. "The most important proof of fitness for admission into the Party, is the degree of the active participation of the workers in the shock brigades, in socialist competition, and their actually advanced role in industry"—these are the instructions of the C. C. of the C. P. S. U. (Pravda, Feb. 11). Did you participate in socialist competition? How many days were you absent from work? How much did you subscribe for the loan, and did you sell it? In what way do you help collectivization? These, and some more in the same spirit, are the questions that are asked of an applicant. There are no Party and political questions. (Even "classic" Trotskyism is absent.) One may think it is a matter of one's admission into the cooperative or the trade union, this is the extent to which Party spirit is lacking. But what does the Stalinist apparatus need that for? It looks upon the new additions to the Party only as a "shock" support to the industrial organs. Lacking any kind of political outlook the adventurist leaders consider this—sometimes semi-compulsory (the chairman asks: "Who is against?") naturally, there aren't any. All voet ("for") inclusion of crafts and factories into the Party as a means of raising the productivity of labor, as a more successful realization of intensification and higher tempos. They are not concerned as to what becomes of the Party, or whether the Party exists as such.

The Gap Between Leaders and Masses

In December 1929 the influx of workers into the Party was still very low. But now, the Pravda states, "there is an unexpected great change". The Party organizations are caught "unawares". "At the factory something unexpected and unforeseen occurred: columns of workers sign up for the Party. The nucleus could in no way expect it" (Pravda). The writers and editors do not even notice what a fatal verdict this is for the Party regime, what a terrifying statement on the deterioration of all the Party tissues. If we assume, according to the apparatus—that there really is a mighty rise in the working class, and the apparatus sitting there does not know anything, "does not expect" anything, "does not foresee" anything, then it must be recognized that it is separated from the mass with an impenetrable partition. The fact in itself shows even to the blind, the depth of the abyss the apparatus has dug between itself and the mass.

The Kolomensk factory entered the Party almost in a collective body. Eight thousand workers from this factory already entered the Party. "The Kolomensk workers should be an example to the others"—appeals Pravda. It is therefore interesting to consider this factory in a few words.* The Kolomensk factory produces machinery (tractors, locomotives, Diesels etc.), it is something over a hun-

* The figures on the age of those in the factory entering the Party are very interesting. Most of them are 30-40 years old—this holds true for other places. Fifty percent of them have more than ten years of industrial experience. "The change that occurred among the older workers, those working in the factory for the last 20-30-40 years, is particularly gratifying," Pravda writes. It is doubtful whether this fact is "particularly gratifying". An old worker who was not shaken by the October, or the civil war—is advanced. The youth, the Comsomols, that is the most advanced and active part of the mass is lagging behind. This symptom is more alarming than "gratifying".

tragic collaboration of the Stalin-Bucharin faction with the bourgeois Kuomintang in China and the connected theory of Workers and Peasants Parties as substitutes for the Communist Party in the colonial countries.

But instead of soberly recognizing their mistakes, the Stalin faction desperately clings to office by the sowing of illusions inside the official Communist parties. On May 30th, the Daily Worker dedicated almost its entire issue to heralding the convocation of the "First Soviet Congress of China". There are no words strong enough to condemn the criminal and fantastic light-mindedness with which the Daily Worker misrepresents the actual situation in China. An eighth of the whole territory of the country, it is claimed, is under the sway of Soviet authority. Yet the fact is that there is not a single Communist daily in the country. Thanks to the consequences of the Stalin-Chiang Kai-Shek alliance in the Kuomintang the Communist Party first subordinated to bourgeois discipline for years, was then decimated by the executions of Hankow and Shanghai. The Red Trade Union movement was devastated by the White Terror. The Canton insurrection was drowned in blood.

Nevertheless, with that the adventurism which is the reverse side of Stalinist opportunism, the Sixth Congress refused to work out a series of transitional demands about which to rally the masses anew. As a substitute for the Communist Party and the requirements of mass action, recourse was now had to armed bands who roamed the country waging sporadic guerried kilometres from Moscow. The proletarian staff of the factory was always considered in the Moscow Party organization as a backward one, and it really was. Over 70% of the workers are not only "bound" to the village, but they have their own cabin, cow, garden, etc. The brother, the father of a Kolomensk worker is a peasant, he works in the factory and helps them—they own their holdings together. The psychology of an average Kolomensk worker is that of a peasant. He often considers his work in the factory as a support for his peasant holding. A Kolomensk worker resembles very little the Leningrad proletarian. It is this factory that became now the vanguard of the workers army, and Leningrad its rearguard. (Up to March 14 the Moscow district had over 90,000 applicants and the Leningrad about 30,000). And it is no accident. An explanation for this fact will be found not in the city, but in the village, and particularly in the "collective" policy. The collective pushed the Kolomensk, Podolsk and Mytishchensk worker into the Party. His peasant status decided. Without penetrating into the complicated problems of collectivization we nevertheless will point out that the element of insurance played no small role. "I will have to enter the collective anyway, then I may as well enter it as a Communist—there will be more privileges." This way he hopes to get easier credits, inventory, etc. On the other hand—and this is the most important—the non-Party worker in the factory does not see any big difference between himself and the Party worker. Why shouldn't I get into the Party, perhaps it will be easier—he asks himself. Depriving the Partyite, as well as the non-Party of all rights, pressing them in the bureaucratic clamps, the usurpationist apparatus has made of both of them speechless executors.

Neither the non-Party nor the Party worker dares to decide, criticize, or deliberate. Opening wide the Party doors wipes out the distinction between the Party and the class. The Party ceases to be the vanguard, it ceases to be a Party. But this is precisely what the apparatus is striving for. Simultaneously with the dissolution of the Party in the class, the apparatus rises above it all the more. Both these processes are parallel, one supplementing the other. On the top the apparatus became a supra-Party institution, it is without control, it is infallible, it commands—the Party below ceases to exist. The further development of this process is the decay, the death of the Party as a Party—we must be frank about this, stating it with all determination. March 30, 1930

Trifling with the Textile Workers Union

The decline of the Left wing National Textile Workers Union goes on. While the United Textile Workers Union, with its policy of class collaboration continues to gain recruits among the textile workers, especially in the South, the N. T. W. U. is steadily losing ground.

When one studies the activities, or rather lack of activities of the N. T. W. U. during the last period it is amazing that even the shell of the union continues to function, for there is no doubt whatsoever that only a mere skeleton of the organization is left.

At the center the notoriously incompetent Clarence Miller has been replaced by William Murdoch who is now in charge of the national office. Murdoch has had his eye on the secretaryship for many months and at last is rewarded for his patience and subservency. Previous to Eli Keller's election to that post almost a year ago he was an active candidate for the post, but due to the opposition of Jim Reid, the president of the union and others, he was not given the position.

Murdoch is the fourth secretary of the union in about a year's time. First there was Albert Weisbord, who was removed for not following out the third period program as desired by the Stalinists. He was succeeded by Eli Keller who became a Lovestoneite. The next was Miller who has likewise disappeared from the scene. How long will Murdoch be at his post?

The appointment of a new national secretary of the union is accompanied by a new district organizer in New Bedford, which was and still is the only city where the union has any members. At one time it numbered about 3,000. At present about 300 are left. The previous organizer, Martin Russak, from Newark, has been removed for some sort of a deviation. His successor, Joe Rappaport from New York, is the fifth within a year. He follows Keller and Ellen Dawson now in the camp of the Right wing Lovestoneites and John Nahorsky, a fourth rate functionary who asked to be relieved when he found that the job was too big for him.

As we stated in several previous articles and now repeat: unless the Stalinist stranglehold is removed from the N.T.W.U. and all militant and left wing workers who belong to the organization are allowed to freely participate in its work, there will be no organization left, except in the minds of the Party "leaders" and in the reports of the Daily Worker and other Party papers.

The textile workers, especially in the South, are ripe for organization but the irresponsible policy of the Party alienates them. Many workers who join drop out in disgust, others never join due to the typical methods used by the Stalinists who head the organizations.

Members of the organization must demand the end of this policy at once and the opening of a campaign to organize the textile workers into the N. T. W. U. on a basis which will allow all militant workers to participate in its activities. Any other policy will mean that before the year is out, the union will exist only in name and all the gains achieved by several years of struggle in Passaic, New Bedford and Gastonia will be lost. What will the Party choose?

BACK TO LENIN! MANIFESTO TO THE RANK AND FILE AND SEVENTH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE C. P. U. S. A.

The crisis in the Party, manifest to all but the self-contented bureaucracy, demands the most serious attention of all Communist workers. It is to aid them to break through the rigid barriers erected by the ruling regime in the Party for the worthless "pre-convention discussion" that the Left Opposition addresses this appeal to the Party membership.

There is a widening gap between the possibilities for the strengthening of the movement in the United States and the accomplishments that the leadership has to record. The increase in Party membership and influence over the workers corresponds less and less to the activity of the Party. There is not a single mass organization of the workers where the Party has succeeded in consolidating or advancing its position in the past year or two, be it in the Left wing unions, in the conservative A. F. of L. and independent unions, in the cooperatives, in the numerous language fraternal orders, etc. In the ranks of the Party itself there is a deadening passivity, an indifference and a growing dissatisfaction with the prevailing Party course, which are prevented from completely paralyzing all activity only by feverish administrative lashings and the ever harder measures of the control commission.

In the upper strata of the Party, new "leaders" appear every day and old "leaders" disappear or are demoted without the Party or working class knowing anything about it until they are informed by the official press. The suppression of all initiative and the complete dependence of all activity upon decrees from above make the Party immobile, and the leadership endeavors to make up for the Party's failure to meet situations in time by plunging it unprepared into adventures and consequent debacles.

The Party's immobility and the leadership's adventurism is the more dangerous because of the broad perspectives for the growth of Communism in this country.

Apart from the historical causes, the immediate reasons for the bourgeois, class-collaborationist ideology and political backwardness of the American workers have been the relative prosperity it enjoyed in the past few years and the privileged position it occupied in comparison with the European and Asiatic working class. The American workers have developed for the better part of a decade under the illusion of a "permanent prosperity".

The Economic Crisis

The collapse of the stock market, the deep-going decline and crisis in industry,

For Unity of Communist Ranks

We raise before the Party convention the question of restoring the Party membership of the expelled comrades of the Opposition on the basis of the foregoing statement of aims and views. We also propose to the Convention that it take a stand for the reestablishment of the Unity of the Communist International by calling for the reinstatement of the Russian and International Opposition, and for the immediate cessation of those measures which especially undermine the Party and the Proletarian Dictatorship and strengthen the enemies of the working class—the arrests, exile and banishment of the Russian Opposition.

— FROM THE PLATFORM OF THE COMMUNIST OPPOSITION ADOPTED (CHICAGO) MAY 20, 1929.

and the creation of a huge army of the unemployed are having the effect of wiping out this illusion in the minds of broad sections of the working class. The sharp contrast between the previous "prosperity" and the misery of unemployment which and hangs like a Damoclean sword over has cut into more than 6 million workers the rest of them, is jolting the working class out of its bourgeois stupor. A deep-going process of radicalization is beginning to take place. The process will be accelerated by the exhaustion of the "prosperity reserves" of the workers. The attempts of American capitalism to issue out of its crisis by a re-adjustment of its industry for more effective competition on the world market, attempts which spell rationalization, wage-slashing, and in general an offensive upon the workers' standards of living, can only hasten the process. U.S. imperialism can re-create a bourgeois working class in this country, such as England had at the opening of the century, only by enslaving the rest of the world, the mere endeavor of which involves the most violent military and revolutionary eruptions.

Under the pressure of these developments, the American workers are moving away from bourgeois influence and ideology, and their former passivity. There is a growing mood for struggle and militancy. The huge demonstration on March 6 and even the smaller ones of May Day

Rally to Weekly

New York Leads the Way!

As we go to press, we are informed that the New York Executive of the Communist League (Opposition) has met in response to our appeal for $2,000 to maintain the Weekly Militant, and has pledged a sum of $500.00 toward this end. A Day's Pay from every member of the Branch was accepted as an immediate action. In addition, the Branch members will proceed to canvass sympathizers with special lists, and will inaugurate house to house collections and other means to assure it quota of $500.00 being raised in the given time.

New York has set a good example. We look forward with confidence for adequate pledges and results throughout the country.

The Militant has been a fighting guide to the Communists and Left wing in their struggle against the labor bureaucracy of the A. F. of L. and the "labor leaders" of the Hillman-Beckerman A. C. W. crew.

The Militant has fought for the organization of the masses of unorganized workers into labor unions on a militant industrial basis.

For the Unemployed

The Militant has conducted a campaign on behalf of the unemployed millions under the slogans of work or compensation, for social insurance, the six hour day and the five day week, etc., and has mercilessly and accurately shown up the thread-bare "prosperity" of the imperialist regime of Hoover and Company.

The Militant has maintained a consistent position for revolutionary Communism, for the preservation and defense of the Russian Bolshevik Revolution. It has with equal vigor combatted the revisionist theories, the opportunism and bureaucracy that have been nourished by and grown to huge proportions under the directions of the false disciples of Lenin — the Stalins and Bucharins.

For the Opposition

The Militant has espoused the cause of the Russian Opposition—the Bolshevik-Leninists led by Trotsky—who, in prison or in exile, maintain the struggle for the preservation of the proletarian dictatorship and who struggle for the regeneration of the Party of Lenin on its October basis.

The Militant fights for the building of a revolutionary Communist Party in the United States on a Leninist foundation, as against the caricature of one as developed by the Fosters and Lovestones.

The Militant as a WEEKLY publication, has been better able to carry on these historic tasks than in its early days as a semi-monthly paper.

Last week, we spoke of the danger and possibility of a return by the Militant to existence again as a semi-monthly. We called upon our readers, members and sympathizers to render us financial assistance that we may continue as a Weekly Militant in the forthcoming period, and to solidify our position.

The Second National Convention of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union met in New York City last Saturday and Sunday, June 7th and 8th. There were over four hundred delegates present of whom 307 hailed from New York. According to official reports 200 shops sent delegates from New York City. In other words this is an indication of the lack of Left wing organization in the thousands of New York shops which were not represented.

The two days of the convention were devoted to combatting the Lovestonites, without any intelligent discussion of the actual needs of the union. The General Executive Board that was elected was a continuation of the Stalinist factionalism which is undermining the Left wing influence in the unions. Not only were one-hundred percent members of the Stalin faction and their plant supporters elected to office but even Party members who at one time or another had happened to express a word of criticism or were unfortunate enough to harbor an independent thought were eliminated from the G. E. B. in spite of their superior experience.

We go to press just as the convention concluded and are therefore compelled to hold over for the next issue a thorough and detailed analysis of the course and perspectives of the Industrial Union.

Save Georgia Class War Prisoners

One of the most brazen examples of American capitalist class justice is the attempt to send to the electric chair the six militant workers, H. M. Powers, Gilmer Brady, Henry Storey, Joseph Carr, Mary Dalton and Anna Burlak, the last three of whom are members of the Young Communist League, at Atlanta, Georgia. The Southern Bourbons threaten to deprive them of their lives for holding meetings of Negro and white unemployed workers and for distributing Communist literature! For this they have resurrected from the archives of 1861 an unused law on insurrection.

The indictment is so astounding that it seems almost incredible. But if anyone thinks this is just some farcical trickery with which the reactionaries of Georgia are trying to amuse themselves let them at once drive this dangerous illusion out of their head. These legal lynchers are in deadly earnest. They want the blood of the workers. They hope to terrorize the Negro and white workers, and prevent organization for better conditions. They want to maintain the South as the stronghold of feudal reaction while the most modern methods of industrial exploitation are developed. But they live in the past.

The alarm must be sounded. The workers of America must be aroused to the terrible fate which await these six workers in the prisons of Atlanta, if the bloodhounds of the South are permitted to carry through their murderous plans. Remember Sacco and Vanzetti! Remember Mooney and Billings!

Senate Red-Baiting Probe Starts

WASHINGTON—(FP)—Edgar Hoover, chief of the Bureau of Investigations in the Department of Justice—the job formerly held by W. J. Earns—will testify behind locked doors, June 9, in the first session of the star-chamber hearings to be conducted by the special House committee on investigation of Communist plots in the U.S. Rep. Fish of New York, chairman of the committee, announced the program when he emerged from a secret session of the five committeemen in Speaker Longworth's office, June 4. Longworth, Majority Leader Tilson and Chairman Snell of the Rules committee, the actual bosses of the House, had been in meeting with Fish and his associates. They had apparently agreed that about $40,000 would be provided by the House for the early expense of the probe.

Barring of the press and public from the hearings at which the governmental departments' officials will testify, was declared by Fish to be necessary. Oscar Lühring, head of the criminal section of the Department of Justice, was slated as the second witness. After him would be summoned anti-radical spokesmen from the Labor, Postoffice, War, Navy, Treasury Commerce and State Departments. The evidence and allegations given to the committee by these administration officials was to be confidential. The press would have no chance to analyze or dispute it.

On the other hand, Fish said, he expected to summon President Green of the American Federation of Labor and Acting President Woll of the National Civic Federation to testify in open sessions. The date for their appearance had still to be arranged. When Congress adjourns, the committee will conduct hearings in New York City. Ralph Easley of the National Civic Federation and other prominent anti-Communists will be invited at that time.

To the surprise of his critics, Fish announced that no counsel would be employed by his committee at the start. Four lawyers are members of the committee, and it appeared that one or more of them had proposed that the committee do its own work, so far as the questioning of witnesses is concerned. But a staff of detectives will be employed at once. They will be called investigators, and will be picked by Fish with a view to gathering all possible evidence of Communist propaganda against American government.

Edgar Hoover, chief of detectives for the Department of Justice, was the law officer of that bureau at the time of the Palmer "red raids" and what the late Louis F. Post called the "Deportation Delirium of 1919-20". He was feverishly active against labor radicals in that after-war period of unrest, and he convinced Immigration Commissioner Caminetti that the Communists were about to attempt armed revolt if conditions seemed favorable. Caminetti, frightened, caused warrants to be issued for the sudden arrest on deportation charges, of 20,000 alien workers in industrial centers throughout the country. Thousands of these workers were herded into over-crowded cells, into corridors of federal buildings and other unfit places of imprisonment, and were held under barbarous conditions for days. Their release under bond or upon showing of false arrest, were effected in some cities, such as Detroit, only after citizens' committees had demanded that Palmer's hysterical persecutions be stopped. Only a few of the army of victims of these raids were found to be legally liable to deportation. Several deaths resulted from the raids. The wife of one man thus arrested went insane.

SAN FRANCISCO—(FP)—Five Communists, one a woman, Ida Rothstein, organizer for the Trade Union Unity League, have been sentenced to the San Francisco county jail on rioting charges arising from a demonstration against deportation of 4 members of the Party. All received 30 days except one, sentenced to 90 days; one defendant failed to appear. All have appealed the case and are out on bail.

Our National Tour

Meetings Stir Great Enthusiasm

Good crowds, despite the hot June weather, are turning out to hear comrade Max Shachtman, now touring for the Communist League of America (Opposition) on his visit with L. D. Trotsky at Constantinople and the conference of the International Left Opposition at Paris, France and Berlin, Germany.

Splendid Meetings in Boston

The Boston meeting was a splendid and enthusiastic gathering with over 100 in attendance. A good discussion followed the lecture, in which the Lovestoneite, Stephens took part, and to whom comrade Shachtman replied effectively and strongly. On the morning of the same day, comrade Shachtman spoke before Branch No. 27 of the Independent Workmen's Circle on "The Communists and Work in the Mass Organizations". Sixty people were present, evincing great interest and applauding the position of the Communist League.

The Boston branch members are highly pleased over the results and expect as a result to gather new forces and to increase their activities.

The Philadelphia Meeting

In Philadelphia comrade Shachtman spoke before 60 workers. A warm discussion took place in which a Communist Party defender found himself in a defenseless position — ideologically.

The small branch of New Haven had a good-sized meeting and additional activity can be expected there.

Stalinists Boycott Meeting but Workers Turn Out in Toronto

A crowd of 100 attended Shachtman's meeting in Toronto, Canada. The official Communist Party boycotted the meeting—after the fashion of the Catholic Index—and actually had a picket line before the hall. They did not dare to participate in the meeting and to discuss the issues, realizing that they would be uncovered before the workers and exposed as opportunists and political cowards. Shachtman's speech made a strong impression upon the audience with his review of the actual program of the Left Opposition and its activities.

A banquet is scheduled on the following day, of which as we go to press, we do not yet have reports.

The immediate dates that follow on the tour are Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, and Detroit, Mich.

Chicago, Twin Cities and Lake Cities Prepare Extensively

Beginning with June 9th, comrade Shachtman will have numerous meetings in Chicago, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth and Superior, and then proceed westward to Kansas City. Extensive preparations have been made in these cities for the meetings, which will undoubtedly prove the largest yet. The remainder of the schedule follows.

Upholsterers Organize to Fight Speed-Up

MINNEAPOLIS—

Upholsterers Union No. 61, Minneapolis is conducting a drive to organize the unorganized upholsterers. The organization Committee, composed of John Brinda, Israel Colton and Carl Cowl has issued the first of a series of leaflets describing conditions among the upholstery workers and calling upon the workers in the industry to join the union. The Union meets the 1st and 3rd Thursday of each month at 60--4th Ave So. at 8 o'clock.

MINNEAPOLIS—

Mike Mihalick, upholsterer at Levin Brothers Furniture Co., suffered the loss of one eye and possibly both from injuries received from a flying piece of spring steel while tying up springs. Due to the vicious speed-up system in Levin Brothers such accidents are growing more and more common. Upholsterers Union No. 61 has launched a campaign of organization in the industry as a step towards the abolition of the misery and sickness produced by the speed-up.

Φ

PITTSBURG, Pa.—(FP)—A general strike of all Pittston Coal Co. miners is near unless the company retreats from its position of closing down part of its mines altogether while allowing others to operate. The union miners are demanding that work be equalized among the various collieries.

THE WORK IN THE OLD UNIONS

The work in the old unions has been virtually abandoned. This fact is clearly revealed in the almost complete disappearance of the Party representatives from trade union gatherings. Still worse, the leaders of the factions are competing with each other in the elaboration of "theories" which preclude the idea of serious work in the old unions in the future.

The factions are outdoing each other in irresponsible striving to be "Left" in this burning question. These theories and practices are a menace to the Party and threaten to put it off the track again. It is time to sound a warning and begin a determined struggle against them. The building of the new unions and the work in the old unions must be carried on together and not the one set up against the other.

Scab Gunman is Acquitted

PHILADELPHIA—(FP)—"If I had it to do over again, I'd bump off the four of you." Those were the words of "Red" Pfeiffer, Aberle mill hosiery gunman tried in Philadelphia for the murder of Striker Carl Mackley as he rode with Mackley's three companions in a patrol wagon to the police station March 6 immediately after the murder. Nevertheless he was acquitted.

Walter Morrow, one of the unionist's companions testified to Pfeiffer's words as the strikebreakers went on trial. Young Mackley was riding with three other Aberle strikers the night their auto was met by one filled with gunmen, all of whom fired pointblank into the union car. By some miracle Morrow, William Zimmerman and John Cooper were not also killed.

Red Pfeiffer and his fellow-strike breakers were given guns by a private detective agency employed by the Aberle mill company, the Hosiery Workers Federation charges. All three of the union survivors, on the witness stand, told of the murder of their friend. The union and the scab car had come to a halt before a red traffic light. Zimmerman heard the scabs yell out, "Now throw your bricks." Then he heard another cry: "Let them have it."

Then bullets began to fly. All four gunmen blazed away. A bullet grazed Zimmerman's face and went through his hat before he could duck, he testified. He flopped behind the rumble seat and pulled his companion, young Cooper, with him. Another bullet passed through the metal shield and pierced Zimmerman's back and lungs. A bullet hit Cooper but did not wound him seriously.

Mackley, a youngster highly respected by his fellow workers in the Aberle mill and a staunch strike leader when the mill was struck because of wage cuts and the yellow dog contract, was trying to open the door of the coupe when he was mortally wounded, his companions told the court. His body was found lying almost under the wheels of the car.

Leftist Sectarianism in Toronto Needle Trades

When in Toronto the bureaucrats of the I. L. G. W. U. working with the bosses betrayed the strike of the cloakmakers, promising them better conditions but utilizing the militancy of the rank and file to seat themselves more firmly in the bureaucratic saddle—I expected that now the Left wing Industrial Union would understand its duty and organize the Left wingers inside the I.L.G.W.U. shops. Numbers of Left wingers have been forced by economic necessity to register with the class-collaboration I. L. G. W. U.

This has not been the case. Under the direction of the Stalinist Party officialdom, one opportunity after another has been lost to give organized expression to the grievances of the rank and file in the Schlesinger union and also to the readiness of the Left wingers to fight the Schlesinger machine from within. The Party bureaucrats and their puppets in the Industrial Union leadership simply proceeded to expel from both the Party and the Young Communist League the needle trades comrades who had been forced by the means of starvation to register.

If we had a fraction inside the I.L.G.W.U. we could have had a big following. The betrayals and the class collaboration of the Schlesinger clique are so manifest that the workers are ready to follow the Left if they were given an organized lead. All Summer the Cloakmakers Section of the Industrial Union did not even meet and did not discuss their needs and policies. Evidently things are no better in Montreal. The Stalin policy works the same ruin in the unions as in the Party.

(we do not speak here of the bluff and exaggerations of the Party leadership, or of their incompetent direction which resulted in the frittering away of these gains) and the alarm of the American bourgeoisie at the "specter" of Communism, are signs of the changing situation. In addition, sections of the workers are moving from acquiescence in the leadership of Green, Woll and Co. to participation in the various "progressive" movements, the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, and to a certain extent the new "Left wing" of the socialist party. For the workers, this is a movement towards the Left. Muste, Thomas and Co. form the ideological and organizational curb on this movement, a "safety valve" against Communism, a rut for the harmless canalization of the forward movement of the ranks.

American Reformism

There is no foundation for the idea that the half-way house of reformism, or its "Left" variety, must be occupied by the American workers for a long time. There is no fatalistic analogy between the development of the German or British working class and that of the American proletariat. The unevenness of social struggles and development, and the abrupt changes inherent in the imperialist epoch, speak against this analogy. That decades elapsed between the bourgeois and proletarian revolutions, in let us say, Germany, was not at all an absolute precedent for the interval between them in Russia. The British and German workers went through their long period of reformist domination during the upward swing of world imperialism.

The American working class is developing to maturity after the world war, in the period of the collapse of world imperialism of violent wars, of proletarian and colonial revolution, of the existence of an international Communist movement which concentrates within it enormous experiences. These facts, and America's involvement and dependence upon a declining and anarchical economy, make probable a situation in which the reformist experiences of the working class here can be traversed with unprecedented rapidity.

This process and its speed are not automatic. Their acceleration depends largely upon the Communists. It is the task of the Communist Party to reduce to the smallest minimum the "reformist period" of the American workers, to paralyze the power of the Left and Right wing reformists, to fight for every worker whom they still influence. But it is precisely here that the present course of the Party and the leadership foisted upon it demonstrate their impotence. The great opportunities are allowed to pass by entirely, or else they are misused and ruined to the detriment of our movement and the advantage of its enemies.

Fruits of the "Third Period"

The weaknesses and the defeats of the Party, and conversely, the growth of reformism, are traceable to the policies pursued by official Communism for the past six years, and more recently, to the theory and practise of the "third period". The theory of the "third period" with its thoroughly opportunist motivation, officially inaugurated the present ultra-Leftist zig-zag of the Comintern.

The arbitrary proclamation of a "third period" was intended to serve as the theoretical foundation for explaining away the past crimes and blunders of the Right-Centrist bloc in the International (Stalin-Bucharin). The fatal subordination of the Chinese Communist Party to the bourgeois Kuo Min Tang, which enabled the Chiang Kai-Sheks to mount to power over the corpses of the Chinese proletariat and peasantry, was and is justified by its occurrence in the "second period". The bureaucratic protection which the Anglo-Russian Committee gave to Purcell, Hicks, Swales and Co. after they had stabbed the British workers in the back, was and is explained away by the "second period". The course based upon the Kulak in the Soviet Union, the reactionary struggle against the industrialization proposals and the rest of the program of the Leninist Opposition, is similarly excused. There is, however no change in the practical consequences of the "third period", which, like the practise of the "second" results in reality in the strengthening of reform-ism in the working class.

The United Front Policy

From united fronts exclusively at the top, with bureaucrats like Purcell, Fimmen, and their ilk, or with reactionary militarists and national bourgeois like Chiang Kai-Shek or Calles, the official policy has been changed today to no united front at all, that is, no united front with non-Communist workers who are still under the influence of the reformists. The ruling apparatus and its spokesmen in all the Parties have changed from their conception of the "progressive" leaders as fighters against imperialism to a conception of the progressive workers as "social fascists". Both conceptions have a common base: the surrender of the non-Communist workers to the control of the reformist leaders.

However, the labelling of reformists as "social fascists" does not result in the decline of their strength and influence. Social reformism is growing in the U.S.—not a little of which is attributable to the policies of official Communism. The petty bourgeoisie, heavily hit by the industrial and stock market crises, is seeking political expression manifest in the tendencies towards a "third party", and in the increase of the socialist party vote and organization, to which the desperate middle class so largely contributed (Thomas vote in New York).

The socialist party is gaining not only among the middle class, but also among the workers: in the new miners' unions of Howat-Fishwick-Brophy-Germer-Ameringer, and in partial reestablishment of socialist strength in the needle trades unions. In the South, the sectarianism and blunders of the Communist Party have made it easier for both the A. F. of L. bureaucracy to play its ordained role of labor agent for capitalism and the Mustelites to play the role of shock absorber for Green and Co. against the militancy of the workers.

The sectarian, ultra-Leftist line of the Party, its failure to apply the tactic of the united front, its refusal to penetrate and work within movements, not under the direct control of the Party has enabled Green to have a free field in the South (and in the A. F. of L. as a whole), has enabled the Mustelites to play their treacherous game in Marion and Elizabethton without the Left wing having any chance to intervene, has enabled the Muste-Fishwick combination to establish their control in the Illinois mine field without effective challenge from the Left wing.

The Party must change its course and adopt instead the tactic of the united front. Applied in a revolutionary sense, and not in its pro-Purcell, pro-Chiang Kai-Shek interpretation, it is a most effective instrument for separating the workers from their reformist leaders, and helping to speed the movement of the American proletariat along the revolutionary path. The present line of the Party is a brake on this movement.

International Roots of Party Crisis

The crisis in the American Party is not an isolated phenomenon; it is a part of the crisis in the U. S. S. R. and the Communist International. That crisis developed under the reactionary banner of the struggle against an alleged "Trotskyism", that is, in reality against the fundamental principles and strategy of Marxism and Leninism. The "Left course" has not alleviated this crisis. It has only brought it to full bloom. The Parties of the International are everywhere incapable of measuring up to their tasks, and are paying with defeats for the past years of Stalinist corrosion.

In India, with a revolutionary situation, there is no Communist Party in existence, and the mass movement is threatened with complete strangulation by Gandhi, Nehru and other representatives of the national bourgeoisie. In Great Britain, the hostility of the workers towards the monstrous treachery of MacDonald and the Labor Party is being transformed into support for the "Left" wing of the Independent Labor Party; the official Communist Party is virtually out of the picture. In Austria, Italy and Spain, where there are powerful or potential mass movements against fascism, the Communist Parties are reduced to unimportant sects with no substantial influence. There is hardly a Party in the International that is not torn by a crisis or rendered impotent by stagnation and passivity. That is the balance sheet of Stalinism in the Comintern.

This condition is part and parcel of the crisis in the Soviet Union and the Russian Party. The attempt to bridge the gulf between an isolated proletarian state and the retarded world revolution with the utopian, reactionary theory of "socialism in a single country" has failed in two different ways. Proceeding from this theory the Stalin-Bucharin regime proclaimed that socialism would be built "at a snail's pace" by the "kulak growing into socialism".

This perspective of decades-long capitalist stabilization was accompanied by resting upon and mobilizing all the anti-proletarian elements in the Soviet Union in the campaign against the Left Opposition. The course towards the Kulak culminated not only with the organizational crushing of the Leninist group in the Russian Party, but also with the "bloodless Kulak uprising" of 1928. The pressure of the Opposition's ideas and the proletarian core of the country compelled the rupture of the Right-Center bloc and the commencement of the zig-zag to the "Left" of the Stalinist faction. But just as the Stalinist faction abandoned—with one foot—the positions of the Right for those of adventurism, so surely is it now preparing to return to its former position and to heal its temporary breach with the Thermidorian elements of the Right wing. This movement backward, foretold by the Opposition, is now in the process of realization. The serious situation engendered by the adventurist course of Stalinist Centrism in Soviet economy, which brought about a virtual rupture of the bonds between the proletariat and peasantry, which lightened the bureaucratic stranglehold that stifles the Party and reduces it to an automaton, demands the active intervention of every Communist worker.

The predictions and the program of the Left Opposition have been confirmed a thousand times over. For that "crime" it has been subjected to the foulest slanders, to imprisonment, exile, deportation and even assassination. In exile, in the factories, in prison and in the Party, the Left Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists) stand on guard for the revolution and its conquests. It is the revolution's reserve of gold. The American Opposition proudly re-affirms its solidarity with the Russian comrades. Their reinstatement into the Party, like our own, is the principal guarantee for the advancement of the movement and the solution of its crisis.

The Right Wing and Stalin Factions

The pre-convention "discussion" up to now, the fact that the "theses" were officially and finally adopted long before the discussion commenced, and all Stalinist precedents, are sufficient indication that the convention will be another meeting of the functionaries of the Stalinist faction, with a purely formal and decorative attendance of workers-delegates. The convention will prove incapable of solving the urgent problems of the Party. Our appeal is therefore directed primarily and essentially to the worker-Communists in the Party.

Our warning against, and designation of the character of the Lovestone group, made while it was still the American representatives of the ruling regime in the Russian Party and the International, have been more than confirmed by subsequent events. We characterized the Lovestone faction as a Right wing group, which was leaving the positions of Communist principle, at the moment when half of the present leadership of the Party was an integral part of the Lovestone group (Minor, Bedacht, Stachel, Weinstein) and the other half was in a bloc with that group to expel us from the Party (Foster, Browder, Hathaway). All the noise and "predictions" of the "uniting" of the Right and Left Oppositions—is designed to conceal the damning fact of the unity between the Lovestones and Fosters in the fight against us.

The Right wing has turned its back upon internationalism, and applied the Stalin-Bucharin theory of "socialism in one country" to the United States. It has crystallized its opportunist conceptions of Communist work among the masses, which, while it led the Party under Stalinist dispensation, was always so thoroughly imbued with timid conservatism, dragging along behind the masses, bureaucratic "maneuvers" and "united fronts" at the top with all varieties of reformist leaders, exaggerations of the omnipotence of American imperialism, faith in the capture of the official trade union apparatus as a substitute for the struggle to win over the workers in the ranks. Its whole line of thought and action fitted it eminently to lead the reactionary campaign against "Trotskyism", which the present manufactured leadership is seeking so vainly to continue.

We stamped the nature and course of this group correctly and in time. We fought against its liquidationist tendencies instead of uniting with it to expel the Left Opposition. The official leaders of the Party have now undertaken a belated struggle against the Right wing but they are incompetent to conduct it. In reality, they have helped to strengthen it, and that in three ways: by uniting with it against us; by carrying out such an adventurist, sectarian, ultra-Leftist policy that they play into the hands of the Right wing and drive many Communist workers in its direction; by methods of hooliganism and "strong arguments" which discredit the Party and only create an artificial sympathy for the Right wing. The Centrists, bound to the Right wing by a hundred theoretical threads, are incapable of conducting a serious Marxist struggle against it. The smashing of Centrist impotence and theoretical confusion will be the heaviest blow against its former and future ally, the Right wing.

As in our struggle against the Right wing, the course of events has more than sufficiently justified our opposition to the present Centrist regime in the Party. The latter has only deepened the crisis engendered by the previous rule of the Lovestone faction. It has weakened the Party, paralyzed its activity, cut down its influence and prestige among the militant workers. It has driven away hundreds and even thousands of workers from the Party; it has been unable to hold the thousands of workers who have recently come to the Party; it will continue to be incapable of holding the many others who move towards Communism under the impulsion of the struggle.

Solution of the Party Crisis

The pre-requisite for the solution of the crisis is clarity and understanding of its nature and its source. To attain this clarity and understanding, the Party requires a genuine, a free discussion, which we have not had up to now because it is officially prohibited. For such a discussion, the Party requires the re-establishment of workers' democracy. For workers' democracy, the Party requires an intransigent struggle against the Party bureaucracy appointed from above and against the regime which it represents and by which it lives.

The Party must be returned to the Party membership!

The Left Opposition, since its existence as a separate group formally outside the Party as a result of bureaucratic expulsion, has continued to fight for its principled viewpoint and to defend the foundations of Communism, even under the extreme provocations of the apparatus. It is pledged to continue this struggle. The Centrist regime's deformation and discrediting of fundamental principles upon which our Party and our International were built, only necessitates a firmer and more relentless struggle in our Party since the whole future of our movement is involved. The great problems with which the whole movement, particularly the American, are confronted demand the re-incorporation of the Opposition into the Party. Our fight for Communism must of necessity be conducted in fraternal solidarity, shoulder to shoulder with the Communist workers in the ranks of the Party. It is they, and not the miserable, blind bureaucrats, who will decide in the end. It is to this end that we are working. It is for the clarity needed to attain this end that we address ourselves—now, in the past, and in the future—to the Communist workers.

The Slogan of the National Assembly in China

By L. D. TROTSKY

(China has been and will continue to be one of the touchstones of Marxist theory and Leninist strategy in the Communist International. The Stalin regime has brought an incredible amount of confusion into the ranks of the Communists regarding the character, the perspectives and the slogans of the Chinese revolution. This important contribution by Trotsky on the slogan of the Constituent Assembly was written in reply to some questions of the Chinese comrades but it is of universal concern to all proletarian revolutionaries. —Editors.)

It seems to me that our Chinese friends support too much of metaphysics and—even some scholasticism into the question of political slogans of democracy.

The "delicacies" begin with the name: Constituent Assembly or National Assembly. In Russia until the revolution we used the slogan of Constituent Assembly, because it most clearly emphasized our break with the past. But you write that in China it is difficult to formulate this slogan. If so, it remains to adopt the slogan of the National Assembly. For the consciousness of the masses the contents of this slogan will depend, firstly, in the implication the revolutionary agitation will give it, and secondly, on the events. You ask: "Is it possible to carry on agitation for a Constituent Assembly while denying that it can be accomplished?" But why should we decide beforehand that it cannot be accomplished? Of course the masses will follow the slogan only if they consider it feasible. Who will accomplish it, and how will it be accomplished? Here only suppositions are possible. In case of the further weakening of the military-Kuomintang regime and the growth of discontent among the masses, particularly in the cities, it is possible that an attempt will be made by a part of the Kuomintang together with a "third party" to convene something on the style of a National Assembly. Of course, they will as much as possible cut into the rights of the more oppressed classes and layers. Will we Communists, go into such a curtailed and manipulated National Assembly? If we will not be strong enough to replace it, that is to take over power, we will, of course, go in. Such a stage would in no way weaken us. On the contrary, it would help us gather and develop the forces of the proletarian vanguard. Inside the pseudo-assembly, and particularly on the outside of it, we would carry on our agitation for a new and more democratic assembly. In case of a revolutionary mass movement we would simultaneously build Soviets. It is very possible that in such an event the petty-bourgeois parties would convene a comparatively more democratic National Assembly, as a dam against the Soviets. Would we participate in such a sort of representation? Of course we would participate. Again, if we would not be strong enough to replace the assembly with a higher form of government, that is the Soviets. But such a possibility reveals itself only at the highest point of revolutionary ascent. But as it is presently, we have not as yet approached the beginning.

Even if the Soviets were a fact—which is not the case in China at present—this in itself would not be cause enough for the abandonment of the slogan of the National Assembly. The majority in the Soviets may be (and at the beginning will certainly be) in the hands of conciliatory and Centrist parties and organizations. We will be interested to have these parties exposed in the open forum of the National Assembly. By this method the majority of the Soviets will be won over to our side sooner, and much more certainly. When our conquest of the majority will become a reality, we will counter-pose the program of the Soviets against the program of the National Assembly, we will gather the majority of the country around the banner of the Soviets, which will give us the possibility, in deed and not on paper, to replace the National Assembly, this parliamentary-democratic institution, by Soviets, as the organ of the revolutionary class dictatorship.

The Constituent Assembly in Russia

In Russia, the Constituent Assembly existed only for one day. Why? Because it made its appearance too late, when the Soviet power was already in existence, and came into conflict with it. In this conflict, the Constituent Assembly represented the yesterday of the Revolution. But let us suppose that the bourgeois provisional government had been sufficiently decisive to convene the Constituent Assembly in March or April (1917). Was it possible? Naturally it was. The Cadets were busy with legal trickery to drag out the convening of the Constituent Assembly in the hope that the revolutionary wave would subside. The Mensheviks and the Social Revolutionaries took their cue from the Cadets. If the Mensheviks and the Social Revolutionaries would have had a little more revolutionary drive in them they could have convened the Constituent Assembly in a few weeks. Would we Bolsheviks have participated in the elections and in the Assembly itself? Undoubtedly, for it was we who demanded all the time the speediest convening of the Constituent Assembly. Would the course of the revolution have changed to the disadvantage of the proletariat by an early convening of the Assembly? Not at all. Perhaps you remember that the representatives of the Russian possessing classes and following them also the conciliators were postponing all the important questions of the revolution "until the Constituent Assembly", at the same time also dragging out the convening of it. This gave the landowners and capitalists a possibility to mask to a certain extent their property interests in the agrarian question, industrial, etc. If the Constituent Assembly would have convened let us say in April 1917 then all the social questions would have been raised before them. The possessing classes would have been compelled to show their cards, the treacherous role of the conciliators would have been apparent, the Bolshevik faction of the Constituent Assembly would have acquired the greatest popularity and have assisted the Soviets to elect a Bolshevik majority. Under these circumstances the Constituent Assembly would have existed not one day but possibly several months but that would have enriched the political experiences of the laboring masses and not only would not have retarded the proletarian revolution but would rather have accelerated it. This in itself would have been of greatest significance. If the second revolution would have occurred not in October but let us say in July or August the army at the front would have been less exhausted and weakened and the peace with the Hohenzollerns might have been more favorable to us. Even if we should assume that the proletarian revolution would not come a single day sooner because of the Constituent Assembly, the school of revolutionary parliamentarism would not have passed without leaving its trace on the political level of the masses and this would have made our tasks the day after the October Revolution much easier.

A Slogan to Mobilize the Masses

Is this sort of a variant possible in China? It is not excluded. To imagine and expect that the Communist Party of China can make the jump from the present conditions of the rule of the unbridled bourgeois military cliques, the oppression and dismemberment of the working class, and the extraordinary low ebb of the peasant movement to the seizure of power—this would be to believe in miracles. In practice this leads to guerilla adventurism, to which the Comintern now lends its covert support. We must condemn this policy and guard the revolutionary workers from it.

The political mobilization of the proletariat and following it the peasant masses is the first task that must be solved in conjunction with the present circumstances. And these are the circumstances of the military-bourgeois counter revolution, the power of the suppressed masses is in their number. When they awaken they strive to express their strength of numbers in politics through the medium of the universal suffrage. The handful of Communists know even today that universal suffrage is an instrument of bourgeois rule and that they can liquidate this rule only through the medium of the proletarian dictatorship. In this spirit you can educate beforehand the proletarian vanguard. But the millions of the toiling masses can come to the dictatorship of the proletariat only on the basis of their own political experience and the National Assembly would be a progressive step on this road. This is why we come out for this slogan in conjunction with four other slogans of the democratic revolution: the transfer of the land to the peasant poor; the eight hour work-day; the independence of China; the right of self-determination of the nationalities included in the territory of China.

It is understood that we cannot deny also such a perspective—it is theoretically admissible—that the Chinese proletariat leading the peasant masses and supporting itself on the Soviets will come to power before the achievement of the National Assembly in one or another form. But for the immediate period this is at any rate improbable, because it presupposes the existence of a powerful and centralized revolutionary party of the proletariat. But in its absence what other forces will unite the revolutionary masses of your gigantic country? In the meantime it is our misfortune that there is no strong centralized Communist Party in China as yet. It first has to be formed. The struggle for democracy is the precisely necessary condition for that. The slogan of the National Assembly would unite the scattered provincial movements and uprisings, give them political unity and create the basis for welding together the Communist Party as an all-national leader of the proletariat and the entire toiling mass.

That is why the slogan of the National Assembly (on the basis of the universal, direct equal and secret ballot) must be raised as forcefully as possible and a courageous decisive struggle developed around it. A month sooner or later the sterility of the purely negative position of the Comintern and the official leadership of the Chinese Communist Party will mercilessly expose itself. This will happen the sooner, the more decisively the Left Communist Opposition will unfold and develop its campaign for the slogans of democracy. In this case the inevitable crash of the policy of the Comintern will greatly strengthen the Left Opposition and will help it become the decisive force in the Chinese proletariat.

The Economic Crisis

American capitalism has been unable to overcome the serious depressions in agriculture and in the coal, oil, textile, shipping and other industries, nor will it be able to prevent the coming decline in iron and steel and automobile industries.

The rapid increase in brokerage loans, in face of an average trading volume of more than five million shares a day, presages the beginning of the end of the "bull" market far more profoundly than the price fall of June 1928. The fact that rates for stock-market had to be doubled and quadrupled, has caused the more realistic of the bourgeois economists to be very cautious in their predictions for the coming year.

The fate of American imperialism, we repeat, is now bound up with its dependence on world economy. Conversely the situation in Europe is directly linked with the development of American national economy. The United States will seek to use Europe as a shield to take the blows of its own difficulties. This will in turn create such situations in Europe, above all in Germany, where with proper revolutionary leadership, a new wave of proletarian revolt will be initiated, or the relations between England and America will come to the breaking point. This rapidly materializing process will change the correlation of forces in the United States in favor of the revolutionary proletariat, by undermining the base of the American labor aristocracy.

In the International Opposition

Pertinent Questions to the Prometeo Group

Dear Comrades:

A few months ago you addressed to me an open letter to which I then replied. Now it seems to me the time has come to address an open letter to your group.

In Paris a preliminary conference of the International Left Opposition was recently held. This conference is a serious step forward because it was made possible only in consequence of lengthy preparatory work of an ideological character. Your group, before the eyes of which this work was being developed, did not consider it possible to participate in this conference. This extremely important fact of absenteeism prompts me to ask you the following questions:

1.) Do you assume that Communism can have a national character? This for example, is the position of Urbahns, who, while repeating the ritualistic formulas of internationalism, created a purely German sect having no connections in the whole world and consequently deprived of revolutionary perspective. Therefore do you regard yourselves as a national current or part of an international current?

2.) If in your answer to this question you state that you are fully satisfied with your isolated national existence then there would be no room for any further questions. But I have no doubt that you consider yourselves internationalists. In this case the second question looms up: to what particular international current do you belong? There are now three basic currents in international Communism: the Centrist, the Right and the Left (Leninist). Besides these there are different kinds of ultra-Left offshoots who grope about between Marxism and anarchism. Until now we thought that you stood nearest to the Left Opposition. Your hesitancy we ascribed to your possible desire to orientate yourselves in the development of the Left Opposition. But hesitancy cannot be maintained forever. Life is not stagnant either in Italy or in the rest of the world. In order to join the International Left there is no need whatever for false "monolithism" in the spirit of the Stalinist bureaucracy. What is needed is actual solidarity on the basic questions of revolutionary strategy that has stood the test of the past few years.

Particular tactical disagreements are absolutely unavoidable and can be no obstacle for close common work in the framework of an international organization. Wherein do your disagreements with the Left Opposition consist? Are they of a principled or of an episodic character? You must reply to this clearly and precisely.

3.) Your absence from the preliminary international conference can be interpreted that there are disagreements of principle that divide you from the Left Opposition. If this be so a third question crops up: why don't you proceed with the organization of an international faction of your own current? After all you cannot conceive that revolutionary principles adaptable for the whole world are not applicable to Italy or vice versa. The passive-conciliatory attitude towards the Left Opposition combined with reluctance to join it and the refusal to participate in the life of the Communist vanguard of other countries is characteristic of national socialism or national Communism and has nothing in common with Marxist Communism.

Your reply to these questions is of serious consequence not only from the international but first of all from the Italian point of view in so far as these two viewpoints can be in any way set off against one another. The illegal character of the Italian Communist Party makes it difficult to follow up developments. Nevertheless there can be no doubt that within the framework of the Italian Communist Party there are besides the official faction, your group and the group of Rights (Tasca), numerous revolutionary elements who have not yet openly formulated their positions. Under these circumstances you are among the indefinite elements. Meanwhile precisely the illegal existence of the Party demands with double force the full principled clarity of the leading groups. Your reply will help speed up the ideological crystallization within the Italian proletarian vanguard.

It is needless to say that the Russian Opposition would be happy to learn of your decision to join the International Left.

With Communist Greetings,

In Germany

The Menace of Fascism

BERLIN—

For several weeks the new government of the bourgeois bloc, the government of Brüning-Schiele-Treviranus has been in office. From the outset, it has placed itself under the sign of menacing dictatorship. It sought a parliamentary majority but it declared at the same time that if this majority were not forthcoming, it would not resign—but would govern without parliament.

During the twenty-one months when the social democracy had power in its hands, it prepared the ground for a stronger reaction; the bourgeois bloc took possession of the bloc which had been willed to it by the coalition—to carry out in a speedier and more brutal fashion that which the social democracy has begun: the throttling of the working class.

It was evident to every revolutionary Marxist that the social democratic coalition could only play the role of preparing the way. Nothing could be more false than the conception that the official Communist Party theoreticians defend nowadays after trying to rid themselves of the theory of social fascism. A leading article of the International (No. 7) says among other things that in the course of recent years every government has marked "one step further in the direction of the fascist development of Germany" and that consequently the "Müller government was obviously as reactionary a government as those which preceded it."

This mechanical conception has nothing in common with Marxism and completely disregards the development of the class struggle which is full of contradictions.

Why did the bourgeoisie, which called the Socialist party to the government after the elections of 1928 so brutally dismiss its "socialist" domestics in 1930?

The Communist Party and the Leftward Movement

The bourgeois government bloc suffered a mark defeat in 1928 in the Reichstag elections. The piratical tariff policy and the reactionary social policy, the brutal measures of capitalist rationalization had set the masses in motion. About a million and a half petty-bourgeoisie, workers and medium and poor peasants turned from the Right to the Left wing of the bourgeoisie, towards the social democracy, which increased its vote from 7,881,000 to 9,151,000 votes. Half a million workers abandoned reformism and the open bourgeois camp, to go to the Communist Party whose vote increased from 2,700,000 to 3,260,000. The years 1927 and 1928 witnessed an increasing activity of the masses. To stop the development to the Left and to bring confusion to the masses, to disintegrate their elan—that was the function of the coalition. Today after nearly two years one must admit that the bourgeoisie has largely attained its object. Despite as reactionary a policy as possible in nearly every field, the social democracy succeeded in putting a brake on the militancy of the masses.

With the aid of the Young Plan it succeeded in sowing illusions inside the proletariat. And as the Communist Party did not know how to lead the masses into struggle step by step, nor to organize them by the revolutionary application of the tactics of the united front, no real struggle was developed against the Young Plan against the capitalist offensive, and as the Left current of 1928 did not develop further, no real mass desertion of the

The Militant is glad to report that the Spanish section of the International Left Opposition has just been able to establish an organ of its own under the name of "Against the Current". It is to begin as a semi-monthly and will aim to become a weekly.

The situation in Spain, with the prevailing ferment among the workers and peasants following the end of the Primo de Rivera regime is favorable. The Opposition has already made gratifying gains in the fight to win the masses for the revolutionary line against the Stalin faction which has control of the Party apparatus. Our warmest fraternal greetings to our Spanish comrades.

workers from the social democracy to the Communist Party took place.

Tricked by the social democracy, repelled by the Communist Party's politics of bluff, the bombastic phrasemongering which held sway over the Wedding Congress of the Party, great masses of class conscious workers sank into apathy and indifference, tens of thousands have been lured over into the camp of the fascists. The anger, the discontent and even the revolutionary hatred of the social democratic party have grown among the masses but at the same time confidence in the leadership and slogans of the Communist Party, in the political correctness of its line in the immediate struggles, has waned.

The bourgeoisie is well aware of this change in the outlook of the masses. Today the bourgeoisie fears incomparably less than in 1928 the development of a revolutionary movement against its domination.

The Bourgeoisie Dismisses the Social Democracy

That is why the preparatory role of the social democracy has come to its close; the bourgeoisie feel it can now reach its ends without the direct aid of the socialist party. The party was shown the door. After the abrupt attack of Schacht against Hilferding (December, 1929) the end of the coalition was only a matter of weeks....

The new bourgeois bloc (Brüning-Schiele-Treviranus) is by its very nature a transitional regime. With its left foot it supports itself on the parliamentary regime with its right foot it rests on the open dictatorship. If contrary to all predictions, the resistance of the masses against the regime of the bourgeois bloc should become too strong, the road to a new coalition would not be barred. The transition to such a regime as exists in Thuringia—parliamentary in its externals and fascist in its essence—is quite within the realm of possibilities. What is least likely is that the bourgeoisie will at the present time openly instal a fascist regime, letting the parliamentary mask fall. The legal and semi-legal possibilities are not yet exhausted, the class struggle in Germany has not yet taken on that form which compels the bourgeoisie to renounce the advantages of parliamentarism.

The traditional character of the present regime reflects the profound crisis in which bourgeois democracy finds itself in Germany. The crisis in all the bourgeois parties is the expression of the same phenomenon: but the crisis of bourgeois democracy itself is only the external expression of the crisis of the capitalist social order. The solution of this crisis will depend on the further development of the class struggle in Germany.

Discussion

Communism and the Negro Problem

The Militant welcomes membership discussion on all the basic problems of the Communist movement. We do not regard leading committees as the sole repositories of all the wisdom of Marxism and Leninism. What is called the Negro problem especially is one that will bear a good deal of thorough study and discussion. The easiest line of approach would be to repeat some glib formula.

Discussion articles on this or other questions of Communist theory and strategy should be as brief and to the point as possible in view of our limited space. —Editors

Philadelphia, Pa.

Editors, the Militant:

Some time ago I heard a member of the Communist Party, Ben Thomas, state in a lecture that the Negro should be given autonomy, and that in such districts where the Negro is in a majority, a Negro Soviet Republic should be set up. My reaction to this was strongly in Opposition. It seemed to me that this was a purely mechanical attempt to introduce European, African or Asiatic conditions into America. I am not afraid of being nailed as an "exceptionalist" when I state that the American Negro Problem is an American problem and must be solved on the basis of actual conditions in America. That it cannot be solved with any transplanted formula.

What is the situation here? Is the Negro a National Minority, in the European sense? Has he a culture, or a language that is different from the American people?

Most emphatically no! The American Negro is integrally a part of the American working class and any attempt to segregate him is absolutely wrong. The Communist movement should bend every effort to eradicate every tendency in that direction.

What the Negro needs is class consciousness, not race consciousness.

Bourgeois Negroes are themselves trying to build up race consciousness, shouting for race interests. They desire that the Negro should be segregated into separate schools, in order that Negro daughters should have opportunities to become schoolteachers. They want Negroes to patronize Negro doctors, dentists, merchants, bankers, etc... Why? For the particular advancement of the Negro professions, etc.

The Communist movement should avoid this pitfall. Every effort to segregate the Negro should be fought. Negro girls should not teach Negro children, they should, when qualified as teachers teach any school, no consideration of their race or color should be given. Negro children should go to schools in the districts in which they live, there should be no Negro schools.

There should be no Negro labor unions. Workers should unite! Marx was not wrong when he said, Workers of all lands.

Unite!

When the American Civil War occurred, Marx was strongly for the Northern cause and supported Abraham Lincoln. He saw that part of the American working class was still under chattel slavery. Their color was not a factor. Today the whole American working class is under wage slavery and color is not a factor.

The finest way in the world to play into the hands of the Southern bourgeoisie is to talk about Negro Soviets. They will immediately translate this into Negro domination, and with this slogan they can alienate the Southern whites of the working class.

Segregation even when apparently for the good of the Negro is wrong.

Our policy should be to knit closely together all workers, black and white, native and foreign.

There is no physiological or biological race hatred. Race prejudices are purely social and economic. I was raised in Washington, D. C. and Virginia. I know that as kids we white and black children associated freely and without prejudice. It was only later, when we realized that the Negro had a lower position, lower even than our own as "Poor White Trash", that we developed a superiority complex. White and blacks in the South would mingle freely if permitted. In fact they do in such lowly circles as bootleggers, prostitutes, etc. where they feel that there is nothing to lose. Only social advantages draw the color line. Communists are not snobs, our base is the workers, and on this base we can and must build up a united front of the earth's exploited.

In the South our soviets must be built up from the workers, black, white and mixed. If the official Party fosters such wrong ideas of Negro segregation we should fight it.

Summing up then let me state:

No national minorities exist in the United States. Any efforts to transplant a foreign culture, Negro, Jewish, Polish, European or what not, should be vigorously combatted. There is one American working class, and it works only to the interest of the Ruling Class when efforts are made to differentiate between the workers.

Particularly the Negro has no separate interests. He is not a foreigner. He is American for many generations. He has no national culture. Russians may be interested in Russia, Poles in Poland, Jews in Jerusalem, but the Negro is interested in America. He is American. Garvey is doing all he can to manufacture an artificial background for the Negro in Africa. Let us be careful to avoid such nonsense.

Fraternally,

LOVESTONE'S
«AMERICANISM»

Nowadays nobody with eyes in his head can mistake the sorry role that Lovestone and his faction are playing in the Communist movement. Years ago his opportunistic ideas could always find shelter under the protecting arm of Stalin's Comintern; today he must shiver in the rain of criticism. To illustrate this I will point out several things which occurred at a youth meeting held by the Lovestone group in the Grand Opera House last week.

About fifteen people attended this meeting. The audience was mainly composed of Lovestoneites, a few League members and a stool pigeon of the Y. C. L. sent there to report the League members foolish enough to think they could attend any meeting but their own. The reporter of the evening was Will Herberg. He gave a fairly accurate representation of the situation in the Party. Any half-way educated Communist can see the countless mistakes and false policies of the leadership and the impasse into which they have led the C. I. But when he tried to analyze the causes at the bottom of this crisis and to estimate the work and value of the Left Opposition he got himself into an awful mess. His only attempt to discuss the questions the Opposition has raised was on the problem of Thermidor. Firstly he drew an utterly false picture of no unity of opinion among the forces of the Left Opposition on this question. Some, he said, believed that Thermidor was already accomplished, others that it was on its way and still others didn't believe in it at all.

The first view (that Thermidor is already accomplished in the Soviet Union) is held by Urbahns, he maintained. And then, like a typically bankrupt politician he attacked this view as the one of the Opposition. This he succeeded in doing, since it doesn't take much brains to expose as erroneous a theory like this one. But he didn't dare attack the official viewpoint of

The Role of American Imperialism

Every estimate of the present situation must proceed from the fact that the world center of economic gravity has shifted to the United States. American imperialism now levies tribute from practically all the capitalist countries of the world. This development which has risen to its height in the period after the world war, has bound up the fate of American imperialism with the economy of the whole world in an inextricable form. No analysis of its future economic course, internally as well as externally, can be made without a consideration of its international position.

The effect of America's direct intervention in European affairs after the war was the temporary, partial stabilization of European capitalism. This stabilization occurred in direct connection with the defeat of the German proletariat in 1923 and resulted in the consolidation of social democracy for the time. In turn it enabled the United States to avoid the convulsions that would have affected it inevitably in the event of the development of the revolutionary wave in Europe.

The United States has expanded its productive capacity which has brought about a further contraction of markets for European capitalism and consequently a contraction of the European market itself. The post-war chaos of Europe has made it impossible for the debtors of that continent to present a sufficiently consolidated united front to which they are inclined. The very strength and expansion of American imperialism has laid the foundation for the most violent struggles in Europe and in the colonial countries. The European powers must fight among themselves for a larger ration in world economy, and against the United States for the same reason. The pacifist effect which American intervention had upon the European situation in the beginning is now being transformed by the process of development into a revolutionizing effect. American imperialism is now beginning to look for a solution of its own approaching internal convulsions at the expense of Europe, and primarily of Germany, and increased exploitation and imperialist raids on Latin America and China.

THE COMMUNIST OPPOSITION

An Open Letter to the Members of the C. P. S. U. (b)

(Concluded from the Last Issue)

A French proverb says that one must know how to fall back sometimes in order the better to leap. That is the condition in which the leadership of the Soviet state, as well as the leadership of the Communist International finds itself at present.

Both are driven by their own adventurism to the depths of an impasse. Placing its "prestige" above the interests of the world revolution, the Centrist bureaucracy draws ever more the noose around the neck of the Party. In matters of tactics, the first task is the following: to beat a retreat by abandoning the positions of adventurism. The retreat is inevitable in any case. It must therefore be carried out as soon as possible and in the best possible order.

Put an end to the "complete" collectivization replacing it with a careful selection based on a real freedom of self-determination.

Bring the Kolkhoz (the farm collectives) into harmony with real resources.

Put an end to the policy of merely administrative abolition of the kulaks. To bridge the exploiting tendencies of the kulak will remain a necessary policy yet for many years. The fundamental policy with regard to the kulak holdings must consist in a rigid contractual system of coercion (i. e., a contract with the government organizations obliging the kulak to furnish certain products at fixed prices).

Put an end to the shock brigade methods of collectivization. Re-evaluate the question of the tempo of industrialization in the light of experience taking into account the necessity of raising the standard of living of the masses.

Frankly raise the question of the quality of production, its importance being as great for the consumer as for the producer.

Put an end to inflation by establishing a rigid financial discipline by means of cutting down exaggerated plans.

Give up the "ideal" of a closed economy. Work out a new variant of the plans based on as extensive a collaboration as possible with regard to the world market.

Supported on the growing unemployment in a number of countries, develop an important international campaign having as its basis concrete economic proposals in the direction of economic collaboration with the Soviet Union. Organize an offensive of the working masses under this slogan, particularly of the unemployed, against the social democratic government in Germany and against the "labor" government in England.

It is necessary to stop looking upon the Communist International as an auxiliary apparatus for the struggle against the dangers of intervention. It is a question no longer of occasional demonstrations against war but of a struggle against imperialism, for the world revolution. It is necessary to develop a real struggle in the capitalist countries to win the masses taking into account the real state of the economic and political processes in each country.

An end must be put to the falsification of facts consisting in the (verbal) transformation of specific economic conflicts or unimportant demonstrations into so-called revolutionary struggles.

Stop the fabrication of statistical data in the service of pre-established schemes. Drive out ignominiously all "tailendism" the lying and deception of the masses.

Give up the scholasticism of the "third period"!

Put an end to the adventurist policy of "red days"!

Condemn the theory of "social-fascism" which renders the greatest services to the social democracy!

Return to the Leninist policy of the united front!

The loss of influence over the youth is one of the most menacing symptoms of the abyss which is opening up before the Communist International and the masses. Never yet has bitter, dried-up, self-interested and conceited bureaucratism been able to find its way into the hearts of the younger generations. What is needed is not commandments of officialdom but sensitive and tactful leadership on the part of the Party.

One must leave to the proletarian youth the possibility of developing its own initiative, of judging, of discussing, of committing mistakes and correcting them:—in the absence of such pre-requisites there is the danger of a fatal rupture between the successive revolutionary generations.

Above all, it is necessary to alter the policy of the Communist International in the East.

The organization of peasant guerilla warfare in China while the workers' movement in the proletarian centres continues to vegetate, is to throw dust in the eyes—it is the sure road to the destruction of the Communist Party.

It is necessary to stop playing with the fire of adventurism. The Chinese Communist Party must be armed with the slogans of revolutionary democracy to aid it in the mobilization of the great masses in city and country.

The weakness of the Hindu proletariat at a time when a profound revolutionary crisis is developing in the heart of an enormous colonial country is explained by the long reign of the reactionary theory and practise of the "Workers and Peasants" Party (Stalin).

The cowardly, half-way abandonment of this theory is not enough. It must be pitilessly condemned as the worst example of political treachery which has compromised for a long time the proletarian forces of Japan, India, Indonesia, and other countries of the East.

With no less decision must there be a repudiation of the slogan of the "democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants" which is only a reactionary cover for a policy of the Kuomintang kind, that is to say, for the hegemony and dictatorship of the bourgeoisie in the national revolution.

The program of the Communist International adopted at the Sixth Congress is entirely eclectic. It gives an incorrect conception of the world situation. It is built up on a concoction of internationalism and of national-socialism. It gives a Menshevik characterization of the colonial revolutions and of the role that the liberal bourgeoisie plays in them. It is impotent

Editor of the Militant:

Your issue of May 17 carried a brief article from comrade Plarinos, describing the May Day demonstration in this city. Brief though his article was, it was adequate to cause his rejection as a member of the Metal Workers Industrial League; the League which ironically claims to be interested in the organization of the unorganized.

Plarinos, who has many years standing in the revolutionary movement, did not participate in the May Day demonstration for the purpose of seeing its faults. He went into it with revolutionary enthusiasm; with the desire of doing his part to make it a success; and to challenge the Steel Barons. But despite his fidelity and enthusiasm he could not avoid seeing the conspicuous blunders of the leadership.

In his "May Day in Youngstown" article comrade Plarinos said, "Thousands of workers and business men gathered on the streets to see our parade." He might have added that the only workers on hand that day were the unemployed.

The "Mass Political Strike"

The party call for a "mass political strike" was a complete failure. How could it be otherwise? While the great majority of the workers were unemployed and were walking from place to place in search of anything they could find, they would be willing to work under almost any conditions, just for "coffee and—". The workers who had a job looked upon themselves as the favored recipients, as the chosen children of their particular deity. While it is quite true that the great majority of the mill workers, employed and unemployed, are sore at the bosses and hostile at the Company, yet few know anything of the international revolutionary movement and still less of the Third International.

In fact, I don't think the mill workers who have a job would respond to any strike call at the present time. But if they were called on to organize with the intention of ultimately striking for better conditions, higher wages and so forth, they might at least understand it. But the call for a "mass political strike" of unorganized workers during an industrial depression is of course beyond the comprehension of these non-class conscious workers. It is easy enough to see why the mill workers who had jobs paid no attention to the call for a mass political strike. The call reached deaf ears as any one with any sense might easily anticipate.

The slogan of a mass political strike at this time and place is like sowing seed on barren rocks. The seed not only will not grow but it will die. This serious slogan has been abused so much by the phrasemongers and half-baked intellectuals who look on themselves as the fountains of working class knowledge that it has become meaningless. No one, not even those who write it, any longer take it seriously. But of course this is the "Third Period" so we cannot be surprised at anything.

For quite some time this year the Youngstown workers were honored by the presence of a combination organizer. He was here to build up everything. The Party, the T. U. U. L., the I. L. D., the M. W. I. L. and what not. He spoke at the Public Square and the thing he succeeded most in doing was in keeping the crowd moving. No one would stop to listen to him. Such organizers who cannot speak and do not know what they are trying to say do much more harm than good.

Barred from Union for Opposition Views

The Metal Workers Industrial League is supposed to be an organization of metal workers irrespective of their political views, their race, creed or color. They pretend to be extremely anxious to organize the unorganized, but it is obvious that they are out to organize no one but the bona fide followers of Stalin. The application of comrade Denis Plarinos has been rejected because he sent the Militant a truthful synopsis of the May Day demonstration in addition to the fact that he is a reader of the Militant. So it seems that readers of the Daily Worker exclusively are eligible to join the M. W. I. L. which pretends to be an organization of metal workers! Only the faithful disciples of Stalin will be organized, although these disciples do not number more than one percent of the workers. It is quite safe to say that nine out of every ten of the mill workers have never heard of Stalin.

The great majority of mill workers who read any newspaper at all read the capitalist sheets. They do not read them on account of their editorial policy or political views. They read them for the latest news of baseball, football, horse-racing, etc. But, yet they read the capitalist papers and not the Daily Worker. Are they to be ignored and pushed off the map by the heresy-hunting M. W. I. L.? Are they not to be organized to fight the steel barons unless they are born again or unless they wake up some morning and by some cablegram magic find themselves ardent admirers of Stalin and diligent students of the Third Period?

It is easy to foresee the end of this so-called Metal Workers Industrial League. Its sectarianism will choke it, lead it to decay and finally to the scrap heap of oblivion, unless it is taken over by the militant workers who will fight the steel barons by forming a united front of all steel workers irrespective of their political views or of what newspaper they read.

The mill workers can be organized on an industrial basis only. But they cannot be drawn into an organization which spends its time talking of the Russian situation, the Third Period, etc. These workers believe in organizing to fight the steel barons. Asking them to fight the battles of Stalin is sheer folly.

Organization will yet come but not through our present Communist leadership which insists on substituting wishes for facts and which believes the rank and file are to be merely drilled by the Party bureaucracy.

—CHARLIE BRYNE

and sterile in the sphere of transitional demands. It defends the erroneous slogan of "democratic dictatorship". It combines the scholasticism of Bucharin with the empiricism of Stalin and gives a theoretical elucidation of all the aberrations of Centristism.

It is necessary to construct a program worthy of the theory of Marx and the revolutionary school of Lenin.

One cannot find a way out of the present contradictions without crises and struggles. A favorable change in the relation of forces on a world scale, that is to say some striking success of the revolution would constitute an important and even decisive factor in the domestic affairs of the Soviet Union. But it is impossible to construct a policy on the expectation of some miraculous salvation "in the shortest possible interval". Certainly there will be no scarcity of economic and revolutionary crises in the coming period, especially in Europe and Asia. But this will not be enough to solve the problem. The defeats we suffered after the war taught us that without a party powerful and sure of itself, in full enjoyment of the confidence of the masses, victory is impossible. Well, on this very decisive point, the balance of the post-Lenin period shows a marked deficit.

That is why it is necessary to be able to foresee that the situation internally and internationally heralds a coming period full of prolonged and grave difficulties which will have their political repercussion. The suppressed questions, the hidden doubts, the heavy discontent of the masses will come to the surface. The whole question is to understand whether they will explode tumultuously, taking the Party by surprise or if the latter will be able to muster sufficient forces in itself at the supreme moment to become a new Party (or rather the old party again) in determining its role in regard to the laboring masses. The key to the future is to be found in this alternative.

To effect the retreat which has become necessary, to renew its strategic arsenal without too great damage and without losing its sense of perspective—this is only given to a party that clearly understands its goal and knows its strength.

This demands a collective criticism of the whole experience of the Party in the post-Lenin period. The fraud and lies of "self-criticism" must give place to internal democracy within the Party. A general examination of the general line—not in its application but in its direction—this is the way to commence.

Only the Left Opposition is in the present circumstances capable of condemning and explaining fearlessly all that is going on in the country and the Party to the extent that it is the result of the whole preceding course of developments. As long as this has not been understood it is of no avail to talk of some "general line"—whatever that is.

At the present moment the Left Opposition is more than ever a necessity for the Party. The crimes of the Stalinist apparatus must be put an end to and the Opposition returned to its rights within the Party. This we will once more say to the Sixteenth Congress.

The mission of the Opposition at the present time can be formulated as follows: to increase tenfold its efforts to aid the Party despite all obstacles to overcome the profound crisis which is manifesting itself internally, before there should develop in all its amplitude the crisis of the revolution.

Just as in the years of the imperialist slaughter little uncompromising groups and even isolated revolutionary individuals personified in themselves alone proletarian internationalism, so the Left Opposition, small in numbers and persecuted, is the guardian of the spirit of the revolutionary party. Neither the oppression of rulers nor the treachery of the feeble and exhausted, will shake us of our determination.

Against bureaucratism! Against opportunism! Against adventurism!

For the October Revolution!

For the regeneration of the Russian Communist Party and the Communist International on the basis of Leninism!

For the International Proletarian Revolution!

«MY LIFE» - and Its Critics DeWitt, Browder and Gold on Trotsky's Autobiography

By James P. Cannon

To a revolutionary all activity is a form of struggle and every instrument is a weapon. Cooped up in Constantinople through the amicable cooperation of Stalin and Kemal Pasha—"patiently, waiting for what is to follow"—Trotsky writes his memoirs, and they become a bombshell whose explosion resounds throughout the world.

"My Life" is a literary sensation. The "critics" are amazed at the brilliance of its literary execution. The skillful arrangement of words, in their conception, is an art which belongs exclusively to those who have nothing to say. The legend that wisdom expresses itself through dullness has a wide popularity but that fact does not give it any real value. Why should those who devote themselves to the struggle for ideas not learn the art of presenting them effectively? Trotsky has done this to a superlative degree and has thereby added to his power and stature as a revolutionary politician. His book, besides being a literary masterpiece is a mighty weapon in the political struggle. This, in fact, is its essence.

Political Autobiography

"In these pages," says the author, "I continue the struggle to which my whole life is devoted. Describing, I also characterize and evaluate; narrating, I also defend myself, and more often attack." And again: "This is a book of polemics. It reflects the dynamics of that social life which is built entirely on contradictions." So, in the introduction, the author sets the keynote for his work. That he has succeeded in his design is attested by the flood of comment which the book has called forth—comment which shows that his political blows have hit their mark.

The positive political qualities of Trotsky's memoirs have already been evaluated in the Militant. Since then a number of hostile reviews have appeared in other columns. A review of these reviews should enable us to bring out more sharply and clearly the essential character of the autobiography, since a book, like a man, is also to be judged by the enemies it has made.

As far as the bourgeois writers are concerned it suffices to say that not one of them, to our knowledge, has failed to understand that Trotsky's standpoint is what it has always been. The millions of words that have been written to prove that he has become a renegade to the revolution and an ally of the bourgeoisie have all been wasted as far as these same bourgeois are concerned. For them, now, as before, Trotsky is the symbol and representative of the October revolution, and, insofar as they depart from the purely literary side of his book and express opinions on the Party struggle, their "sympathies" are invariably given to the "practical" Stalin as against the "visionary" Trotsky. This simple fact speaks volumes.

The Social Democrats

If we turn to the social democratic press we meet the same phenomenon. "Trotskyism" has more than once been labelled a "social democratic deviation" in solemn official documents of the Comintern. But with a strange perversity these people also fail to catch the point. The New Leader's review of "My Life" is no less hostile than those of the Stalin press, and what is especially noteworthy—its bitter criticisms reveal such an identity of content with the Stalinist reviews that one could hardly distinguish between them if they were printed side by side in the same journal, with the names of the authors omitted.

Let us first consider the review in the New Leader for May 10th by S. A. DeWitt. The reviewer is somewhat of a "literary" man himself and the conductor of "The Chatter Box". One might think that Trotsky has suffered enough of misfortune and tribulation. But no, another cruel disappointment awaits him: "comrade" DeWitt disapproves of Trotsky and his book, too. He says so straight out with all the heavy solemnity of a man who knows the weight and import of his words.

Trotsky's autobiography is a masterful exposition of the historic process in which individuals are playing their parts. His own activities are related and subordinated to it with an objectivity that is unique in literature of this kind. But, even so, the book remains an autobiography, not a history. It does not merely describe the historic events but relates also the part the author played in them. And this is the first point of DeWitt's complaint.

"There is so much of Leon Trotsky in those six hundred pages of print and phrase that one receives only a hazy outline of the Russian episode." Again: "I'm terribly sorry to have allowed so much animus to creep into a review of a book. But Trotsky has left me so little of impersonal material to judge, and so much of himself, that no other procedure is possible." Well, that's too bad. But how could it be helped? As Trotsky himself remarked: "Nobody has yet succeeded in writing an autobiography without writing about himself."

A big section of the book is devoted to the Party struggle that began with Lenin's fatal illness. The account is a political analysis which shows that it was not as the philistines think, simply a struggle of persons for power. "The struggle of the epigones for power, as I shall try to prove, was not merely a struggle of personalities; it represented a new political chapter—the reaction against October, and the preparation of the Thermidor." On this thesis Trotsky bases his account of the Party struggle; but it is all lost on DeWitt.

He sees, or pretends to see, only the personal side of the struggle and takes Trotsky to task for failing to play the game like a good sport. The conductor of "The Chatter Box" chides the organizer of the Revolution and the Red Army: When it came to stepping down from your pet theories, and playing along with your political comrades on a 'give and take' basis you flopped miserably. Either they would do as you ordered, or they were betraying the revolution.

"This business of being as infallible as God is so stupid."

One might think that DeWitt would stop at this and call it a day. But the Trotsky-killer has tasted blood and presses on remorselessly. "I, for one wouldn't swap a regiment of strutting Trotskys for one Stalin." There's another vote to make it still more "unanimous". He must have thought he was writing a Party thesis. He continues: "Calling all of us names, and then spitting so viciously at Stalin convinces us beyond further argument that your present fall from grace is the direct result of the poetic judgement... wherein great pride cometh before a fall."

Trotsky might receive a grace if he would be a bit humble under his adversities, but his stubborn pride shuts out even that. And he doesn't understand the workers either! "There is an aristocracy about your carriage," says DeWitt, "throughout the adventure which belies your oft-quoted love for the proletariat. There is so little about the workers in your narrative. All you are taken up with is your theoretical paragraphing in this radical journal and that." And so on and so forth. We must leave DeWitt here while we try to catch up with his line of argument in other columns.

The Stalinists

The Stalinists had to take notice of the book in question in order to bury once again the doctrine that has died so many deaths at their hands. And they have done the job this time with characteristic brilliance choosing for the medium, the New Masses.

Why the New Masses of all places and all things? The explanation is simple. Up till now the New Masses confined itself in the war against "Trotskyism" to the modest role of keeping quiet, suppressing all material on the question and refusing paid advertisements for our publications. This course was predicated on the theory that it was a "political" matter; and the New Masses is a hot-house for the cultivation of that flower of the ages: the proletarian writer who has nothing to say about politics.

But "My Life", it seems, is a "literary" product, and that makes it duck soup for the New Masses, which, as everybody knows, is literary at all costs. Consequently we have in the June number not one review but two, and both of them from eminent literati—Earl Browder and Mike Gold.

Quotations from these reviews, after DeWitt's, would weigh this article down with an unavoidable burden of repetition. The soul of DeWitt is marching on in them. The words of "The Chatter Box" leap from the pages of the New Masses like armed men from ambush.

Browder, like DeWitt estimates the historic Party struggle as a contest for personal position and dismisses Trotsky's pretensions in the same cavalier fashion. "The theme of the book is how Trotsky happened to become subordinated to Lenin; how he planned to come into his own when Lenin died; and how the "degenerate" leadership of the Communist movement entered into a conspiracy to despoil Trotsky of his inheritance. Around this rather trite detective story scheme the book is built up." Needless to say the shrewd Browder is not fooled by this dodge about "political issues" at the bottom of the contest and like DeWitt refuses to be lured into a discussion of these extraneous questions. "I, Trotsky, had power," he says, "This was taken away from me by a conspiracy of the degenerate leadership of the Party headed by Stalin." And from this follows logically his pontifical admonition: "The dictatorship of the proletariat can have no more dangerous or insidious enemy than a leader inside its apparatus who thinks in terms of personal power."

Browder Joins the Freudians

For Browder, as for his confrere of the New Leader, there is too much Trotsky in Trotsky's book about his life, and the two reviewers meet again in protest against his "underestimation of the working class". "As a matter of fact"—we are quoting Browder now — "it is almost impossible to find any hint of the existence of the working class in this book. It exists only to provide a dark background which throws into higher relief the brilliant exploits of Trotsky."

What is left of Trotsky after these withering blasts? Putting an upstart in his place is what we call it. And it is to be hoped that he will stay there when he gets the following profound diagnosis of the whole trouble. Trotsky refers to Marx and tries to hinge his case on the Marxian method of social analysis. Browder declines to follow him into this field, being too smart, as they say in the West, to play another man's game. Browder appeals to Freud, and the result is fatal—for Marx as well as for Trotsky. Trotsky has a "complex" says the reviewer—Browder, not DeWitt. Lenin once gave him a pair of shoes which hurt his feet so badly that he recalls the incident in the book after many years. And what does that prove? It proves everything. Says Browder: "Let each amateur Freudian give his own analysis of this interesting paragraph. Our own analysis is that Trotsky's ruling idea, from the time he met Lenin, was connected in one way or another with occupying Lenin's shoes." What mud could be clearer?

Mike "Arrives"

After all this it might be well to let the matter rest. But the review of Mike Gold remains, and who can ignore him? Mike has "arrived", so to speak, and success has made him bold. He thinks he can get away with anything—even plagiarism. There has to be some honor, among writers as well as among thieves, and DeWitt has a just ground to complain at the way Gold has stolen his stuff on Trotsky and has passed it off as his own.

An example: "One point that struck me in Trotsky's autobiography. What Luciferian pride in every line!... Trotsky is too convinced that he is a great man... But there are no supermen. All men are fallible," etc. That's clever, but DeWitt said it first. Why not give him credit?

Another example: "Trotsky writes of the revolution as a chess player might, or a general." And—believe it or not—"He has no feeling for the pathos, the poetry and human beauty of the proletarian masses." This is more literary larceny against which DeWitt may rightly protest. These quotations are the core of Gold's review, and they are lifted bodily, almost literally, from "The Chatter Box". This thing can't go on. For the good of the profession, literary ethics must be observed and swiping the other fellow's stuff must be cut out. Even if such a ruling would debar the New Masses from further participation in the Trotsky discussion there would be nothing really lost. The New Leader will say it for them—and say it first.

The S.P.-Stalinist United Front

The fundamental similarity of the three reviews mentioned has its own meaning for those who look for the political content in literary polemics. It is quite possible that many will fail to see any significance in this united front and ask: "Are people not allowed to have the same opinions once in a while?" And to this we can answer: It is not only allowed; it is unavoidable when they approach questions from the same essential standpoint.

The common ground on the matter at issue of the social democratic philistine and the Stalinist Hessians of the pen only demonstrates how far the official Communist Party has departed from the Marxist method of analysis—the method which seeks the underlying social explanation of historic event and which sees persons—even the greatest as representatives of social forces.

We Oppositionists who fight under the banner of Marxism in the International are often reproached with merely being adherents of Trotsky in a personal struggle. But it is precisely the Oppositionists who protest against such an interpretation of the cleavage in the Party. The struggle of the Opposition against the reaction in the Soviet Union is no more a mere fight of persons for power than was the struggle of the Bolsheviks against Kerensky. In each case the philistines and reactionaries saw only the persons fighting for place, while the Marxists sought to explain the causal social factors and their potent manifestations.

Trotsky applies this scientific method to his entire book about all stages of the Russian revolution up to the present moment. The failure of DeWitt, Browder and Gold to grasp this issue and meet it condemns their interpretations to absolute worthlessness. They miss the point entirely and throw no light on the real questions at issue.

The worker who seeks an understanding of these questions must turn from the critics of Trotsky's book to the book itself. They will find it there.

World Union Membership Declines

AMSTERDAM—(FP)—Official statistics show the trade union membership in 76 countries as of Dec. 31, 1927 and 1928, as respectively 46,187,060, and 44,180,525. This great loss in one year is due to the collapse of the huge figures reported from Asia at the height of the Chinese revolution. For 1927 Asia reported 3,697,000 trade unionists, while in 1928 it reported only 724,194. Chiang Kai-Shek had crushed in blood the Chinese trade union movement which sprang up at the triumph of the revolution in 1927.

Europe reports at the end of 1927 a total of 33,936,784 trade unionists, while a year later its total had risen to 35,392,081. America confessed that while its 1927 total was 7,416,491, its 1928 total was only 6,947,296. Australia rose from 99,652 to 1,018,290. Africa fell from 144,33 to 90,497.

Trade unionism in the United States showed an increase, but in Mexico and other Latin-American countries a loss was registered. European countries making gains in that year—1928—were Austria, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Finland, Italy, Latvia, Luxemburg, Memel, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Yugoslavia. Notable losses occurred in Greece, Great Britain, Lithuania, Poland and Portugal and less losses, in Belgium, Estonia, Hungary, Ireland, France and Rumania.

THE YOUNG VANGUARD

The Misery of India's Youthful Toilers

It would be ridiculous to expect from the British (and their junior partners, the native) ruling classes that have made of India a huge welter of poverty, pestilence, superstition and ignorance anything but the most callous treatment of the young toilers in field and factory. But even we, none too pampered by Hooverian propriety were deeply shocked to read of the terrible conditions the young workers and peasants are forced to live and work under.

Speaking generally, an idea can be gained by noting the fact that infant mortality reaches the rate of 206 per thousand all over the peninsula as compared with 91 in the United Kingdom. In the textile city of Bombay this reaches the sickening total of 667 on the average and 828 in the workers centers. Behind these figures can be glimpsed the terrible poverty, poor housing and poor food that grips the nation, the five acres of land that compromise the average holding, causing the terrible holocausts that sweep the country in the shape of epidemics and pestilences.

The margin between bare existence and non-existence is so slight that the child, when barely able to balance itself must go into the field to work. School is out of the question even if such facilities were present. The British Empire, that carrier of enlightenment, does not deem it necessary to spend more than 11 pence per head in India for education (local, district, national and from the empire) as against the two pounds spent in the British Isles which has none too a high a standard.

When Prince Albert Victor (the royal gentleman on the tins of tobacco) who was the grandson of Queen Victoria visited Poona in 1882, the following doggerel greeted him:

"Tell grandma we are a happy nation,
But 19 crore* are without education."

A crore is 10,000,000.

Of the 269 millions in India today but 22 million know an alphabet. The huge profits, the great taxation, the usury is returned in no form whatever to the masses of India.

If the conditions of the ryots (peasants) are bad, they are infinitely above those of the factory workers. In 1926 there were 1,500,000 factory workers of whom 250 were women and 70,000 are children below 15 years of age. (These figures are a factory population of 2,650,000 with the percentage of women and children doubtless holding their own if not actually gaining.)

Textile is the chief industry in India. Nowhere has King Cotton been a benevolent monarch; his history is one of blood, particularly of women and children whether in England in 1844, in Gastonia or in India from 1919 on.

Read the section of Marx's Capital dealing with conditions in the spinning mills darken the picture and an idea is gleaned of the conditions of the mill cities of India today.

There is a total of 374,380 workers in the cotton industry of India of whom 70,000 are women and over 15 thousand are children.

*A rupee is about 32.4 cents. An anna is one-sixteenth of a rupee or 2 cents and a pies is one-twelfth of an anna or about one-sixth of a cent.

These wages allow the workers a diet on par with that of a Bombay criminal prisoner, a chawl (tenement room) each chawl containing on the average 4 persons.

It is said that conditions in the mills owned by native capitalists are worse than in those owned by the Britishers. (Although this comes from reliable sources it

Communist Youth and the Left Opposition

Of the organizations in the Communist International, none have suffered and continue to suffer such mangling as the Young Communist International. With a splendid background—the struggle of the Youth against the war in unison and under the political guidance of the Bolsheviks, the Russian Revolution, and the splendid leadership of comrades Lenin and Trotsky during the early days of the organization of the Communist International—the Y. C. I. was destined to enjoy a healthy growth and activity.

Education and participation in mass activity—these were the watchwords of the Youth Leagues. Progress was inevitable. The Leagues everywhere enjoyed considerable growth. They embodied a revolutionary enthusiasm and energy that gave rise to splendid activity. The education in Communism and the participation in the class struggles prepared hundreds and thousands of young revolutionaries for future leadership in the ranks of the Party.

This ascent however, in the ranks of the Young Communist International was halted abruptly. In preparation of the struggle against the Russian Opposition under the leadership of comrades Trotsky, Rakovsky, etc., the Stalinist bureaucracy aimed heavy fire against the Youth International. The Youth International was made a mere appendage to the Right-Center bloc. Made to think that the youth alone were the leaders in the struggle for correct political lines in the ranks of the revolutionary movement, the theory of "vanguardism" once again made its way in the Youth International. From this theory grew a negative attitude toward the education of the Youth and their participation in mass activity. In place of a training for the future, the international leagues entered a stage of heated participation in "high politics" and into an unprecedented period of factionalism. There developed in the ranks of the youth cynicism for the elementary tasks of organization.

Beginning with the period of 1923-24 a state of passivity, opportunism and stagnation set in. Bureaucratic direction displaced the education of the Youth. Mass activity was shunted for an accelerated condition of factionalism. The scandalous maltreatment of the Young Communist International left horrible gaps in its ranks. The Russian League alone withstood the heavy decline of its organization.

In Germany the social democratic and Reformist youth gained heavily at the expense of the Young Communist League. In France the League lost 12,000 members and has today a membership of only 3,000. The opportunist policy of the Right-Centrist leadership was not without its effect on the British League. There with the splendid situation caused through the split in the Guild of Youth (Social Democratic) and the General Strike, the League numbers only a few hundred (even Bulky Bill Rust cannot count more). In Sweden the Right wing split carried more than half of the seems hardly likely—the conditions in the British-owned mills challenge worsening.

In the jute mills of Calcutta and Bengal, where most of the jute in the world is produced the average wage for children is 9 pence per day. In 319,000 workers in 76 jute mills investigated 50,000 were women and 29,000 children.

And so it is in the entire country. On the plantations of Assam hundreds of thousands of farm laborers, entire families including babes toil for a few pence per day. Fabled spices of India!

Women and children even dig coal in India, bringing coal to the surface in baskets—human beings are cheaper than hoisting machinery. Of the 250,000 miners, 9 thousand are women and a similar number children.

As for social legislation for children and youth, the little that has been forced through is flagrantly disregarded. Twelve years is the minimum age at which children are permitted to work in factories employing more than 10 workers and using motive power. Between the age of 12 and 15 half time is allowed or 30 hours per week.

A far different side of the story is the profits of 200 and 300%. It was a bad year when only 125% was secured on capital investment. —C. CURTISS

Youth membership into its ranks. The young workers of Austria remain under social democratic influence while the Communist influence is almost nil. The American League continues to remain at a static membership of between 1,000 and 1,500 members. Here the fruits of the Lovestone leadership and the present incompetent, pretentious and impotent leadership of Steuben, Green and Harvey have made matters only worse. (Of the American League more will be said in other articles.) And so on ad infinitum.

The invention of the spurious "third period" theory and the rise of adventurism in political policy has only made matters worse. It has added greatly to the already achieved sectarianism and isolation. The present policies of the Y. C. I. and its Leagues only promise to perfect this condition.

This situation in the Youth movement is but a reflection of the situation in the Communist International. The past seven years history of the Comintern is mirrored in the Leagues, though at times even more grotesque and more accentuated. The solution of the present crisis in the International Youth movement can come about only through a solution of the problems facing the Communist International. The struggle of the Opposition against the present revisionism, adventurism and opportunism alone will solve this crisis. A resurgence and reeducation is necessary—on the basis of a correct political program. That program is the platform of the Opposition. Participation in the ranks of the Opposition and common struggle together with the Party comrades is an imperative task of the Youth. The bureaucratic Stalinist leadership cannot bring about a revitalizing of the International Youth movement. That task belongs to the Opposition. In the solution of the present crisis in the Communist movement the Youth will play no little role. —ALBERT GLOTZER

Lovestone's "Americanism"

the Opposition held by all its adherents from Russia to America. That the danger of the Thermidor is being augmented in the persecution, exiling and shooting of Oppositionists, in the breaking of the alliance between the workers and peasants because of adventurist policies in industrialization and collectivization; in the growing of the power of the Kulak and the Nepmen due to Stalin's zigzag policies; in the ominous growth of the Thermidorian bureaucracy in the Party and the government—only a Herberg can deny while he shuts his eyes and shouts "don't talk to us about Socialism in one country, we want to hear about American questions."

Covering Lovestone's Misdeeds

The most interesting part of the meeting was Herberg's answer to the question of Lovestone's use of underworld tactics in the fight against the Left Opposition and the challenge to debate with us on fundamental questions. Complacently Herberg repudiated the violence perpetrated against the Opposition by the Lovestone group with the naive remark "at that time we were under Stalinist influence". Even if any weight could be attached to this remark, Lovestone will have to explain away their burglary of the Party office and his own tacit silence while Blumkin was shot and thousands of Oppositionists are criminally persecuted and exiled to Siberia. We are still waiting for Lovestone to raise a voice against the exiling of L. D. Trotsky.

Not less demagogic and cowardly was Herberg's reply to the challenge of a debate on fundamental issues. No! Herberg won't debate with us because, 1st, we are too small; secondly because the questions we want to debate about don't interest the American workers. The great Lovestone, the overwhelming "majority" of the American Party refuses to debate with us because we are too insignificant. Only yesterday Lovestone strained every muscle to prove to a recalcitrant minority that "Trotskyism" was the main danger in the American Party. Not quite so distant as that Lovestone shouted to the wide world that the ideas of "Trotskyism" has captured the C.I. We would suggest to Herberg to

BIGGER AND BETTER WARS

Thursday, May 24, a Rochester audience seated themselves in a vaudeville house to be treated to an unexpected view of the latest scientific marvel, television—the combination of radio and vision.

One mile away, in the laboratories of the General Electric Company, artists sang and spoke, a director led the orchestra which was in the theatre, all clearly visible on the screen.

The next morning every thinking person was deeply thrilled as he read the account. This feeling, however, turned into one of abhorrence when he or she read the statement of the developer of the television, Mr. W. E. Alexandersson.

Mr. Alexandersson spoke of the latest discovery as being "inspiring". Of the uses to which this new invention could be put, he said:

"Or what will this mean in the future when a staff officer can see the enemy through the television eyes of his scouting plane or when they can send a bombing plane without a man on board which can see the target and be steered by radio up to the moment it hits?"

You question, Mr. Alexandersson, what it means. Let us tell you:

It means that the next war (in the offing in spite of, or more truthfully, because of, your master class's "peace" and "disarmament" conferences) will make of the last war child's play; that where young workers and farmers were killed singly now they will be slaughtered by the droves for the bosses' greater profits. It means that all your vaunting of scientific progress is a terrible taunt; it means that capitalism is rapidly approaching its doom—either barbarism or Communism: either capitalism will scientifically poison, gas, drown, tear and otherwise efficiently kill the toilers and drag society back into the abyss of barbarism or the proletariat will seize power and society will advance into the next stage, Communism, where man's wisdom will not be used to discover more "rationalized" methods of killing each other, but to provide more leisure, more of the better things of life to the masses. That is what it means!

Capitalism is here shown in its stark, hideous reality. Its path of glory leads but to its grave. And that path is rapidly nearing its end. Every such new discovery but adds velocity to this journey.

Mr. Alexandersson is the guest of the U. S. Navy on the airplane carrier, Saratoga, bound for Panama, to experiment with the pilotless plane.

recall these trifles before he terms us insignificant to debate with.

Evading Questions of Principle

But just like the whole Lovestone crew, no sooner does Herberg say this than he starts to retract it. Well, the reason they didn't want to debate, according to Herberg is because the questions we raise (Socialism in One Country, Chinese Revolution, Anglo-Russian Committee, etc.) "hold no interest for the American workers". When Lovestone was in good graces with Stalin, when he ran the Daily Worker, when we had no press, before we could print any of the suppressed literature, then it was time to scatter scandal, lies and calumnies about us. Now, when we are in a position to reply to his lies and expose his opportunism, Lovestone hides himself in a dark corner and fearfully cries out, "The American workers are not interested in the Chinese Revolution". Whom does this remind us of? Haven't we heard somewhere before this same alibi about the American workers not being interested in fundamental problems but in more immediate and more pressing questions. Doesn't the S. P. carefully avoid the questions of internationalism, the Proletarian Dictatorship, etc. with just such platitudes?

But the Opposition is not afraid to debate with Lovestone on American questions; not afraid to show Lovestone, Herberg and Co. how the question of socialism in one country once helped Lovestone get control of the American party and reduce it to 7,000 and how this question has brought the Party to its disastrous state today and how it will help bring worse results even with Lovestone's kind in power in the future to the American Party.

Unemployment and Communist Tactics

The fresh breaks on the stock market June 12 and 16, the most devastating since last November, burst another bubble in the medicine-man tactics of Hoover, the vaunted engineering genius whose election slogan was "Business Administration" Cotton has slumped. Steel production has declined. The index for automobile production dropped June 14, 36.8 per cent below that of last year.

But the obviously well-fed Secretary of Agriculture Hyde maintains his poise. The nation, he declares in a statement, "is back at work... We have suffered from little more than seasonal unemployment... there was relatively little distress..." If you are of a credulous nature you can take his word for it. On the other hand there are the very conservative figures of the official Bureau of Labor Statistics which reports a further decline of 1.6 per cent in employment and 2.4 per cent in payroll totals in the manufacturing industries in April of this year as compared with April 1929.

It may be added that there are indeed "unemployed" who have "suffered relatively little distress" These are the horde of dividend receivers whose nurtured fingers neither toil nor spin but can and do clip coupons. Recorded dividends and interest payments in May of this year were actually $570,000,000 compared with $490,000,000 a year ago.

The signs accumulate that the capitalist class will seek a way out of this crisis by a campaign for the "deflation" of the workers' wages. In close collaboration with the social democratic bureaucracy of the General Labor Federation the German industrialists have initiated a movement for a ten per cent wage cut to challenge coal and steel markets of Great Britain and the United States. The capitalists of the United States will not lag far behind. It will be a dastardly betrayal of the interests of the German workers by their "leadership" but nothing that the bureaucrats of the American Federation of Labor cannot emulate.

Government reports indicate that per capita earnings in manufacturing industries in April of this year had dropped 4.5 per cent from the levels of 1929. The textile capitalists, bituminous coal and steel industries, where unemployment is on the increase are beginning to talk openly of wage cuts. The open shop organizations are becoming increasingly active.

The situation requires a thorough overhauling of the present course of the Communist Party. The theology of the "third period" must give place to a Marxist appraisal. The workers of the United States are on the eve not of offensive revolutionary struggles but of defensive struggles to resist the capitalist onslaught. If the Party does not give leadership to the masses, if it fails to develop a concrete program of action, if it refuses to organize a broad united front of the masses, if it blindly adheres to its impotent and blind agitation against "social fascism", the social democrats and the labor bureaucrats will be the gainers; the masses and the Party will be the losers.

The Communist movement has suffered heavily from the present factional regime and its false theories. Thousands of workers have been alienated from its influence. But there is still time to retrace the steps of the Party to a line of revolutionary realism. The great tasks before the Party demand a concentration of Communist forces on the basis of Party democracy.

Defeat the Capitalist Offensive!

Organize United Front Against Unemployment and Wage Cuts!

Equipped with thousands of dollars for preliminary expenses, the Senate has launched its star-chamber "investigation" into Communist "plotting" in the United States. The Hoover government, the National Civic Federation, and the American Federation of Labor are a single united front. With the ghost of the infamous Palmer presiding, cabinet officials, labor fakers, stool-pigeons, hungry politicians and the remainder of the unsavory crew burdening society, will testify to the existence of a "Red Conspiracy".

The Crisis of American Capitalism

Outside, in every city of the United States, members of an army of six million unemployed form in bread line. In the shops, relentlessly driven by the speed-up, workers face the menace of wage-cuts. Master-incited Southern mobs burn and lynch poor Negroes. Militant labor organizers of the unorganized and the unemployed in Gastonia, Georgia, California and New York are imprisoned, sent to the chain gangs, or threatened with the electric chair. But parasitical coupon clippers garner the biggest dividends in years. Congress stamps approval on a Tariff to assure the corporations still vaster monopoly profits. Military expenditures for the next imperialist struggle reach the highest peak in history.

The tribunals of the Spanish Inquisition sat in judgement over bourgeois protestantism. The Czarist autocracy sat in judgement over Russian revolutionaries. The United States Senate "investigates Communism". The past is replete with judgements of the dying over the living, of the forces of reaction over those of revolution. But when have such investigations and judgements permanently halted the advance of history or the development of the class struggle? The spectre of Communism which Marx marked as haunting the European bourgeoisie of 1848 has materialized in the Soviet power of today. Nor could any Holy Alliance, Romanoff Ochraza, massacre of Communards or strategy of Bismarck prevent it.

The Open Conspiracy of Communism

It needs no investigation to establish that international Communism is a greater danger to world capitalism than ever before. Communism is an open conspiracy. "The Communists have always disdained to conceal their aims". We openly conspire to organize the workers for immediate improvements in their living conditions. We openly conspire to avail ourselves of every strike, every lockout, every demonstration to sharpen the edge of the class struggle, to lay bare the process of capitalist exploitation and government suppression.

We openly conspire to rouse the workers to resist the mobilization plans for the next war by a revolutionary struggle for the defence of the Soviet Union. We openly conspire to separate the masses in the American Federation of Labor from their treacherous and bureaucratic misleadership of the William Greens and the Mathew Wolls. We openly conspire to organize the toilers of the United States for the proletarian revolution to overthrow the capitalist system and replace the business dictatorship by a revolutionary Workers' Government.

But as a matter of fact the capitalist class has no illusions about the nature of the Communist conspiracy. The investigation is a cover for something else. The ruling class aims to master the deepening economic crisis and improve its position for a sharper attack on the world market and by an offensive for wage reductions. The employers are fully aware that as a result of the mass unemployment and the wage-cutting offensive, tens of thousands of workers hitherto faithful to the traditions of capitalist politics and the craft prejudices of the A.F. of L. will be radicalized by their experience of misery. They are further conscious that the leaven in the working class is the Communist movement, that the Communists understand the laws of capitalist economy and the fraud of bourgeois democracy. To suppress the Communists, to terrorize these proletarian leaders who croon no pacifist and liberal lullabies, becomes the entering wedge of the capitalist offensive against the whole working class.

The Tasks of the Communist Party

In this situation very heavy responsibilities rest upon the leadership of the Communist Party. Sectarianism in these circumstances would be tantamount to political crime against the interests of the proletariat. The possibilities for the advance of the revolutionary movement are great. But to avail ourselves of this historic opportunity, the Party must give leadership to a UNITED FRONT movement against the capitalist offensive. The Party will not be able to do so until it breaks with its present course of blind factionalism and adventurism. The situation must be soberly analyzed for what it is. There is no immediate "acute revolutionary crisis". There are yet no "offensive revolutionary struggles" on the horizon. The masses have not yet deserted the labor bureaucrats and the social reformists. The capitalist class of this country has not yet lost its confidence and its power to rule. But the defensive struggles of the workers can with correct leadership become the starting point for revolutionary struggles in the future. The Party must weed out the verbiage of the "third period" or the Party will be wrecked for years.

For Communist Unity!

The Left Communists (Communist League of America) are profoundly opposed to the present Party regime and its revisionist theories on an international scale. But in the interests of the promotion of the workers' United Front, we are prepared to support every step that the Party undertakes for a concrete program of action against the capitalist offensive. Once started in this direction, we are confident that the momentum of the class struggle will vindicate to the Party membership the full justice not only of the strategy we advocate for the every-day struggle but the historical validity of the revolutionary Leninist principles which motivate our tactics.

HUGO OEHLER JOINS OPPOSITION

Through the adhesion of Hugo Oehler to the platform of the Communist League of America (Opposition), the Left Opposition recruits one of the best types of organizers that the American Communist movement has yet developed. Comrade Oehler was the representative of the National Textile Workers Union in its organizing campaign in the South during the Gastonia struggle and thereafter. He was everywhere hailed as a courageous and clearheaded fighter and leader.

Hugo Oehler has held numerous posts in the Communist Party. He was organizer of the Kansas District of the Communist Party, and during the Colorado coal miners strike directed the Party's work in the field. He is well known to all militants, class conscious workers and revolutionists in the West and South, as well as to the Party organization generally. Oehler has presented the statement in the current issue of the Militant to the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party and to the District Committee in Chicago where he is at present working.

The pre-convention discussion of the Communist Party, the Thesis to the convention and the Comintern organization letter list the greatest number of shortcomings the Party has ever had presented to any of its conventions. A review of these documents will convince one at once that they are not shortcomings in the nature of a progressing party that is at a higher level but at a lower level in comparison with the past, especially in relation to the increasingly favorable objective situation.

Bankruptcy of the Centrist Party Regime

The Central Committee is presenting to the 7th convention a unanimous thesis and resolutions that have been printed in booklet form (after Bedacht's trip) which means it is approved by our parent body in the International Office. This procedure, following the Comintern organization letter to the convention and the admitted mass of blunders, mistakes and shortcomings means (1.) That our present leadership is not capable of drawing up an analysis of the present situation. (2.) That our international leadership does not trust this task to our American leadership. (3.) That the delegates to the 7th Convention are not trusted with this task.

A leadership not capable of drawing up its own analysis is not capable of leading the revolutionary party. A convention that does not protest this action is a strait-jacket convention and not a unity convention. Leadership of the masses cannot be appointed from the International office—it can only be obtained and held by actual leadership in theoretical and practical problems facing the working class. Leadership in the Marxian sense cannot sprout from the top like the Peppers, Love-stones and the present incompetents. The thesis presented dealing with the shortcomings does not and cannot deal with their fundamental causes.

The Menace of Revisionism

The Manifesto of the Communist Opposition to the rank and file and the 7th Convention is a document that clears the way for the membership to a correct understanding. The Manifesto points out the roots of the present Party crisis, not only facing us in this country but facing our comrades in the other parties of our International. The revision of Marxism by the Stalin-Bucharin leadership has derailed the movement in the swamp of the non-Marxist, eclectic, utopian, reactionary theory of the "Building of Socialism in one country", the colonial revolutionary policy and the tactics of the "third period". Activity and more activity will not replace correct Marxist theory and these problems first brought up by the Russian Opposition, seemingly remote and of no concern to the class struggle in America are the determining causes of the present chaotic condition in an otherwise objectively favorable situation.

The Communist Party is the instrument of the working class used as the leader and

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff and American Imperialism

By MAURICE SPECTOR

Amid the gathering uproar of protest at home and threats of reprisals from abroad, the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Bill has received legislative enactment and presidential sanction. It cannot be passed over as of no concern to the workers. Its implications for the development of the class struggle in the United States and the struggle of the imperialists for the world market are far too significant.

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff increases the direct taxes on imports to $630,000,000 a year or about 20 per cent above the present rate. This is a direct gift by the imperialist government of the United States to the monopolies. The masses will bear the burden of these direct taxes on food, clothing, housing and other necessities of life.

Class Legislation

The tariff which is held up as a national policy was always one of the most obvious and flagrant instances of "class legislation". The manufacturers appealed for the support of the workers on the ground that protectionism would fill their dinner pails and the relatively higher wages were pointed to in substantiation. But the wage levels of the workers in this country were due not to the tariff protection but to a combination of circumstances, the great natural resources, the higher productivity of labor and its greater intensity due to superior technical equipment, the inflow of capital, etc. The powerful protection for the United States Steel Corporation has never benefited its industrial slaves. The very people who fiercely resisted trade unionism and proposals for social insurance on the ground that these were class legislation and an interference with "economic laws" of supply and demand, were the interests who continually used their political power to interfere with economic laws of the international division of labor and to secure ever-mounting subsidies from the government treasury. And this was as it should be. The "democratic" state is the political representation of the interests of private property and not of the working class. The fact alone that the British workers enjoyed a relatively higher standard of living than the rest of the European continent during the Victorian period of indolent free trade is enough to prove that the tariff was not responsible for the higher living standards in the United States.

The Economic Crisis

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff is the product of a deepening economic crisis, which coincided with the advent of the "engineering genius" and "Business Administration" of Herbert Hoover. Its sponsors advance the stock argument that it will assure the return of prosperity and keep discreetly silent on the reasons for the loss of prosperity in the first place. That this argument is fraudulent demagoguery should be patent to every worker.

Prosperity had come to be regarded as a special divine dispensation to the United States, an eternal institution. Publicists and professors wrote treatises to prove the "bankruptcy of Marxism" in the light of American experience of the wide diffusion of wealth making bloated stock owners of the workers. Pilgrims from the European social democracy journeyed over to marvel at the wonders of Fordism and the "economy of high wages".

The bubble burst. The stock market began its dizzy dance of calamity. The army of unemployed swelled to five millions. Grain prices fell. Cotton slumped. Commodity prices declined. Output decreased. Exports fell off. American capitalism reveals all the frailties of anarctic production for profit. To propose higher tariffs as the solution for this crisis is sheer demagoguery.

The essence of the economic crisis is the cleavage between the power of production and the capacity for consumption ("effective demand") on the basis, of course, of the relations of distribution that obtain in capitalist society. The masses cannot buy back the amount that is produced. The anarchy of capitalist production for profit manifests itself in the recurrent disproportionality between the various branches of production and the "ineffective demand" the poverty and inability of the masses in society to buy back—is one of the most important elements in this crisis of disproportion. Goods accumulate in the factories but they cannot find the monetary form for their release. The industrial crisis of over production results. Its storm signals have been manifest in the economic situation of the United States for a considerable period. But it was restrained from full expression by the great credit structure built up on easy rates of interest and the brokers' loans, the bull market, that kept the manufacturing and construction industries and the installment plan going.

The Workers' Position

But more concretely, "technological unemployment"—the industrial reserve army—was increasing. The workers paid for the higher organic composition of capital—technical progress—with the penalty of rationalization and displacement by the machine. In 1929 production was 42 per cent greater than in 1919 but the number of workers actually decreased in that interval by 585,000. The Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated the minimum health and decency budget of a working class family of five to be an annual income of $2,262. The average yearly earnings of a worker's family of this kind was $1,280. Five millions of such families lived below this minimum standard, millions barely reached it. The masses were heavily exploited. Prosperity was only for the labor aristocracy.

This is the situation which the capitalist class of the United States faces today. The aim of capitalist production is the realization of profit. Capital accumulates but the rate of profit at home declines. The domestic market alone becomes too narrow a base for the productive powers of American capitalism. Plant facilities are already in huge excess of domestic requirements. Finished manufactured goods amount to one half of the entire foreign sales. Between 1919 and 1928 American exports totalled 53 billion furnishing a surplus over imports of 14 billion dollars.

American capitalism must gird for a grand offensive on the workers and the world market. This is the significance of the tariff.

The number of mergers and consolidations increased until the United States was dominated by gigantic industrial corporations. The policy of these gigantic consolidations is to maintain a complete monopoly of the home market and to bid for the world dominion in the foreign market.

The crisis will accelerate the ruin of the small businessman and small manufacturer. The wages of the American workers will be deflated. The cost of living will increase.

Attack on the World Market

The European competitors of American capitalism profess to be deeply shocked by the cynicism of this tariff, a declaration of economic warfare if ever there was one, coming on the very heels of the London Naval Disarmament Conference. Undoubtedly the economic policy implicit in the tariff is the reality behind the illusions intended to be fostered by the Disarmament Conference. The war that resulted from the economic rivalries of Great Britain and Germany will be a mere sketch compared to the forces of death and destruction that will be released in consequence of the decision of American imperialism to put Europe on a decreasing ration and to throttle her. Protected by the monopolist tariff in the home market, United States mass production will resort to the policy of large-scale dumping campaigns in South America, Asia, and elsewhere.

That the other capitalist powers will counter-attack is plain. Up to the present American imperialism has been able to divide them by demanding the favored nation clause for itself. It has wielded its tremendous financial power to force concessions. Europe barred from access to the great American market will not passively accept its fate without a struggle. The German industrialists have announced a new drive on the world market to release the heavy stocks accumulating in the Ruhr and the drive will open with a ten per cent wage cut for hundreds of thousands of German workers. To meet this challenge the British and American capitalists must in turn bring the pressure of international competition to bear on the workers in the form of wide-spread wage reductions. The general crisis of capitalism will be intensified.

The plans of American imperialism are titanic in their consequences and must finally crash on the rock of their inner contradictions.

Financial Yoke

While seeking to throttle Europe industrially in the world market, American imperialism simultaneously tightens the financial noose. The foreign loans of the United States now total some $26,000,000,000. Capitalist Europe is one of her heaviest debtors. How will Europe liquidate her debts while her markets are conquered by American imperialism? How will she be able to expand while being drained both ways? American imperialism lands in the net of this quandary. Capitalist Europe must either sell goods or default. It is warfare in either case. The record of the United States for armed intervention to collect debts is a very active one.

The pressure on the workers of Europe must become unbearable and create new revolutionary crises. The American section of the German annuities plan, $98,250,000 was recently floated quickly by eleven of the most powerful financial houses in the country headed by J.P. Morgan and Company. These bonds are an integral part of the Young Plan and an unconditional obligation of the German Government. The American experts congratulate themselves on having thus taken the reparations question "out of politics". But they reckon without their host—the German proletariat. Do the American capitalists believe that the German masses will recognize as their obligation the payment of the two billion marks annually for 58 years? As little as the October revolution recognized the French loans to the Czar for the suppression of the 1905 revolution!

The tariff is another step on the road that American imperialism has mapped out for itself to unqualified world power. First, through neutrality and then intervention in the World War, through abstention from the chaos of the Versailles Conference, through the "stabilizing" intervention of the Dawes Plan in 1924 and more recently, the Young Plan.

Towards Proletarian Revolution

La Liberté, a Parisian bourgeois paper asks: "Is the capitalistic world doomed to die through excess of production—simply because those who direct it are incapable of organizing it right?" The Communists' answer is directly in the affirmative.

The basic tendencies of world economy are for international unification. The economic crisis, the imperialist wars, the revolutionary struggles are fundamentally expressions of the fact that the productive forces cannot be contained within the frontiers of the national state nor the fetters of private property. Basically European economy cries out for the abolition of tariff barriers, the whole world for the international division of labor, and the free movement of goods. But the resolutions of the World Economic Conference, the Bankers Manifesto of a few years ago, the various proposals for a customs union can have but little effect. So far from the capitalists being prepared to unify world economy, and utilize its technical resources for international cooperation, the Hawley-Smoot tariff demonstrates yet again, that imperialist monopolies based on the exploitation of labor and motivated by the realization of capital, can only increase the antagonisms, the misery of the workers, and bring greater military conflicts.

Only the revolutionary action of the proletariat for the socialization of production can cut the Gordian knot and free the forces of production for a unified world economy and socialist freedom of trade.

The European bourgeoisie is helpless to stem the tide of the American imperialist advance; it can only prepare for war. Despite the talk of reprisals the American tariff will only provisionally here and there bring common action among the European states. In the end the struggle for markets will intensify their mutual hostilities.

The action of American imperialism will accelerate the development of the proletarian revolution.

The Communist League (Opposition) is beginning to take roots in the labor and trade union movement, and is making marked advances in the organization of its fractions to carry through its policies in the Left wing and working masses generally. Through the Weekly Militant we can better voice our views and present concrete programs of activity as a guide to the workers.

New Forces from Party and the Youth

In the official Communist Party and the Young Communist League of the United States there is a growing resentment and distrust in the ranks, even though largely suppressed by the bureaucracy, with the policy of the official Communist movement. A number of them have however openly voiced their protest and declared their adherence with the views of the Left Opposition. The Weekly Militant makes it possible to work more actively than ever to win the worker-Communists to the program of the Left Opposition.

The Militant and the Economic Crisis

The fate of the Militant as a WEEKLY still hangs in the balance. The League and supporters of the Communist League of America (Opposition) are beginning to rally around the Militant. Two issues of the Weekly Militant have appeared since our appeal. But a greater response is still needed if the Militant is to continue as a Weekly, and particularly to survive during the difficult summer period. This is the critical time. We are confident that if the supporters of the Left Opposition will contribute financially to pass through the "dog days", the future will bring ripe fruit to the Opposition.

The Militant as a Pivot for Communist Growth

The possibilities for the growth of Communism, of the Left Opposition in the United States are good. The Militant is the pivot around which the activities of our movement revolve. On the assumption of the continued existence of the Militant as a Weekly, the Communist League (Opposition) has laid plans for increased activity among the workers. At present, Max Shachtman of the National Committee is touring nationally for the Communist League. Other organizational and propaganda tours are planned for the fall period by other members of the Communist League.

We need $2,000.00, over and above our regular income of subscriptions, bundle payments, etc. to insure our existence, as a Weekly publication for the next six months.

Aftermath of Needle Trades Convention

1. Questions of a Left Wing Program

By James P. Cannon

The convention of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union met at a critical period in the Left wing labor movement. Great and complicated questions of the struggle for a class union, directly affecting the welfare of the sweated and oppressed workers in the industry and bearing on the course of Left wing unionism in general, pressed insistently upon this convention for an answer. They pressed in vain. A false answer was given there to the basic questions of external policy as well as to those relating to the internal life of the union.

Errors which have accumulated into a system and brought about a crisis in the organization, weakening it in the face of its great tasks and responsibilities and supplying a corresponding strength to its enemies, were formally ratified and laid down as a guiding line for the future. The Stalin faction of the Communist Party, which held the convention in the steel vise of mechanical control, gave another demonstration there of its bankruptcy on the trade union question. Repercussions from the convention decisions will be sure and swift; they will fall upon the union, and consequently upon the workers whose fate is bound up with it, like heavy blows over the head.

Party Factionalism Dominates

The convention was a field day for Party factionalism. It was consecrated primarily to a pogrom against the adherents of Lovestone—a disgusting exhibition of mob spirit, full of menace for the future of a union. Howls and boos and the caucous steam-roller—these were the answers to all criticisms and proposals, regardless of their merit, which did not emanate from the Party steering committee. Not even blows were spared in the "ideological" struggle. The Lovestoneites, who were the first to employ these methods in the Communist and Left wing movement, got a double dose of their own medicine at the Needle Trades Workers conventions. But it was not they who will be the losers by it. The Stalinists, who imagined that their mob and hooligan tactics were contributing to the struggle against Lovestoneism, were only demonstrating how well they have acquired some of its most abominable features. The Left wing movement and the Communist Party will pay a heavy price for every "victory" gained by these means.

Factional exclusion from the leading bodies of the union did not stop at the Lovestoneites, the "excluders" of yesterday. Members of the Party who have ventured to exercise a mild "self-criticism" against the ruling bureaucrats were also eliminated from all positions. Everything was cut and dried in advance to the last detail. The "democracy" was simply window-dressing for the gullible. Johnstone, the Party representative, bossed the convention like an arrogant drill sergeant, the veritable symbol of triumphant ignorance! The leadership of the union, which had already been whittled down to Party members, was still further narrowed to members of the Stalin faction of the Party. Thus the Stalinists strengthen their position in the apparatus by weakening the base of the union among the masses. On the side of internal policy the union is worse off than before.

False Attitude on Left Wing

In the most important and decisive questions of external policy the convention also gave the wrong answers. By declaring formally against the organization of a Left wing in the reactionary unions in the industry the convention chopped away the bridge to the workers in these unions, and they are the overwhelming majority of the organized workers in the industry. This decision, and the theory which motivates it—that the right wing unions are "company unions"—are both wrong and are bound to bring catastrophic results.

There may be some who go so far as to think that this decision has sealed the doom of the new union of the Left wing. But in our judgement such an opinion is not well founded. The danger that the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union will degenerate into an impotent sect no doubt exists, and this danger has been increased by the unwise decisions of the convention. But there is yet time to correct the course. It is to this task that the militants of the Left Opposition, who are assembling in the union, must devote themselves. The first prerequisite for success in this struggle for the salvation of the union is clarity in their own ranks on the question of a program for the union. This is the decisive question. The present relation of forces means little; it will be shattered by the impact of events, and soon enough. The correct program is the basis on which the Opposition Communists, triumphant forces of tomorrow, will secure their victory—and the victory of the Left wing workers.

The Relation of Forces

Our policy must proceed from an analysis of the actual situation and the present relation of forces in the industry. Facts and not wishes are important here. The situation is approximately as follows:

In the industry as a whole there are over 500,000 workers.

The Right wing unions have between 150,000 and 200,000 members.

The Left wing union has at most 6,000 members—less in good standing.

Consider these figures for a moment. The Right wing unions contain about 40% of the workers in the entire industry; the Left wing union has about 1%. A further concretization shows that the membership of the Left wing union has the bulk of its organized strength in the dress making shops. Its hold on the cloak makers and furriers is very weak organizationally at the present time. In the men's clothing field, the field dominated by the Amalgamated, the strongest union in the industry, it has nothing. In the millinery section it has little. These figures are very important as a point of departure, but they do not tell the whole story. There are other important factors more favorable to the Left union.

The figures cited above are not a true representation of the actual strength of the rival organizations. The membership of the Right wing unions, and particularly of the International Ladies Garment Workers, is based on shop control, agreements with the bosses and job compulsion. Thanks to the partnership of the union officials with the bosses, a partnership sealed by the capitalist state power, the workers are compelled to belong to the Right wing union in order to get work in the shops affected. Terrorism, hunger and the demoralization of the Left wing forces were the whips with which the workers were driven into the Right wing ranks.

Vitality of Lefts

Sympathy for the Left wing is very strong among large sections of these registered workers. All informed workers in the trade testify to this. "My heart is with you but I must make a living," is a common answer of the registered workers to the appeals of the Left wing. There is no doubt that the Left wing influence has declined in the past two years but it remains a powerful force in the masses. And the leadership of the Communist Party in the Left wing movement is indisputable. There is no other important power.

These facts are a remarkable testimony to the vitality of the Left wing movement among the needle trades workers and to their deep-seated hatred for the Socialist betrayers. Not all the compulsion and terrorism of the bosses, the reactionary labor leaders and the police, and—what is equally noteworthy—not all the blunders of the Party and Left union leadership, have been able to change fundamentally the sentiments of the workers. The real strength of the Left wing union is much stronger in the sympathy of the masses than its organization, as that of the Right wing unions is weaker.

The five or six thousand members of the Left wing union are, for the most part, the battle-ried militants, the dynamic force in the industry. They constitute, and will constitute, the core of the future fighting movement which will smash the present alignment. A Communist policy for the next stages of the struggle must be based on them, as in the past. There is the reserve power which is not shown by the membership figures of the rival unions.

The Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union is not an artificial creation. It was formed as the result of an unavoidable split forced by the traitorous leaders of the I.L.G.W.U. and the Furriers' Union. It had masses of workers behind it. The Left union has a real base in sections of the industry and, as such, has every claim to support. The first point in Communist policy must be: to organize the unorganized and build the new union.

But this is only part of the proper program, not the whole of it as the convention proclaimed. In next week's article we will undertake to explain the necessity of organizing a broad Left wing in the reactionary unions of the industry, the methods and slogans with which this task can be accomplished, and the falsity of the theory of "Company Unionism" which has been invented to justify a suicidal policy.

* * *

The Militant invites Left wing needle trades workers to write for its columns on the situation in the union and to give their view on the problems of their movement. Articles written in any language will be translated into English and printed. The Daily Worker is the closed organ of the cynical bureaucrats—the Militant aims to become the voice of the militant rank and file.

Trade Union Policy

A correct policy on the trade union question and its consistent execution by a sound Communist leadership are decisive for the expansion of the Party as the leaders of the struggling masses. Moreover, the tactics of the Left wing, led by the Party, a dynamic force of gigantic importance, will be one of the most vital determining factors in the future course and development of the trade union movement.

The narrowing base of the A. F. of L. and the increasingly reactionary conduct and policy of its leadership raise before the Party and the Left wing the problem of organizing the unorganized workers in the basic industries, primarily the unskilled and half-skilled, who are becoming radicalized and ready for struggle. It is the task of the Party and Left wing to lead in the work of organizing these masses into new industrial unions. The center of gravity in our trade union work belongs to this sphere. This has been indicated by the whole situation for some time and the long delay of the Party in shaping its course in this direction due to the resistance of the leadership, has already had extremely harmful consequences.

Delegations to U.S.S.R. and the Opposition

The International Committee of the Federation of Friends of the Soviet Union has launched an appeal to the workers and labor organizations of Germany, England, Ireland, France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Luxembourg, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Denmark, Sweden and Canada concerning the invitations of the Central Council of the Trade Unions of the Soviet Union to send Workers Delegations in June and July.

In the course of its struggle with the official leadership of the Comintern and its centre, the Stalin faction, the International Left Opposition with the Russian Opposition at its head has despite all slander and distortion of its position continually manifested its solidarity with the Communist workers and their Party, its unreserved devotion to the Russian workers' state. In its struggle with the self-satisfied officialdom, the Left Opposition has never for a moment forgotten the magnitude of the revolutionary achievements, despite the innumerable mistakes of the leadership. On the contrary, to extend this gigantic labor and to fortify it was the sum and substance of the activity of the Opposition. Hence we warmly welcome the appeal of the Friends of the Soviet Union. The workers delegations to the Soviet Union have always occupied a foremost place in the defence of the Soviet Union against the wild campaigns of the capitalist press and particularly in the exposure of the contemptible slanders of the social democratic leadership. The workers' delegations issuing out of the oppressive atmosphere of the citadels of Imperialism breathe in a new atmosphere of proletarian freedom and learn to know with their own eyes the gigantic achievements of their class.

The call for the election of delegates comes at a time which is characterized by a retrogression of the Communist movement in sharpest contradiction to the favorable objective situation. The ebb of the masses from Communism has unfortunately also weakened their active interest in the Soviet Union. All the more energetically is it necessary that the masses participate in the campaign for the election and dispatch of workers' delegations. But the huge pressure exercised by the Party apparatus atus now as before hamstring the initiative and mobility of the working class element. Nothing could more effectively undermine the value and purpose of the delegations than the artificial undemocratic methods in their composition, bureaucratic tricks and machinations. The Opposition must fight shoulder to shoulder with the revolutionary workers that the delegations be the result of an active and interested movement of the workers

But this doesn't exhaust the obligations of the Opposition. The delegations this year assume in connection with the prevailing situation a particular significance and can fulfil a particular mission. Can they not be of great service to the working class by bringing light on the general political significance of the struggle of the Russian Left Opposition, the import and meaning of which is systematically distorted by the official leadership? Can they throw some light on the "organizational" side of this struggle—and particularly the most recent phase of the campaign of repression against the Russian Opposition?

Since the shooting of the revolutionary Party member, Blumkin, a considerable space of time has passed. But up to the very present not a word by way of self-justification has passed the lips of those who were responsible for the murder. There is nothing strange in this. There would not have been found a single revolutionary worker in the world who would have approved the enormity of assassinating an Opposition Communist for his views. The assassins maintain silence. We must press for an explanation.

The shot which on Stalin's order killed Blumkin was the prelude to a hitherto unparalleled campaign of persecution of Oppositionists for their views in prisons, in solitary confinement, in the wastes of Siberia.

In these circumstances it behooves the workers elected by their class to investigate the life of our proletarian fatherland, to demand on the ground an explanation and an accounting for the suppression of the Opposition Communists. This demand was not refused the socialist leaders of Western Europe, the betrayers of the proletariat, when they asked to examine the conditions of the imprisoned Mensheviks and social revolutionaries at the time of the heaviest struggles of the Russian Workers State. So much the less can the request for an inquiry be legitimately refused to revolutionary workers who proved to be the staunchest fighters for the October Revolution.

The Left Opposition, robbed by the bureaucratic regime of the possibility to make its demands within the framework of the Party, will have representatives through these delegations. The delegates will be charged with energetically ascertaining the facts regarding the fate of Blumkin and the other comrades who have been shot, of investigating the situation of the imprisoned and exiled Communists. It is the duty of all revolutionary workers to see to it that the delegates elected are those with the necessary courage and vigor to take a stand for the persecuted Communist revolutionaries. IAN FRANKEL.

A SQUEAK IN THE APPARATUS (A POPULAR EXPLANATION) OF RIGHTS AND LEFTS

By L. D. TROTSKY

In the March 30th Pravda there is an article by Yaroslavsky entitled "From Left to Right". The article is devoted to the "passage" of the Left Opposition...over into the camp of social democracy. How people, who for over two years have been jailed and exiled for "counter-revolutionary" activity, and even for "the preparation of an armed struggle against the Soviet government" (the official motivation for Trotsky's exile)—how these old time "counter-revolutionaries" can only now begin to "pass" into the camp of social democracy remains a puzzle. But what is clear is that Yaroslavsky still has to sweat at the task of finding a "scientific" explanation for Article 58 of the Criminal Code on the basis of which the Opposition has been persecuted. This search of an explanation takes on a particularly noisy character now, because there is a squeak in the apparatus, and it must be drowned.

It is no accident that it is Yaroslavsky who was let loose against the Opposition, even though there are more literate and wiser people in the Party. But at present, the more literate, the wiser, the more conscientious either do not want to be Yaroslavsky's yes-men, but still cannot, partly dare not speak their mind aloud, or else are simply confused. The Yaroslavskys are not confused, for there is nothing in them to be confused. This is why the defence of the Stalinist policy from the Opposition is taken on by Yaroslavsky, and he gives, let us note in passing, a remarkable example of the rot the Party is now fed on.

If in a way of exception we will this time stop at Yaroslavsky's article, it is because with all its insignificance it is symptomatic, and shows very well in what place, according to the German expression, Stalin's boot pinches.

The Tempo of Industrialization

Several months ago we wrote to the comrades in the U. S. S. R. that the signs indicating the too great speed of industrialization are multiplying. Quoting our Bulletin, Yaroslavsky writes that this evaluation "is absolutely in no way different from what the Mensheviks write". Absolutely in no way!

Yaroslavsky does not surmise that the question of correct or incorrect realistic or unrealistic tempos exists in itself independently of what the Mensheviks say about it and is decided in connection with material and organizational factors, and not newspaper quotations, all the more when these are falsified.

In the period when we Oppositionists fought for higher tempos of industrialization (1923-29), the bourgeois press of the whole world together with the social democratic, followed in the foot-steps of Stalin, repeating the accusation that the Oppositionists were "romanticists", "fanatics" and "super-industrialists".

In 1923-25 we proved that even after the exhaustion of all the pre-revolutionary means of production, Soviet industry will be able to have a 20% yearly growth. We supported this contention on economic considerations which we will not cite here (see "Whither Russia—Towards Capitalism or Towards Socialism", pp. 45-46, Russian edition). A year after that a five year plan was worked out in the womb of the Gosplan (State Planning Commission). According to this plan the development of industry was to proceed at the diminishing rate of speed, from 9% to 4% a year. The Opposition condemned this plan mercilessly. It was accused of "demagoguery". Another year later the Politbureau approved a new five year project with a 9% yearly growth. The Fifteenth Party Congress approved the correctness of this rate and condemned the Opposition for "...non-belief" and "skepticism". This did not stop the Opposition from irreconcilably condemning the new five year plan. Another year and a half later the Gosplan finally worked out a third five year plan with a yearly increase of 29%. This growth coincided—much closer than it could be expected—with the hypothetical prognosis of the Opposition in 1925, and fully refuted all the preceding clamor about industrial romanticism and demagoguery. Such is the brief pre-history of the question.

The actual growth of industry in the first year of the five year plan (1928-29), exceeded the plan, however, by fully 10%. The leadership immediately decided, basing itself on this success, to complete the five year plan in four years. Against this the a) It is impossible that there are no disproportions in the project of the five year plan. With the fulfilment of the plan they will accumulate, and may manifest themselves sharply, if not in the first year then in the second or third year of the plan which would result in the arrest of growth. Before industry takes on additional speed, we must, speaking in military terms, carefully examine all abutments or junctions, where all branches of industry interlap each other.

b) The noticeable depreciation of the quality of the products, which is extremely low as it is, is a great danger not only for the consumer but for industry as well, because industry itself is the chief consumer of products. Low quality must inevitably result in a drastic decline in the quantity of production.

c) The question of the tempos of industrial development must not be separated from the question of the living standards of the working masses, because the proletariat is the main producing force, and only the sufficient rise of the material and cultural standards of the proletariat can guarantee the future high tempos of industrialization. We consider this question of supreme importance.

These are the three chief considerations which prompted the Opposition to raise its warning cry against the reckless pursuit of tempos which replaced the economic lag of the preceding period. If in 1923-28 the Political Bureau of the Party, not understanding the tremendous possibilities inherent in nationalized industry and planned methods of production were ready to make peace with the idea of four or nine per cent of growth—then now, not understanding the material limits of industrialization it makes a light-minded jump from twenty to thirty per cent, adventurously attempting to transform each partial and temporary achievement into an absolute rule, and completely overlooking the interdependency of different phases of the industrial process.

When we call for the abandonment of the formal pursuit of quantity and for an actual improvement of quality—does this mean that we call for retreat from actually achieved successes? When we demand the utilization of a part of the accumulation for the actual needs of the workers—does this mean that we endanger the industrialization? When we demand that before the 30 per cent annual growth is turned into an iron law, we should examine the interrelation between the different branches of industry and national economy as a whole from the point of view of the productivity of labor, the production costs—does this mean that we call for a retreat to the Stalin position of yesterday?

If the question is really decided so simply then why should we stop at thirty per cent? Fifty per cent is still more. Whoever does not wish to pull "back" must inscribe on his banner at least seventy-five per cent. Or perhaps thirty percent is destined to be the rule? Destined by whom? Destined how? The unfortunate leaders simply arrived at this rule by running into it blindly in the first stages of carrying out the twenty per cent plan, which they themselves fought against tooth and nail for several years. Now it appears that only thirty per cent is Leninism. Whoever says to the frightened opportunists: do not lose your heads, do not push industry into a severe crisis—is, don't you see, "absolutely in no way different from the social democracy" absolutely, in no way!

Aren't these people jesters?

Collectivization

Matters fare still worse if possible with the peasant policy. For a number of years the Politbureau built its agrarian policy on the idolization of the mighty middle peasant and the individual peasant economy generally. The Kulak they simply did not notice or declared insignificant until he concentrated in his hands forty per cent of the marketable bread and acquired the leadership over the middle peasant in addition. Having created his own economic connections and channels the Kulak refused bread to the government industry.

After this (to be exact, after February 15, 1928) the belated and frightened leadership struck the Kulak with a hail of administrative repressions which immediately clogged the circulation of peasant commodities, practically liquidated the NEP and chased the middle peasant up into a blind alley.

When we say that this blind alley was the starting point of the new chapter in the collectivization we do not discover or invent anything new. We simply repeat what the official Soviet press has admitted many times. If Yaroslavsky walls that "not one reactionary has come to think of such an abominable explanation" it merely shows that being absorbed by the perusal of Oppositionist correspondence, the poor man does not read the economic articles in the Soviet press. Yaroslavsky is particularly agitated when we say that the middle peasants have been wavering between collectivization and civil war. He calls this remark "complete renegacy". (The vocabulary of this eavesdropper is not very rich.) But the whole Soviet press is full of information that the peasants, i. e., the middle peasants rapaciously exterminate and dispose of their live stock inventories. All the leaders call this situation "threatening". The newspapers explain this matter, by the influence of the Kulak. They certainly do not mean "ideological" influence but economic ties between the Kulak and the middle peasant, a certain interdependence of the whole peasant economy, market as well as of commodities and finances. In the wholesale selling of cattle as a mass phenomenon we have nothing else but a quiet sabotaging form of civil war. On the other hand, the movement of the farm Collectives (Kolkhozes) has a mass character also. Isn't it clear that the double nature of the middle peasant who combines within himself a toiler and a merchant has reached in the present stage the most contradictory expression? The middle peasant wavers between collectivization and civil war and to a certain degree combines one with the other. This is where the acuteness of the situation and its danger lies. It will increase ten fold if we do not understand it in time.

The Opposition Platform

In the years when three quarters of the Politbureau and 90 per cent of the government apparatus had their orientation on the "mighty peasant"—that is on the Kulak—the Opposition demanded energetic measures for agricultural collectivization. Let us recall that in the Platform of the Opposition these demands found the following expression "To the growing 'farmer' tendencies of the village we must oppose a faster pace of collectivization. It is necessary to make systematic, year-in-and-year-out allowances to aid the poor peasants organized in collectives."

—(Platform of the Russian Opposition, page 24).

And further:

"We must invest greater means in the Sovkhoz and Kolkhoz (Soviet and collective farms). We must afford the maximum privileges to newly organized Kolkhozes and other forms of collectivization. No person deprived of electoral rights can be a member of a Kolkhoz. All the work of cooperation must be penetrated with the task of transferring small production into large-scale collectivized production. It is necessary to carry through a strictly class line in the supply of machinery particularly through a struggle with fraudulent machine-owning groups."

—(Platform of Russian Opposition, page 26.)

We did not pre-determine the tempo of collectivization because it was for us (it still remains so) a derivative proposition in relation to the tempo of industrialization and a series of other economic and cultural factors.

The Politbureau plan two years later outlined the collectivization of one fifth of the peasants during the Five Year Plan. We suppose this figure did not simply come to Kryzhanovsky in a dream but was based on technical and economic considerations. Was it so or not? Nevertheless during the first year and a half three-fifths of the peasantry were collectivized. Even if we should assume that this swing of collectivization is a complete triumph of socialism we must simultaneously state the fact of the complete bankruptcy of the leadership because planned economy pre-supposes that the leadership foresees to a certain extent the basic economic processes.

Nevertheless there is not even a suggestion of that. Bucharin the new, the reconstructed, completely collectivized and industrialized Bucharin admits in the Pravda that the new stage of collectivization grew out of administrative measures in the struggle for bread and that this stage was not foreseen by the leadership "in all its concreteness". This is put not too badly. The mistakes of tempo they made in the considerations of planning amount all in all to one thousand percent. And in what sphere? Not in the production of thimbles but in the question of the socialist transformation of the whole of agriculture. It is clear that some of this "concreteness" Stalin and Yaroslavsky really did not foresee. Bucharin is right here.

As is well known we never suspected the present leadership of an over-abundance of penetrating ability. But it could never make this kind of mistake if collectivization would in reality have grown out of our conquering the conviction of the peasants by experience of the advantages of large scale collective economy over individual.

Collectivization and Adventurism

Of course we do not for a moment doubt the deeply progressive and creative significance of collectivization. We are ready conditionally to assume that in its scope it approximately corresponds to the sweep of the Five Year Plan. But where did the one thousand per cent additional success grow out of? That must be explained! Let us assume that the work of the Kolkhozes during the preceding twelve years was so successful that it could convince the whole peasantry, not only of the advantages but of the feasibility of general collectivization. It is clear that this kind of conviction could only be developed by means of Kolkhozes based on tractors and other machinery. It may be assumed that the overwhelming majority of the middle peasants actually recognizes today the advantages of working the land by the tractor. But from this, complete "tractorization" does not yet follow because we need not only the conviction of its advantages but the tractor itself. Did the authorities warn the peasants of the actual situation in the sphere of technical material possibilities generally? No! Instead of restraining a panicky collectivization, they extended it by their mad pressure. It is true that now in order to defend the mistake of the one thousand per cent tempo a new theory has been created making the question of technical resources one of tenth rate importance and claiming that socialist agriculture ("the manufacturing kind") can be created by catechism irrespective of the means of production. We are however, determined to reject this mystical theory. We do not believe in such a conception of socialism. Moreover we declare a merciless war against this mythology because the unavoidable disappointment of the peasants threatens to create severe reaction against socialism in general and this reaction may also embrace considerable circles of workers.

Stalin started his last retreat—the inevitability of which he foresaw on the eve of it just as little as he foresaw complete collectivization half a year earlier when he was busy with his trivial "theorizing" about the untimeliness of a socialist regime for the peasant poultry. The latest dispatches announce that Stalin has succeeded in marching a considerable distance—not forward (oh, wise Yaroslavsky!) but backward. From sixty percent collectivization to forty per cent. We do not in the least doubt that he will still have to retreat a considerable percentage more—always at the tail end of the actual process. Foreseeing this several months ago—that is in the very heat of the collectivization push—we warned against the consequences of bureaucratic adventurism. If the Party had read our warnings as they truly were and not in the belated distortions of Yaroslavsky many mistakes would have been, if not avoided, at least greatly modified.

In Germany

Comintern Loses Fresh Opportunity

The Wedding convention of the Communist Party of Germany basing itself on the so-called "third period" invented by the Sixth World Congress proclaimed the presence of "an acute revolutionary situation" in the country. The permanent phrasemonger, Thaelmann, strove to demonstrate this incessantly in his rhetorical reports. The official Party press daily devoted to this discovery long winded articles. The talk was of "mass struggles", of "direct assaults" that would smash the capitalist state. Because we of the Left Opposition characterized this appraisal of the situation as unMarxian and mechanical we were designated as pessimists who had "lost their belief in the revolution". The principal slogan of the Party for this "period" invented by the Party officialdom was: "Proletarians fight for a Soviet Germany". On the basis of such an estimation it was no longer necessary to approach the working masses exploited by the bourgeoisie with the help of the social democracy, on the every day questions.

"The Acute Revolutionary Crisis"

It was clear to every Marxist that this noise of the "acute revolutionary situation" was a criminal piece of rhetoric that had nothing in common with the Marxist reality. The Comintern leadership which since 1924 has brought tremendous defeats to the Communist Parties and the proletariat through its false policies (1923 in Germany; 1925-27 in China; 1926 in England, Russia, Bulgaria, Estonia, Poland) and which since 1928 has carried out an ultra-Left zig-zag, would not take the real situation into consideration.

Let us return to the realities of the German situation. What do the figures say regarding the struggles and temper of the working class?

Facts and Figures

In 1928 the number of strike days in Germany was 10.4 millions and in 1929 this number sinks to 4.4 millions; in 1928, 780,000 workers went on strike whereas in 1929, 233,000 went on strike. Whoever will not take these figures into account cannot understand that strikes are a barometer of the militancy of the working class. These figures mean that the militancy of the workers had declined.

The results on the Provincial (Landtag) elections and the municipal (communal) elections both show everywhere a marked decline in the votes of the Communist Party of Germany. On the other hand the social democracy has either held its own or even made gains. The National Socialists (Fascists) have registered very considerable successes. In Red Thuringia the Communist fraction in the Provincial Legislature is composed of six comrades as against the seven representatives of the Fascists.

The Party itself has not only not increased its membership but has lost members. The Party membership can at most be estimated at 70,000.

Party Influence Sinks

In all proletarian organizations and particularly in the trade unions the influence of the Party has almost completely disappeared. The "tremendous" successes of the Party in the factory committee elections with the help of the "red shop committee slates" were in the first instance only the result of the dissatisfaction of the workers, a protest against capitalist repression and its henchmen the reformists. They did not at all represent any readiness immediately to smash the capitalist state. The best proof of the justice of this estimate are the results in the Leuna Works, in the Opel Automobile Works and the Hamburg Docks which record a huge decline in the votes of the Communist slate.

Percentage of Total Votes in

	Leuna Works		Berlin V.A.G.
	1929	1930	1929	1930
Red List	51.3	34.7	52.4	28
"Free Trade Unions"	32.7	37	29	28
Christian Union	3.2	5.3	7.3	8.6
Patriotic Unions	9.6	16
Nationalists			9	7.2
Fascist				6

The workers who gave their votes to the Communist Party in the preceding year turned their backs on the policies of the Party because they showed no way out against the capitalist offensive.

And what are the facts concerning the most recent proof of the "acute revolutionary situation" in Germany—i. e., the demonstrations! The calendar-like campaigns of the Party have been successively weaker. With three and a half million unemployed the Party succeeded in bringing out to the streets from 5 to 7 per cent only. The last demonstrations of February and March ended in a great fiasco.

Nevertheless the situation in Germany has been favorable for the separation of great sections of the working class from the social democratic party and the crystallization of a Communist mass party in Germany.

Social Democracy Betrays

The social democracy has entered into a new coalition with the finance capitalist bourgeoisie. In contrast to its former coalition policy, the situation of the S.D.P. was incomparably more difficult. Why? In former years of its coalition, the social democracy could still present the workers with some minimum reforms. The bourgeoisie could not so quickly forget the revolution. They still felt the temper of the October atmosphere of 1923. The bourgeoisie was, moreover, not strong enough economically nor politically to force across its will against the resistance of the workers. The economic and political organs of bourgeois authority had not yet been extensively enough developed. The bourgeoisie had still to make concessions to the workers.

But the coalition policy of Hilferding-Mueller in 1928 was that of the direct betrayal of the every day interests of the working class. The social democrats worked not only for the extension of the power of the capitalist state (cruisers, police, Defence of the Republic Act) not only supported the further offensive of the banks and trusts (concentration, rationalization, etc.) but betrayed everything the workers had conquered from the capitalists in the period of the revolutionary wave. Through their Minister of Labor Wissell, the social democrats agreed to the wage reduction. They voted for the reduction of the unemployed benefits. They began the reduction of the Sick Benefit pensions. With their support of the Concordat agreement, the social democrats helped to re-establish the clerical reaction. They helped to impose further indirect taxes on the masses. And all this in the period of the greatest unemployment in Germany. The social democracy has not only not given the workers any new reforms but is actively aiding the bourgeoisie to deprive the workers of those concessions they had already secured by the road of struggle.

Looking at the situation from this viewpoint everything was favorable for an advance of Communism. Had the Communist Party linked its slogans and platform with the every day needs and problems of the workers, it could have broken the tie between the social democratic workers and their leaders and have assured the triumph of Communism.

But all our Communist Party leaders could do was to shower the social democracy with abuse.

The False Approach of the Stalinists

To this end the formula of "social fascism" was invented. The agitation against "social fascism" took on a hysterical scope. Not only was the Berlin Police President Zoerglebel characterized as a "social fascist" but every worker in the social democracy was likewise denounced as a "social fascist". The slogans became "Out with the social fascists from the factories". "Out with the social fascist children from the schools."

The tactics of Remmelle and Thaelmann gave the social democratic leaders their opportunity to cover up their betrayal of the interests of the workers and aided them to pass over from a defensive to an offensive position. The slogan of "social fascism" played into the hands of the social democratic demagogues: "To the extent that the Comintern identifies the democratic domestic of capitalism with its fascist bodyguard, it does the social democracy the very best service... In those countries where fascism represents a power, Italy first, then Austria and Germany, the social democrats have no difficulty proving to the masses not only the differences but even the hostility between themselves and fascism. To this extent the social democrats are relieved of the necessity of disproving that they are the democratic servants of capital. The whole political struggle is shifted to an artificial plane which is exceptionally favorable to the social democrats." (L. Trotsky—Open Letter)

The very favorable situation could have been utilized had a different policy been applied—not the "social fascism" slogan nor the Brandlerist conception of a united

Opposition Defends Indo-Chinese Rebels

The International Left Communist Opposition has extended its struggle to one more sector. This is in connection with the revolutionary movement in Indo-China against the sanguinary acts of repression of French Imperialism.

The official Communist Party in France is non-existent so far as Indo-China is concerned where the proletariat is being ferociously exploited and where imperialism maintains its police dictatorship over the native proletarian population by fire and sword, torture and death. This atrocious misery has already evoked movements of spontaneous revolt that the young native bourgeoisie more or less independent of French capital, has sought to direct to its own ends. In consequence of the revolts of Yen Bay, of Vinh, etc., 39 Indo-Chinese revolutionaries have been sentenced to death and four of these have already been executed. The Criminal Commission of Phu Tho is about to condemn ten other revolutionaries to death, one to life long imprisonment, twenty-six to hard labor for the rest of their lives, thirty-eight to deportation, etc.

The Indo-Chinese workers in France and the French proletarians have under the leadership of the Communist League of France (Opposition) embarked on an energetic protest action to prevent these sentences from being carried out any further and this campaign must strike an echo in the hearts of the workers of all countries.

In front of the Elysee in Paris a strong demonstration took place on the call of the Communist League following which several comrades were imprisoned. Despite all the attention this demonstration stirred up in the bourgeois press, despite the fury of the attack of the government against the Left Opposition, the leadership of the French Communist Party and the Humanite have MAINTAINED COMPLETE SILENCE because our Indo-Chinese comrades fought under the flag of the Communist League (Opposition). It was only after direct protests and by way of leaflets and public notices that the Humanite finally made up its mind to defend our Indo-Chinese comrades.

But the opportunist leadership of the Party and the Humanite even while defending our comrades, betrayed them. In the articles of the Humanite they were represented as being the adherents of the official policies of the Communist Party and the Stalinist policy in the colonies for "the right of self-determination for their complete independence" (Humanite, May 28th, 1930). Nothing could be more false.

The Indo-Chinese comrades have condemned the Stalinist colonial policy applied by the Comintern regime throughout the world and particularly in Asia. The Indo-Chinese comrades are an integral part of the International Opposition.

Together with the Left Opposition, the Indo-Chinese comrades are not satisfied to fight for "self-determination up to complete independence" after the fashion of Chiang Kai-Shek but call for the formation of an independent revolutionary party of the working class to wage the struggle for the social revolution against both French imperialism and native bourgeois exploitation equally and in closest contact with the French working class. "Proletarians of all countries, unite" must become more than a mere slogan. It must be carried into life.

front which is always the tail-end of the social democracy—but the Leninist tactics of the united front would have unmasked the Left as well as the Right wing leaders of the social democracy. Not "Red Factory slates" at any price, not the abandonment of work in the trade unions but tireless work in all the mass organizations was the need.

It was evident to us all that the social democracy would be thrown out of office as soon as the bourgeoisie could afford to dispense with its services. But the centrist leadership of the Communist Party missed the real point of the situation. The result has been the isolation of the Communist Party inside the working class and the consolidation of the social democracy despite its betrayals. The S.P.D. even parades now as an "Opposition" Party. The subjective factor in history—the Communist Party—has again failed.

Diego Rivera Retires from Political Life

The leadership of the official Communist Party in Mexico have been making incessant attacks on the expelled Mexican Communist artist, Diego Rivera, who for a period of time after his expulsion was a member of the Left Opposition group. The position and work of this talented artist is such that a good regime in the International drew him ever closer to Communism—a bad regime repulses him. As a "fellow traveller" his services to the Communist movement have been and can continue to be in the future very considerable. So long as the Stalin faction regarded him as a useful intellectual lackey—a la Enrbusse in France and Michael Gold in the United States—he was held in high esteem by them. When Rivera began to revolt against the poisonous atmosphere created in the Comintern by the bureaucracy—he was discovered to be a "counter-revolutionary"

Owing to his conflict with the authorities Rivera lost his painting assignment in the National Palace and was expelled together with all his followers, teachers and students from the "National Autonomous University" of Mexico for the radical course of studies he introduced into the School of Fine Arts. In his fight against the reactionaries the slogan of Rivera's group of students was "Against the bourgeois university, for a University of the Workers and Peasants." The more heroic sacrifices of the embattled Barbusses and Golds are unknown to us. We do know this: that the flaming proletarian litterateur and editor of the New Masses, Michael Gold, never recoiled in horror from the idea of having the "proletarian" banker, Otto H. Kahn finance his productions.

In his desire to take the wind out of the sails of Stalinist demagoguery, Rivera has sent us the following statement for publication:

"I declare that neither the Communist Party nor the bourgeoisie can hold the Communist Opposition responsible for my actions for which I assume full responsibility, not having had since the deportation of comrade Negrete any contact with the Opposition. The special character of my professional work—that of a mural painter—obliges me to maintain certain economic contacts with those who pay for this work—which has always been used in the interests of the revolution—as my paintings can prove. For this reason however I am continually utilized by the Stalinist party and by the bourgeoisie as an arm against my own comrades, in consequence of which, I declare that I cannot amputate from my personality that which is my life itself, that is to say, my art; and being unwilling to hinder the activities of the Opposition by my presence in its ranks, and considering it my duty, I retire definitely from all political activity."

Rivera further declares that his sympathy continues as formerly with the Opposition program as against the opportunism and adventurism of the official leadership.

Towards a Concrete Program of Action

Social Insurance

The problem of social insurance in a program of Unemployed Demands is treated by the present Party leaders as an illegitimate child. This despite the spasmodic proddings of the Comintern and the R. I.L.U. upon the Party on different occasions to evince a little greater activity and sincerity in this field.

The demands for Unemployment Insurance, Old Age Pensions, Sickness Insurance and the like are treated by the Browder-Bedacht pontiffs as evidence of secret "social-fascist" cravings. They apparently envisage the demand for social insurance as purely parliamentary maneuvering and not a by-product of the class struggle like all other reforms and concessions "granted" to the workers by capitalist legislatures. Social insurance does not fit in with the rantings of the "third period."

Social Insurance as a By-Product of Struggle

But for the revolutionary party to surrender the representation of these demands of the socialist party, the Muste group or the other petty-bourgeois reformers would be a great blunder. If the Party does that it does not seriously have regard to the possibilities of a revolutionary utilization of parliamentary action. In fact the Communist Party is being misled by the adventurist leadership at its head into the frame of mind and tactics of the bourgeois "boycottists" in the history of the Russian social democracy. It will become so "pure" that it will end in sterility.

The presence of social insurance in Great Britain and Germany on the statute books for many decades has not prevented the development of the class struggle, and can not so long as the basic contradictions of capitalism dominate the social structure. The British workers have continued to organize great strikes and to move steadily to the Left. Bismarck's legislation to "steal the thunder" of the socialists has not prevented the rise of a Communist mass party and the development of revolutionary crises that under revolutionary leadership could have resulted in a German Soviet Power.

Capitalist Responsibility for Unemployment

Will anyone revolutionary seriously argue that the Salvation Army, private soup kitchens, the net-work of social-service and charitable institutions maintained by the business interests are preferable to State insurance in the sense that they make the workers more class conscious or "pauperize" them less? The bourgeoisie in Great Britain is constantly seeking ways and means for cutting down the "dole". W. I. King, the well known American statistician attacks the dole on the ground that it is the real reason preventing an industrial revival. He wants a free market in the commodity of labor power, governed by "supply and demand". He blames the trade unions and the "dole" for preventing the "deflation" of wages. And he warns the American capitalists that they are running the same risks if they permit the enactment of unemployment insurance in the United States.

W. I. King and his associate bourgeois economists make a deep mystery of the recurrence of the "business-cycle". They find every explanation of it under the sun, but the real one of the anarchic character of capitalist production for profit. The capitalist system is responsible for the "business-cycles" and for the standing and recurrent mass unemployment. The Capitalist State must be compelled by the organization and struggle of the masses to shoulder the charges of unemployment.

Credits for the Soviet Union

Not the least of the derelictions of the Stalinist leadership of the Communist Party has been its failure to rally the unemployed around the demand for credits for the Soviet Union. Unremittingly and windily the Daily Worker "sloganizes" for the "Defence of the Soviet Union", but when the whole international economic crisis favors the crystallization of one of the widest mass movements yet for the real and substantial Defence of the Soviet Union, the Stalinist regime and its American agents, Browder-Bedacht-Foster do nothing but hamper the Party from measuring up to its great opportunity. The reason for this attitude of the Party leaders flows not from any malice but inevitably from their false theory of "national socialism"—Stalin's Russian "exceptionalism".

Economics and Military Defence

The Defence of the Soviet Union is not as the Daily Worker would like to impress its readers, a purely military question, a matter of preventing imperialist intervention. In this age military strength itself depends on industrial power. In the case of the Soviet Union it depends not only on industrial power but on the consolidation of the proletarian dictatorship and socialism. But socialism cannot be built up in the Soviet Union entirely out of its own inner resources and separated from the world market by a Chinese wall. The difficulties that the great Five Year Plan and collectivization are experiencing today in the U.S.S.R. demonstrates this exactly.

To hold anything else is a flagrant rupture with Marxist analysis and proletarian internationalism.

International Solidarity

The demand for credits for the Soviet Union at once reveals the inner link between the interests of the American working class and the workers of the Soviet Union. Millions are idle in the United States. But the socialist plans of the Soviet Union cry out for machinery and other industrial equipment. Employment here and collaboration with the Five Year Plan in the U.S.S.R. would be the consequences of large scale credits. Thousands of American workers would receive practical lessons in the implications of internationalism in the fundamental struggle between capitalism and socialism and the meaning of Communism. Thousands could be mobilized for the U. S. S. R. and against the capitalist government of the United States.

The slogan of credits to the Soviet Union is one that the labor bureaucracy and the international social democratic leaders will resist. They would sense in it the possibilities of a united front that would draw the rank and file away from them and towards the leadership of the Soviet Union and the Communists. They are right. "Credits for the Soviet Union", is one of the most forceful focal points for a united front movement. —M.S.P.

Our Slogan of Collaboration with the Soviet Union

The approaching crisis of Soviet economy coincides with the growing world capitalist crisis. This coincidence has in the final analysis common reasons. World capitalism has outlived itself but the undertaker is not yet ready for his work. The crisis of Soviet economy, if we leave aside the mistakes of the leadership, is the economic consequence of the isolated condition of the U. S. S. R. That is the very fact that the world proletariat has not yet swept away capitalism. The problem of the proletarian revolution is the problem of the organization of socialist economy on a world scale. For Europe whose capitalism is most overripe and sickly, the proletarian revolution means first of all the economic unification of the continent. The only way we can and must prepare the European workers for the seizure of power is by revealing to them the immeasurable advantages of a correctly planned all-European and later on a World organization of socialist economy. The slogan of the Soviet United States of Europe which is imperative now more than it ever was is inadequate however, in its abstract political form. This slogan must be filled with concrete economic content. The economic experience of the Soviet Union is fully sufficient to create an exemplary variant of the plan based on the collaboration of the U. S. S. R. with the industrial countries of Europe. In the final historical analysis this is the only way out for the U.S.S.R. from the growing internal contradictions. Neither has Europe any other way out of the crisis (unemployment, the growing oppression of America and the perspective of wars). The problem of collaboration in its full dimensions can be decided only through a proletarian revolution and through the creation of the Soviet United States of Europe which through the medium of the Soviet Union will also be tied up with liberated Asia.

The European workers must be led by this perspective. They must be presented with a clear and broad plan of economic collaboration based on the exceptionally high coefficients of growth accomplished even in backward isolated Russia. This is the immeasurable revolutionary significance of the slogan of economic collaboration with the U. S. S. R. if it is advanced correctly—that is in a revolutionary manner.

Under the present circumstances this slogan is above all one of the most valuable weapons for the mobilization of the unemployed and the workers in general in connection with unemployment. This is not merely a matter of the possible delivery of commodities to the Soviet Union as important as this question is in itself. It is a question of getting out of the historical impasse, of altogether new economic possibilities of a United European economy. With this kind of concrete "supra-national" plan based on experience in our hands, the worker-Communists can and must approach the social democratic worker. Under the conditions of the crisis this is the most important approach to the problem of the socialist reconstruction of Europe. With the correct application of the united front policy the slogan of collaboration with the U.S. S.R. and the economic transformation of Europe can be made the wedge that would break off large circles of social democratic workers from the present leaders.

But for that we must first of all liquidate, reject and condemn, the theory of socialism in one country. We must make clear to the world proletariat that the Russians are not constructing a separate socialist home for themselves, and that such a structure on a national scale is generally impossible. They are constructing a national wall for the European and later on also for the world socialist home. The further they get the harder it will be to raise this wall, because it may crash without the timely construction of the other walls. About building the roof over the national wall there cannot even be any talk. We must get started with the simultaneous work in other countries according to a common plan. This plan must be worked out by the government of the Soviet Union, at any rate, its basic features, as a plan of mighty material and spiritual growth of the peoples of Europe and the whole world.

This is what the slogan of economic collaboration with the Soviet Union means in its developed form, under the present historical circumstances. But such a policy presupposes a radical revision of the theory and practice of the Soviet leadership. The Yaroslavskys are very little fit for such a policy.

Comrade Raymond Spector, an active member of the Communist Party and who has been Chairman of the Control Commission in Section Brownsville, New York spoke before his nucleus on June 17th on the policy of the Comintern in China and endorsed the line of the Left Opposition. His expulsion followed immediately. Such is the freedom of the pre-convention discussion.

A statement of the views of Comrade Raymond Spector, together with that of other Party and Young Communist League members will appear in the next issue of the Militant.

organizer of the revolution for the overthrow of capitalism. The first duty of every Communist is the success of the revolution and so long as the Party has a program based on Marxism there is an unbroken chain between the class, the Party and the success of the revolution. Just as soon as the leading individuals or groups in the Party revise Marxism and Leninism a danger of the elimination of the Party as the leader and organizer of the class is at hand unless we are capable of defeating the revisionists. But if the revisionists are able to dominate, it spells ruin unless the membership liquidates such a leadership.

The Struggle of the Left Opposition

This was the case with the Second International when the revisionists dominated and eliminated it as the leader and organizer of the revolution. We saw the transformation of the Second International from an instrument for liberation to an instrument of suppression of the workers and peasants. The same process is at work in our International. Fortunately, however, for the proletariat we are living in a different historical period; this process is only in the beginning stage in our International; and lastly we have an International Opposition led by L.D. Trotsky that exposes the revision, explains the determining causes of the crisis and mobilizes the forces to win the International for the Marxian-Leninist path again.

We members of the Communist Party ask for an answer to this manifesto and for the readmittance of comrade Trotsky and the Left Opposition into the Party. We do not ask for a religious campaign of "loyalty to the C.I." to take the place of objective consideration of these proposals. If the policies of the leadership is Marxian then there is no conflict between loyalty to the C.I. and loyalty to Marxism but when the present leadership revise Marxism and present theories that are non-Marxian-Leninist the membership must choose between loyalty to that leadership and loyalty to Marxism. We stand or fall by Marxism and Dialectic Materialism and by now life itself has proven the correctness of the Left Opposition group as Marxism fighting revisionism. The readmittance of the Opposition to the International, regardless of how painful it is to some "leaders" is a necessary step to prepare the Party as the leader and organizer of the big class struggles we can expect in the present period in order that pressure of world capitalist economy can be relieved from the U.S.S.R. and the extension of the dictatorship of the proletariat over greater sections of the earth can be accomplished.

Our demands are:

1. The readmittance of the Communist Opposition and the adoption of the Marxian program of the Opposition.
2. Replace the present isolation tactics with Leninist United Front tactics in trade union work and all other activity.
3. Eliminate mechanical control of auxiliary organizations and replace with control through Marxian policy.
4. Reject VERBAL transformation of defensive struggles and demonstrations into revolutionary upheavals.
5. Reject slogan of "Social Fascism" that renders aid to the reformists.
6. Reject "Third Period" chaotic zig-zag course and replace with dialectic analysis and tactics.
7. Correct 7th Convention thesis on above points and other minor points flowing from these root causes.

THE PARTY AND THE UNORGANIZED MASSES

The main reservoir of labor militancy is the masses of unskilled and semi-skilled workers in the unorganized, basic industries. The full horror of the capitalist rationalization falls directly upon them, and the attacks of the capitalists in the present depression and coming crises strike them first and hardest. The Party must turn its face to these unorganized masses, put itself at the head of their struggles and lead the work of organizing them into new industrial unions. This historic task must be accomplished in the fire of struggle against the capitalists and their state power as well as against their agents in the labor movement, the reactionary bureaucracy of the A. F. of L., the Socialist Party and allied groups of social-reformist elements. In this protracted struggle on all fronts, extending over a period of years the decisive break of the workers with the ideology of capitalism will be effected and the genuine class movement of the workers be built.

—FROM THE PLATFORM OF THE COMMUNIST OPPOSITION ADOPTED (CHICAGO) MAY 20, 1929.

In India

The C. I. and Two-Class Parties

The sharpening of the class struggle in India finds the proletariat of that country in the absence of a conscious vanguard, a Communist Party, unable to take the leadership in the rising movement against British Imperialism. The bourgeois and petty bourgeois nationalists are able to get control of the movement, lead it into "safe" channels and ultimately betray it. The attempts of sections of the nationalist movement, i. e., the All-Indian Youth League, the workers and peasants of Peshawar, the railroad workers, the textile workers of Bombay, etc., to break away from this leadership have met with only partial success.

Why is there no Communist Party in India today? This question which confronts every Communist and class-conscious worker must receive a definite answer.

"The Two-Class Party" Policy

The Comintern under the leadership of Stalin and Bucharin (1924-28) basing itself on an incorrect estimation of the degree of stabilization of world capitalism and the relation of class forces, separated the question of bourgeois democratic revolution in the colonial countries from that of the proletarian dictatorship and consequently based its activities in these countries on dual composition class parties. (In China, the bloc of the four classes in the Kuomintang and later the "Left" Kuomintang, in Japan, "the Workers and Peasants Party", in Mexico, "Workers and Peasants' Bloc"—in India, "Workers and Peasants Parties").

Every once in a while one reads a declaration of the "Communist Party of India" or representatives of such a "Party" would appear at Congresses, Plenums, etc. In reality there are only a handful of individual Communists, according to a leading member of the Anti-Imperialist League, about 75 scattered throughout the country, having no central organization and no collective activity. Most of them, under instructions from the E. C. C. I., worked in hand with petty bourgeois elements in building "Workers' and Peasants' parties".

But, a combination of events forced a "change". This was the joint pressure of the Left Opposition led by comrade Trotsky the change in the correlation of class forces in the Soviet Union, the crushing defeat of the Chinese proletariat due in great measure to the criminal subordination of the C.P. of China first to the Kuomintang and later the "Left" Kuomintang, etc. The occasion for this "change" was the Sixth Congress of the Comintern (August-September, 1928).

At this time the Comintern leadership was compelled to admit that it was responsible for the "Workers' and Peasants' parties in India" and officially to repudiate such tactics. Sikandar Sur, the reporter on the Indian question, in his summary, stated:

"The Workers' and Peasants' Parties exist owing to the wrong tactics and instructions of the Comintern. The last report of the Annual conference of the Bengal Peasants' and Workers' parties show that the party is falling into the hands of philanthropic petty bourgeoisie. Our comrades do not hold office there. Comrade Shubin (Soviet Union—J.C.) is absolutely wrong when he talks of the inadvisability of forming a Communist Party on account of objective difficulties. But should we surrender to obstacles or should we overcome them?" (Inprecorr—Vol. 8, No. 78 p. 1473). Even here, we have no real repudiation of dual composition class parties, but such parties in which "our comrades do not hold any offices."

The official colonial theses of the Congress had this to say in reference to the question at hand. "Special 'Workers' and Peasants' Parties' whatever revolutionary character they may possess, can too easily at particular periods, be converted into ordinary petty bourgeois parties, and accordingly, Communists are not recommended to organize such parties." (Inprecorr, Vol. 8, No. 88 — P. 1670). Communists are not recommended, not advised to build workers' and peasants' parties! Since when does the Comintern hand out mere advice and recommendations to Communists? It is obvious that this "literary change" in policy is meant primarily for the record. It also leaves the door open for a repetition of Stalin's sophistry on the Kuomintang. That is the argument that the Communists did not "organize" the party but came into it in order to get to the masses.

It should be also noted that the phrase "at particular periods (can) be converted into ordinary petty bourgeois parties" is an underhanded attempt to excuse the Comintern's policy of building such parties "at particular times".

After the Sixth Congress

Not only was a Communist Party not formed after the Sixth Congress, but the official Comintern press continued to speak of the "Workers' and Peasants' Parties" as a legal expression of the Communists in India. For example, the erstwhile Comintern specialist on India, M.N. Roy, writing on the municipal elections in Bombay stated: "Owing to the doubtful position of the Communist Party (!) and the general antagonism to Communism that characterizes the present bourgeois political atmosphere of the country, the election was contested (by the Communists—J.C.) in the name of the Workers' and Peasants' party"—and later adds "By contesting the election the Communists gave another sign of their political independence (sic!). Most resolute fighters for national freedom, they will defend the interest of the working class not only against foreign imperialism, but also native capitalism. By these tactics of the revolutionary class struggle the Communists will mobilize and lead the proletariat as the driving force of the national revolution". (Inprecorr—Vol. 9, No. 12—March 1st, 1929). What could be plainer? Roy and his political allies, Lovestone and Brandler, demagogically criticize the Stalinists today for not having built a Communist Party in India! These individuals who share the responsibility with the Stalinists and Kuusinsens for the past Kuomintang tactic now call for the building of a Communist Party side by side with a "national revolutionary party". But what will be the role of the Communist Party? The objective logic of their policy means the subordination of the C. P. to the "national revolutionary party", the duplicating of the events of 1925-26-27 in China.

Again, after the Sixth Congress, the hitherto scattered and unconnected Workers' and Peasants' parties, for the first time organized a national party, the "Workers' and Peasants' Party of India". What was the attitude of the Comintern towards this conference?

The "Workers' and Peasants' Party"

Discussing the Conference of the Work-

Flaunt Royal Courts

Helston, Cornwall

Editors, the Militant:—

We know that ghastly destitution prevails in your country as in ours; and that in your city streets, and upon the high roads affluence and misery are often sharply contrasted when the motor car of the millionaire scatters dust or mud on the unemployed worker tramping hopelessly on the search of a job which does not exist. But these contrasts are the result of chance encounters; the rich man is out on his daily business or possibly he is bent on pleasure. In no case does he organize hundreds of his wealthy friends to display themselves in gorgeous attire at a given time, as a provocative and shameful contrast to the wretchedness of thousands of the surrounding population.

But this is the spectacle we can see in London whenever a Royal Court is held and we have had four of them this spring. The women have worn gowns of silk and lace with trains encrusted with jewels, and had ornaments of precious stones. Some have even worn shoes with jewelled heels. And all this perfectly unnecessary display has been made in a wealthy capital city which can show the most appalling depth of poverty among its hosts of slum dwellers.

While the company at the palace at a recent court were partaking of the customary refreshments, served on gold plate, a fleet of motor cars could speedily have conveyed the whole of the guests to houses where (after supping in a very different fashion) adults of both sexes and childers' and Peasants' Party Roy wrote:

"Meeting in this atmosphere of revolutionary development from all sides, the Workers' and Peasants' Party, whose driving forces are the Communists, was objectively the most important event of the moment. The Workers' and Peasants' Party is not the Communist Party (sic!), although the Communists play in it the leading and dominating role. Several years ago it appeared on the scene as the first sign of radicalization of the nationalist masses. As such the Communists supported it and aided its growth. Practically all the great strikes of the last two years were led under the banner of the Workers' and Peasants' Party. The object of the Communists was to make this new party the rallying ground for all the nationalist revolutionary elements, to develop it into a revolutionary mass party which is a crying need of the moment". (Inprecorr, Vol. 9—No. 6—February 1, 1929). The above is a precise summary of the tactics of the Comintern in India for the past few years.

Roy however criticized the Conference for not having made provisions for united front action with the "League for Indian Independence" (the organization of the petty bourgeois intellectuals which Roy wished the Workers' and Peasants' Party, and the Communists to unite with to form his Indian "nationalist mass party").

Immediately Roy was rebuked. The Conference, a Comintern representative wrote, did make provision for united front action with the "League for Indian Independence." Roy is wrong, says the writer, Communists must not try and build "a mass nationalist party", but must build a Communist Party. But how about the Workers' and Peasants' Party? The writer states that confusion exists in the party; although it is showing signs of a "decided improvement"; its confusion is due to its character, in its "composition of two classes, which is bound to result in rendering vague the proletarian line itself." (!) The implications of the writer P. Sch. are clear. The line of the Workers' and Peasants' Party must be a class (!) policy; the Communists must organize themselves in a C.P. but at the same time struggle for a class line in the W. and P. party. (Inprecorr, Vol. 91, No. 16, March 29, 1929.) Nowhere in his article does P. Sch attempt to repudiate Roy's above quoted characterization of the role of the Communists in India. The Comintern, through P. Sch offers the conception of a "Left" Kuomintang as against a "whole" Kuomintang.

In April 1929, that is only a few months after the National Conference of the "Workers' and Peasants' Party of India", the British and Indian governments started a general offensive against strike leaders, revolutionary workers and Communists. Thirty one were arrested for carrying out the orders of the Comintern in India and being in favor of the violent overthrow of the government. The Workers' and Peasants' Party broke down under the offensive. In a few months there was no Party. (Clemens Dutt, Labour Monthly—July 29, 1929) This again compelled the official Comintern press to speak about the necessity of a Communist Party in India.

Safarov's Apologetics for Stalin

In a recent issue of the Communist International (Vol. VII. No. 5, English Edition) G. Safarov, a former Oppositionist with an even more flexible spine than his fellow-capitalists, discusses the situation in India. After condemning Roy's position on India he writes: "Of the same worth are the accusations of another careerist (!), a Max Shachtman, in the Militant, who accuses the Communist International of resisting the formation of a Communist Party in India." (Militant, Feb. 8). Both the Right and the 'Left' renegades ignore the real facts, for the birth of the revolutionary working class in India in 1928-29 is an indisputable fact... That did not and could not take place until the development of the class struggle had aroused the masses, until the slogans of the Comintern had turned into class reality. They could only be embodied in the real life of India thanks to the self-development of the working class, in the process of the revolutionary struggle against imperialism." (P. 48). Safarov undertakes a task never before attempted in the Party press—to explain why no C.P. was built in India.

First, he does not deny the accusation of comrade Shachtman that the Comintern resisted the formation of a C.P. in India. Secondly, who denies the existence of a revolutionary working class in India in 1928-29? Certainly not the Left! Third, if one is to make sense of this quotation one must interpret Safarov as saying: There was no revolutionary working class in India until 1928-29, because the development of the class struggle had not aroused the masses; therefore a Communist Party could not be built. Let us dissolve the Communist Party of the United States because there is no revolutionary working class in this country!

It is the Communist Party which must help intensify the class struggle. Fourth, a C.P. could not be built in India "until the slogans of the Comintern had been turned into class reality" (Page 48). Who was to propagate the slogans of the Comintern? The Workers' and Peasants' Parties, individual Communists? What slogans had to be turned into class reality? The "democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry" or perhaps (and we are not very far from the truth) the realization of a "powerful mass Workers' and Peasants' party"?

The official press once again carries reports of leaflets issued by the Workers' and Peasants' Party without comment of its own. The Stalinist press gives little information as to what the Comintern is actually doing in India today.

The Daily Worker from time to time speaks of the formation in the "near future" of an All-Indian Communist Party. In one of its issues, (Wednesday, May 21, 1930), it carries on its front page photostatic copies of two issues of the "Workers' Weekly". The story underneath it runs: "The first Marxist-Leninist paper published in India, is shown above in the headings of two issues. The 'Workers' Weekly' began publication in Bombay on January 26, and is acting as the ideological leader and organization center for the forces of the working class in the Indian Revolution".

The April 30 issue of Inprecorr available at least one month before the Daily Worker story, carries an article by V. Chattopadhyaya (one of the secretaries of the World Anti-Imperialist League and the latest of the Stalinist writers on India) with the following: "The Workers' Weekly, the new organ of the Workers' and Peasants' Party, points out in its last issue that the movement has gone far beyond Gandhi and the Congress, and calls for a general strike throughout India." (The Revolutionary Situation in India—V. Chattopadhyaya Vol. 10 No. 21).

How are we to explain this? Is the Comintern at present building a "Left" Kuomintang in India or doing nothing at all? What efforts are being made to build a Communist Party? What has happened to the All-Indian Communist Party that was to be formed in the near future? What is this "revolutionary Marxian Workers' Party"? These questions must be answered.

ren in numbers, were seeking such rest as can be found under conditions of overcrowding. In one case, (officially reported about the time of the holding of one of the recent courts) seven people—adults and children were found to be sleeping in one bed!

In no country except England can such senseless and provocative displays as these Royal Courts of ours be found at the present time. That they are still popular among the wealthy English bourgeoisie, (whose female offspring make their social debut at such ceremonies) is proof of the inherent snobbishness of the English character; and also of an incapacity to think seriously and in detail even on a most pressing subject. The present situation in England is this: the fertile soil, which would feed millions under intensive cultivation is held up in the hands of the big landlords. Industrial unemployment is increasing and no political party—Conservative, Liberal or Labor, can find a cure for worklessness, for not one of them is prepared to get rid of the landlords who hold all the basic materials—minerals as well as the surface soil in their grip. Misery is daily increasing among the poor, coupled with a bitter resentment, and before long we may see the wealthier members of society displaying their heels—jewelled or otherwise—in real earnest before the onrush of starving and furious mobs.

But where is the leadership which will give us revolution while preserving us from anarchy? Not in the discredited Communist Party under Stalinist leadership.

One Year of Labor Government

Ramsay MacDonald, the "big shot" of the Second International has been reviewing the accomplishments of one year of labor government in office. His review is significant for what he did not rather than what he did say.

Measured by the expectations it aroused in the minds of its rank and file followers the second "Labor Government" has turned out to be as great and calamitous a failure as ever the Labor Government of 1924 was. Conspicuously it has proven its utter bankruptcy in every basic problem it faced. The failure of the Labor Government is a striking demonstration of the bankruptcy of the policies of social democracy throughout the world.

Take domestic policy as a first instance. Since the MacDonald Government came into office on June 10, 1929 the number of unemployed has actually increased by 600,000, making a grand total of the unemployed army in Britain of 1,739,000 the biggest since 1921-22.

Not a finger has been raised by the MacDonald cabinet to repeal the reactionary anti-trade union bill passed by the Tory government after the general strike.

Take India as another touchstone of socialist practise. In 1924 the "Labor Government" decreed the Bengal Criminal Ordinance to provide for the arrest without trial of all opposing British authority. Hundreds of Indian revolutionaries have been rotting in jail for years under this ordinance. The second Labor Government came into office. Not a finger has been moved to release these prisoners.

MacDonald in India carries on in the best traditions of Bloody Balfour's suppression of Ireland. In Peshawar, in Sholapur, in Bombay, the Indian masses are prodded with British bayonets, shot down, imprisoned. The responsibility falls directly on Ramsay MacDonald and his Labor Government. The responsibility rests on the Second International which is an accomplice in all the crimes of the Labor Government as of the social democracy in Germany.

The New York Nation feels a little embarrassed for its statesman-like contributing editor MacDonald. It seeks for an explanation, and with the superficial aim of liberalism finds it in "the taming effect of office-holding on the radical". This explanation is false down to the ground. The taming effect of office-holding for whom? MacDonald acts as he does because he holds office for the capitalist class. The social democratic policy must breed the MacDonalds because it is class-collaborationist, nationalist, petty bourgeois and anti-revolutionary. A British reformist cannot support an Indian revolution. He can stifle the masses and try to arrange a compromise with the native bourgeoisie.

A comic touch to the tragedy is the truly entertaining argument of the friends of the Labor Government that MacDonald "has not had a chance". He had to take over all these knotty problems of India, Egypt, unemployment, etc. from the Tories. That wasn't fair. MacDonald would be well on the way to introducing socialism—if the capitalists had been gracious enough to introduce it for him. But all they care about is to trip him up and make things harder for him.

Meanwhile to this day Hillquit, the leader of the American socialist party has not breathed a syllable of protest against the misdeeds of his British confrere—and when a resolution was introduced at the convention of the Socialist Party in Pennsylvania to demand the freedom of India from British Imperialism, it was violently attacked by the leaders and finally altered.

New York Open Air Meetings

The New York Branch of the Communist League (Opposition) is holding large and successful street meetings every Saturday night at the corner of 126th St. and 5th Avenue. The workers have been addressed on numerous issues of importance by comrades Maurice Spector, Martin Abern, Albert Giotzer, Max Rose, George Clarke, Charles Curtiss, Russell Blackwell and other members of the Branch. The Branch reports that the interest shown by the workers this year is greatly increased. A good amount of literature, Militants, etc. is regularly sold. The Branch intends to hold an additional meeting a week at another corner. Other members of the Branch assist in the work of organizing the meetings.

Our National Tour Shachtman's Tour Is Extended

The tour of Max Shachtman on behalf of the Communist League of America (Opposition) is meeting with marked success. In Hamilton, Ont., Canada, despite difficulties and few forces, a meeting was held, and a growth of the Opposition is looked for as a result of comrade Shachtman's lectures and report upon the program of the Left Opposition, his visit to L. D. Trotsky at Constantinople, and the preliminary International Conference of the Left Opposition at Berlin. At Detroit a formal meeting was not organized; scattered elements gathered to hear Shachtman.

Chicago, Minneapolis Hold Good Meetings
In Chicago comrade Shachtman spoke for the Communist League before a good crowd at the I.W.W. hall. Unemployment in Chicago is acute and a large number of workers were of course admitted free and listened with keen interest to the report and to the policy of the Left Opposition on a number of current issues. A Workers Guard was at hand to protect the meeting from any disturbance; none occurred. Literature sales were good. The Chicago comrades are pepped up now more than ever.

In Minneapolis, a stronghold of the Communist League (Opposition) a very fine meeting was held from every viewpoint. After the lecture, questions were put by members of the audience, including one member of the S.L.P. and were answered in full by the speaker. The Minneapolis and St.

Paul comrades prepared extensively for the lectures. As we go to press, we do not yet have reports on the meetings in St. Paul, Duluth and Superior.

The tour now takes comrade Shachtman into the West and Southwest—into Kansas City and St. Louis, Mo. and then to Springfield, Illinois, after which the turn is again toward the East, into Cleveland, Pittsburg and Youngstown. The comrades in all these cities are on the job to put over large meetings.

Return Engagements in Montreal and Toronto

The branches of the Communist League (Opposition) in Montreal and Toronto, Canada have asked the National Office to extend Shachtman's tour to include return engagements there. Their request has been complied with, and comrade Shachtman goes to Montreal once more on July 3rd and 4th and to Toronto on July 5th and 6th. Both cities pledge big turnouts.

In Toronto, where the leaders, so-called of the official Communist Party of Canada picketed Shachtman's lecture (evidently the rank and file could not stomach the yellow policy of the officialdom and would not try to prevent the meeting of the Left Opposition), both an excellent meeting and a banquet were held. In Toronto, Shachtman will lecture on another subject which will be announced in the next issue of the Militant.

Capitalist »Disarmament«

Hail to the Kellogg Peace Pact! God bless Disarmament and those noblemen Hoover and MacDonald. The League of Nations has just issued its armament year book for 1929-30 and the upshot of its figures is that in 1928 when the Kellogg Peace Pact became effective there were 50 per cent more cruisers than in 1913 and that there were three times more in process of construction than in 1913.

Italy, which had no cruisers building in 1913, not only led the world in this respect in 1929, but, with 71,000 tons under construction, was building more than the total of 68,300 tons the whole world was building in 1913. Japan stood second in 1929, with 40,000 tons building; the United States third with 30,000 tons; Spain fourth, with 20,000 tons, and France fifth, with 10,000 tons.

Submarines formed 1 per cent of the world fleet tonnage in 1913; 3 per cent when the war ended, and 6 per cent when the Kellogg Treaty went into force.

The world's total naval tonnage, which in 1913 was 6,891,000 tons, stood at 5,312,000 tons in 1929, the difference being due to the sinking of the German fleet and the limitation of battleships in 1922. The figure for 1929, however marked an increase of 21,000 tons over 1928.

There will be disarmament until the workers are strong enough to disarm the capitalists. Military disarmament will follow on the economic expropriation of private property. Capitalism and universal disarmament are contradictions in terms.

U.S. Imperialist Contradictions

Meanwhile, the internal contradictions of American imperialism, bound up with its world economic interdependence, are maturing a severe crisis which is foreshadowed by the current partial industrial depression. The present situation, which is only the harbinger of this coming crisis, has already brought to a high level the process of rationalization and attack upon the standards of the working class that is causing it to move progressively away from its previous inertia into a period of struggles. The realization of the crisis which will intensify the process of rationalization, unemployment, and lead to severer attacks on the living standards of the workers, will result in an even broader basis for the radicalization of the American workers and their entry into struggle. It is a process which must be analyzed not only in comparison with the Leftward movement of the European workers, but chiefly on comparison with the historical backwardness of the American working class. Upon this development is conditioned the coming period of struggles of the American workers and the necessity for the revolutionary Party to understand it and prepare itself properly for it.

Red Army Men Urge Trotsky's Recall

With the deepest indignation we Russian Red Army men who under the leadership of Trotsky created the victorious Red Army and fought in its ranks on numerous fronts to triumph over the counter-revolution, now learn that Stalin threatens our work. For almost six years the Stalinist leadership, having usurped the helm of the Party, has been menacing the achievements of the revolution.

That which millions of proletarians conquered under Lenin and Trotsky and thousands of Red Army fighters secured by their blood, is now endangered by the vacillating policies of the Stalinists, now leaning to social democracy now to anarchism.

We will not permit our work to be destroyed.

We will not believe that Leon Trotsky organizer of the victory of the Russian and therewith the international working class has become untrue to our colors.

But we do see clearly that the Stalin regime which does not hesitate to shoot proletarian revolutionaries is by its policies preparing grave disasters for the U. S. S. R. and the international revolution.

The deportation of Leon Trotsky was a serious and shameful blow at the Soviet Union. The workers of the world will never understand nor approve this measure.

We call upon all who fought shoulder to shoulder with Trotsky in the Red Army to return to their posts of struggle. The former soldiers of the Red Army who are scattered throughout Europe must stand on guard.

Organize that the banner of the Red Army and the Soviet Union of the international revolution is once more raised on high as in the days of Lenin and Trotsky.

Comrades, rally to the ranks of the Left Opposition.

Demand the recall of Leon Trotsky to the Soviet Union, to the Party and the leadership of the Comintern.

Down with the disloyal Stalinists!

Long live the Left proletarian wing of Lenin!

Long live the world revolution!

Jobless Millions Must Organize! Demand Immediate Relief!

The National Unemployment Convention is to meet July 4th and 5th in Chicago. If it is animated by a sense of responsible and militant leadership and effective policies of class struggle—if it is not satisfied with noise but embarks on serious organization and action, this convention can become a protest centre for the mobilization of the millions of unemployed.

The danger is that under the present Party leadership with its erratic hand-to-mouth political practises the convention will develop into nothing more than just another formless mass meeting. It is common knowledge that not a stroke of real organization work has been done to crystallize the unemployed movement since the March 6th demonstrations.

No Signs of Ease-Up in Crisis

There are no signs of any alleviation in the economic crisis taking its toll of misery in every city, town and hamlet in the country. The bank discount rate has been sunk to two and a half per cent, the lowest since the war but the successive stock market crashes are assuming the character of a panic. Wheat is selling at a dollar. Automobile production has again registered a decline. Steel production is at 65 per cent capacity. The Commodity price level dropped 4.2 per cent in two weeks. The New York Census figures point to 400,000 unemployed in New York alone. The Annalist Index of Employment is the lowest since 1922.

The Industrial Reserve Army

The cyclical crisis has come to add its misery but it must be remembered that it only augments an already standing industrial reserve army—the victims of the technical advance of civilization under the rule of the anarchic capitalist mode of production. Every new machine, every business consolidation, every stop-watch economy for the speed-up, has resulted in fewer jobs. Between 1920 and 1927, the economist Mitchell estimates the number added to the ranks of the unemployment reserve army at no less than 650,000. This is the balance sheet of American "prosperity". The power that is the greatest creditor state in the world, of the most millionaires of the most abundant resources, the finest machinery, the most productive labor force is the tragic scene of soup-kitchens, flophouses, corporation charity, park benches and starvation for the working class. In an age when science begins to probe secrets of atomic energy, vast masses of producers must form up in bread-lines.

The General Crisis of Capitalism

What is the answer of the capitalist government to the unemployed? The Hoover brand of mental healing. A Hawley-Smoot Tariff to increase the cost of the necessities of life and assure the Trusts the monopoly of the market. Even the miserable Wagner Bill for the establishment of official instead of private employment bureaux is out of court. At the Senate investigation into Communist "plotting", even Wm. Green pleads with his capitalist masters "that he will not guarantee to be able to keep the A.F. of L. rank and file in submission unless some small reforms are forthcoming."

The workers must be clear that even were the exploiters willing to grant them without struggle no mere palliatives or reforms could lead out of the blind alley of the antagonisms and contradictions of capitalist imperialism. Partial demands can only serve the working class if they are the starting point for revolutionary class struggle. The only decisive solution of the general crisis of capitalism is in the interests of the millions of toilers lies in the international emulaton of the Russian workers. Only the revolutionary workers' state can release the forces of production from the exploiting vises of capital, put an end to industrial enslavement, eliminate the root causes of war and unify world economy.

The Socialist Five Year Plan

The Five Year Plan in the Soviet Union demonstrates the tremendous possibilities of planned economy. Despite capitalist economic encirclement, and the threat of intervention, the achievements of the U.S.S.R. stand out in splendid contrast to the intolerable situation in the capitalist world. The undeniable difficulties in the U.S.S.R. and the Five Year Plan are those of isolation, the retardation of the international revolution. The Five Year Plan provides for a total capital investment of 93 billions for electrification and industrial development. It is in the most vital interests of the international unemployed and especially of the American to demand large scale credits for the Soviet Union. There are always millions of dollars available for war expenditures. There are millions for the Young Plan loans. Demand credits be given that would at once result in the employment of American workers, and their participation in the realization of the socialist Five Year Plan.

Organize for Action!

The Chicago Unemployment Convention must appeal to the unemployed army with demands that will strike immediate and effective response in the hearts of the workers mobilizing them for the class struggle against the capitalist state.

Demand recognition and credits to the Soviet Union.

Demand the enactment of social insurance unemployment insurance and old age pensions to compel the capitalists to bear the charges for the break-down of the system. Demand the six hour day and five day week.

Demand the freedom of class war prisoners, the release of Mooney and Billings, of the leaders of the New York unemployed demonstrations, the prisoners in Georgia, class war victims under sentence in Gastonia.

Organize a united front of the unemployed and employed.

The power of the imperial plutocracy of America is great. But there is a power greater than theirs and that is the power of proletarian numbers. Mobilize and Organize!

N.Y. Party-Y.C.L. Group For Opposition

TO THE SEVENTH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE SIXTH NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE YOUNG COMMUNIST LEAGUE.

Dear Comrades

We, the undersigned Communists declare our solidarity with the Left Opposition. We announce our agreement with the views of the Left wing faction of the American Communist Party—the Communist League of America (Opposition). After a thorough examination of the Party and Young Communist League situation and the three viewpoints that exist in the Communist movement today, we have come to the conclusion that the only Marxian and Leninist view is the one maintained by the Left Opposition. This correct view of the national and international situation we are prepared to defend.

We declare our complete agreement with the Manifesto of the National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) addressed to the 7th National Convention of the Party, ("Back to Lenin"—The Militant, June 14, 1930). In our opinion the line laid down in this manifesto provides the only solution to the present Party crisis. This line must become the line of the Party. We further express our accord with the Platform adopted by the Left Opposition at its National Conference at Chicago, May 20, 1929, and which the course of events in the United States has fully confirmed.

To many of the comrades who know us and who have worked together with us in the Party and the Y.C.L. our stand will come as a sudden surprise. Of course there will be numerous bureaucrats and small-minded people who will now suddenly dis-

Demonstrate for the Indian Revolution!

The New York District of the Communist Party has issued a call to all workers' organization to join in a demonstration of solidarity with the Indian Revolution for Saturday, June 28 at 2:30 p.m. in front of the British consulate in Whitehall Street.

The New York Branch of the Communist League (Opposition) will itself participate in this demonstration and urges all class conscious workers to do likewise. Demonstrate for the complete independence of India from British Imperialism! For the alliance of the workers and peasants of India under the leadership of the industrial proletariat against the treacherous policies of Gandhi and the Indian bourgeoisie! Demonstrate against the Imperialist MacDonald Labor Government and the Second International! For the emancipation of the Philippines from American Imperialism!

Bureaucrats Rule C.P. Convention

The seventh annual convention of the Communist Party of the U.S.A. is now in session. The opening was at Madison Square Garden, Friday June 20.

The calibre of the discussion at the convention has so far been on the same mediocre level as the so-called "pre-convention discussion" in the Daily Worker. No one dares, nor is competent to raise fundamental questions of principles and policy. The apparatus-bureaucrats watch each other closely for every "deviation". Every slip of a fellow-bureaucrat means an opening to "work oneself up" one notch higher in a career.

We have already indicated in our manifesto to the Party membership the terrific gap that exists between the possibilities for the revolutionary movement in America and the paralytic ineffectiveness of the C.P. under the "third period" leadership of the Centrists. There is much that can be added by way of concrete illustration, and we propose to estimate the complete results of the convention on its conclusion.

Meanwhile rumblings are heard of the latest late turn of Stalin in the discussions on the economic crisis and the "third period". Bedacht has at last begun to talk of the present economic crisis as a "cyclical crisis in the period of the general decline of capitalism" and not as the immediate acute revolutionary crisis of Stalin-Molotov's imagination. A certain "Merker" tendency has consequently been virtuously repelled by the Browder-Bedacht "Old Guard". Such a "leader" as Sam Don accused them of entertaining "exceptionalism" because they did not emphasize the acute revolutionary crisis sufficiently. Don was ridiculed out of court and told to go back to the Party school.

The Canadian Party representative—a little adventurer named S. Smith who received the letters patent to the leadership of the Canadian Party with his sheepskin diploma from the "Lenin School", also accused Browder and Company of opportunism—for their too conservative estimate of the "third period"—and was duly castigated.

But this slight advance towards political sanity by Bedacht and Company is still a mere drop in the bucket of their swollen theorizings about "social fascism" etc.—those "tenth plenum" analyses that so thoroughly stupefied the political influence of the Communist Parties.

What in brief is the balance sheet of stalinism at the present convention? In the leadership of the Party—a bureaucracy clinging to office by the most desperate acts of servility to the higher-ups in the Comintern hierarchy—at the bottom an apathetic and terrorized membership—an

Stalinist Officials Sabotage Communist Unity

TORONTO—

The Canadian Federal election conference organized by the Communist Party should be a striking proof to the members of the Party and Y.C.L. and Left wing workers in what a dangerous impasse the Stalinist bureaucrats have brought the revolutionary movement. I have attended what I thought were raw conferences but nothing like the one pulled off by the Party leadership recently.

Officialdom Bars Opposition Communists

At the conference were present many C.P. members but very few from other organizations. Outside of the Industrial Union representing a handful of workers, no other unions were represented. The conference was typified by the Stalinist brand of the united front from below, the steam roller edict from the chair of no discussion and criticism, correction or question, long-winded speeches from the Party functionaries, and no discussion from the floor except that initiated by the Communist League of America (Opposition) members.

The narrow bureaucratic spirit that ruled the meeting was strikingly expressed in the manner in which the C.L. of A. representatives were barred from the conference. "The credential committee decides not to accept the representatives of the organization calling itself the Communist League of America (Opposition) on the grounds that they disagree with the principles and policies of the C.P." The chairman, "You have all heard the decision of the credential committee, I want no discussion—all those in favor." But there was discussion. Comrade Quarter, representative of his Industrial Union local stood up and fought the ruling till he was shut up. The Party officialdom did have to discuss and try hard and unsuccessfully to explain.

In his statement, comrade Quarter protested against the steamroller tactics for the suppression of discussion. He pointed out that in the conference call nothing had been said about the necessity of one hundred per cent agreement with the Party program in order to be allowed to send delegates. Moreover "Socialist" parties and other organizations that the Communists fight tooth and nail were admitted while the Communist League were barred. The Communist League agreed with the Party election program and would support it actively and financially. Our comrades would speak at the election meetings, etc. The members of the Communist League (Opposition) were nearly all workers from the shop and factory. They had been the most active members in the Party and Y.C.L. before their expulsion for fighting bureaucracy and opportunism.

The Opposition (Left) is fighting for its re-instatement in the Party and Youth League on the basis of the right to maintain their Communist principles. These airtight bureaucratically manipulated conferences doomed them to impotence in advance.

But the Poale Zionists are Seated

The conference had hardly settled down to its lifeless when a crisis loomed up again with the arrival of delegates of the Jewish National Workers Left Poale Zion Organization, who had been invited by the Party. The situation was the result of their own bureaucratic blindness. A hurried caucus and the credential committee had again to go out to try and figure out some explanation. They came back with the recommendation that the Poale Zion were renegades, but they could remain in the Conference if they accepted the Party Program. This brought the Zionist delegates to their feet, "they had been invited to support the Communist Party candidates not the C.P. program. Didn't the C.P. know they were a political organization as well as they, and what was more they didn't agree with the C.P. program or tactics." The superdramatic Annie Buller, now stood up to implore the Zionist delegates that it was in the best interests of the labor movement for them to remain renegades. They were allowed to remain in spite of their categorical refusal to accept the Party program, 6th World Congress, etc.

Opposition Slogan For Soviet Credits... Rejected

The delegates who now, that they had accepted the third period and the Sixth World Congress, were asked to raise their hands for the election program, that the Party functionary had just finished reading. The chairman remarking to a question of our representatives that all discussion and criticism was out of order and if there were any present that didn't agree, they knew what to do. Our representative as before took the floor anyway and asked the conference to discuss the following to be embodied in the election program. "That long term credits be given to the Soviet Union to help temporarily to relieve the growing unemployment and at the same time, assist the Russian workers in the socialist construction". At first the chairman tried to remain deaf and dumb to the proposal but when Harry Clairman, insisted on asking ing the chair if they were against the proposal the storm again broke loose.

To sum up. The conference should be a powerful lesson to the Party, Y.C.L. and Left wing workers as to why the Party is so badly disorganized and continues to lose ground from day to day. The bureaucratic regime will continue to destroy the Party ideologically and organizationally as long as the members are satisfied to remain a Party not of militant Communists but of hand raisers.

For the Communist League of America (Opposition) it marks another step forward in the fight for the regeneration of the Party and against the bureaucracy. Our member brought down a half dozen copies of the Militant. They were grabbed up in less than one minute. Our representative was also elected on the executive of 20 together with some 19 other Party members.

Since the last reports on the National Tour of comrade Max Shachtman for the Communist League of America (Opposition), successful meetings have been held in St. Paul and Duluth, Minnesota, Superior, Wisconsin, Kansas City and St. Louis, Mo. Despite the terrific mid-summer heat, there has been an excellent attendance and the keenest interest displayed in comrade Shachtman's survey of the world situation and the role of the Left Opposition, the important visit of Shachtman, representing the Communist League, to L.D. Trotsky at Constantinople, the unification conference of the German Left Opposition at Berlin, and the preliminary Conference of the International Left Opposition in Paris.

Good Results in Duluth

At Duluth, Minn. seventy persons assembled among whom were a number of Finnish Party members, who heckled Shachtman feebly at the beginning, but who were soon silenced by the barrage of facts about the true situation in the Comintern. Discussion ensued, in which one Sankari, a Finnish youth with aspirations to be a Stalinist commissar for the Finnish section, spoke for half an hour. His own supporters finally stopped him after which the speaker, Shachtman, answered questions and made his concluding remarks. This is the first time an Opposition mass meeting has been held in Duluth and the meeting was a moral success.

Superior, Wisconsin

At Superior, Wisconsin, 50 workers turned up at the meeting. Many questions were put to the speaker, including questions on the position of the Left Opposition on the situation in the Cooperatives, to which Shachtman replied in full. Our position in this respect has been outlined in the columns of the Militant. The youthful elements, young comrades in the Y.C.L. have the soundest attitude on the basic issues before the Communist movement, and there are prospects for Opposition growth among them. A number of the audience voiced pleasure at the report of comrade Shachtman.

Leading Party members present at Shachtman's lecture in St. Paul, Minn. were literally begged to state their views after Shachtman's speech. After much goading, one of them announced an unemployment meeting and another mumbled some remarks about the 500 (!) members of the National Miners Union in the Minnesota district. Thirty attended the meeting.

The attendance at the Chicago and Minneapolis meetings, commented on briefly in the last issue of the Militant were 125 and 100 respectively. There was much satisfaction in all respects with the results.

Kansas City and St. Louis

Despite equatorial heat (the temperature had climbed to 100 degrees) there were turnouts of 50 and 40 at the meetings in Kansas City and St. Louis. There were a number of free admissions, as elsewhere, due to unemployment. The meetings of the C.P. are not as well attended, since the advent of the Third Period.

A supporter of the Communist Party in Kansas City, one Sol Morris, developed the logic of the Third Period. He declared in the discussion period apropos of Norway's refusal of a visa to comrade Trotsky that "against the Trotskyites, the Communists (!) should unite with the Monarchists!" Morris was properly "plastered" by the speaker after these remarks and the audience applauded Shachtman vigorously.

At Kansas City a banquet was also held.

In St. Louis, Jenkins of the Steamfitters Union also spoke on behalf of the Molders' Mooney Committee, and the meeting adopted a resolution for the release of Mooney Billings, the framed New York Communists, Foster, Minor, Amter, Raymond and the Georgia defendants now on trial for their lives.

At all of the meetings, a good deal of literature has been sold, new contacts and members secured and the enthusiasm engendered in the Communist League, gives high hope for increased activity in all fields by the Left Opposition. Comrade Shachtman also is reporting to the Branches of the League and taking up special and concrete matters with them.

Forthcoming Meetings

As we go to press meetings are scheduled for Springfield, Ill., where comrade Joe Angelo is making preparations for a big turnout; at Cleveland and Youngstown, Ohio and at Pittsburgh, Pa. The local comrades, Jos. Keller, L. Bryar, Denis Plarinos, James Sifakis and others are working hard for successful meets which will be reported on in the next issue of the Militant. It was decided after consultation between the local comrades and the national office to postpone return engagements of comrade Shachtman to Toronto and Montreal, Canada, till cooler weather. Simon Report Declares War on Revolution

The second volume of the Simon Report is now available for analysis and it bears out the most cynical expectation of the supporters of the Indian revolution. It is nothing more or less than a direct declaration of war to the bitter end for the throttling of the Indian revolution. It does not even contain the recommendation of "Home Rule". Divide and Rule! India is to be still further cut up by the separation of Burma so that the British can have a base of operations against the Indian revolutionary movement.

The other eight provinces will have "self-governing" institutions and will "send" representatives to a "Federal Assembly". Even to the capitalist press (the New York Times, June 24) anxious to sugar coat it the purport of the Report "is to give Britain a stronger hold on India than ever... The British Governors in the provinces will be virtual autocrats with sweeping powers to override the Indian Ministers... the governors can call the British troops in any emergency... and the British army will continue for many years under the control... of the Imperial Government."

The Simon Commission is composed of labor, liberal and conservative representatives of the groups in the British House. The Simon Commission functioned under the direct responsibility of Ramsay MacDonald's Labor Government. Whatever a few more radical rank and filers in the American socialist party may think, the report of the Simon Commission is the type of "self-determination" granted to the oppressed nationalities by the Governments and parties of the Second International.

What will the Simon Commission's report actually solve? What does it change? The driving forces of the Indian revolution have not been wiped out by its flood of words. The Commission says "as you were." British Imperialism and its bayonets, its exploitation of the Indian workers will remain. We will not release India by any constitutional surrender, says the Commission. All your "nationalist movement" your "civil disobedience", "your salt tax violations" mean little to us. We understand one language—that is the language of power—the language of war and revolution.

The Indian revolution enters on a stage that is clearly defined. The vacillations, the mysticism, the pacifism with which Gandhi has weakened and betrayed the revolutionary ferment in the past can no longer so successfully confuse the issues. The issue is more sharply defined. It is surrender to British Imperialism—which acceptance of the Commission's report means—or revolutionary mass action of the peasants and the petty bourgeoisie under the leadership of the industrial proletariat.

The opportunities for a Communist Party and a revolutionary policy in India today are inspiring. Will, can the present Comintern regime utilize the situation for the international revolution?

In the next issue of the Militant there will appear a thorough analysis of the whole situation in which the Indian revolution now finds itself.

Operators Prey Upon Passivity of the Coal Miners

By ARNE SWABECK

Reverberations from the soft coal miners' revolt against the ruinous rule of the John L. Lewis machine in the United Mine Workers have come back as a resounding echo from the anthracite. So far, however, it has been only as disorganized expression of universal rank and file discontent; given voice at the recent tri-disaster gains from being made and facilitated position of "progressive" elements, but resulting in some serious defeats for Lewis. The practically complete absence of an organized conscious Left wing prevented further pains from being made and facilitated the obscuring of some of the most burning issues.

With deep-seated general discontent in the anthracite the sentiment at the convention testifies eloquently to the pressure of the membership for a clean-cut fighting policy. No doubt, there is a rich field and a great need for Left wing direction has been frittered away through a series of senseless mistakes everywhere in the mine fields. This is a condition for which the official Communist Party leadership is mainly responsible and has resulted in the almost complete isolation of the Left wing.

Lewis suffered defeat first in his endeavors to avoid holding the convention and when it took place despite his desires as a result of insistent demands of the local unions. Lewis suffered a defeat 5 to 1 on his main proposition to authorize his handpicked scale committee to negotiate the "best possible contract". But the disorganized opposition, led by "progressives", did not succeed, or did not care, to get favorable action on the needs of wage increases, shorter workday, unemployment relief and a determined fight against the contracting system.

New Union Grows Under "Friendly" Auspices of Operators

Meanwhile the move started by Illinois local miners unions to reinstate members previously expelled for opposition to the corrupt bureaucracy—both the John L. Lewis and the Howatt-Fishwick union are endeavoring to turn to their account. Both sides can well afford to use this method of catering to the Left wing in its present disorganized state with no intention displayed as yet to seriously contest with them for influence over the rank and file membership. The Howatt-Fishwick union, thanks to its objective position of an insurgent movement without as yet having had to face a test of struggle with the operators, is able to claim considerable gains. For example, during the first two months of its existence, the new union claims 21 new locals organized in Oklahoma, Arkansas and Texas, three locals in Indiana, one in Iowa and ten in Ohio. The total membership, dues paying and exempt, for the period, it claims to be 51,618.

From its inception the new union has "enjoyed" the most friendly attitude from the Illinois operators headed by the large Peabody Co. It was decidedly evidenced in the Springfield court decision barring Lewis from interfering in Illinois fields. The Black Diamond, organ of the Illinois operators, gave favorable publicity to the Springfield convention, commenting on the selection of John H. Walker for secretary that: "During the years he has been associated with the labor movement of Illinois, Walker has gained the confidence of leaders in all branches of business and industry". This friendly attitude is already being translated into "harmonious collaboration" on the job in carrying out the notorious Fishwick contract to the advantage of the operators. The friendly attitude is surely to be appreciated by Fishwick, possibly also by Howatt, the coal miners, however, should have no difficulty in remembering that only the contracts had any value, which were gained by militant struggle and maintained by organized power in face of the hostility of the bosses.

Undoubtedly the Howatt-Fishwick union has prospects of growth, at least for a time. The fact that it came about as a result of a revolt against the Lewis machine, a revolt which for the moment stirred many miners into action and now compels it to move on for organization; the fact that due to Howatt's past militant reputation it can generate some hopes by its apparently progressive front, coupled with the important fact that conditions in the unorganized fields in particular have forced the miners practically below the subsistence level, eager for organization, these will all count in its favor. But it will be the kind of temporary gains caused by workers grasping for a last straw in a desperate situation. It cannot count on lasting rank and file support or become a factor contributing to the organization of a real union embracing all the miners, without policies of militant struggle and without a leadership free from past corruptions and ready to stand solid as a rock for these policies. This, however, cannot be expected under the benevolent tutelage of the coal operators.

Will the Two Unions Unite?

What are the points of division between the two unions, both claiming the title of United Mine Workers? First and foremost one must judge by the rank and file membership. And there can be no denying the fact that the Howatt-Fishwick union is here as a result of the long standing deep-seated revolt against the Lewis rule of corruption, betrayal and destruction. Had the Left wing, under direction of the official Communist Party, not completely forfeited its mass leadership by a series of fatal blunders, this revolt, now temporarily retarded, could have been continued in its once adopted direction—definitely toward the Left. It could thus have become decisive for the course in the anthracite as well.

As far as the two union leaderships are concerned it has quite clearly been a contest for spoils coming with official positions from which their conflict grew and swung in one section, the Fishwick group, over to the side of endeavoring to take advantage of the mass revolt. Is there any point of division of policies in its decisive aspect, that is, in attitude towards the operators? The records of both the Lewis and Fishwick groups are already well known. They have been identically treasonable to the rank and file and there have been no statements or proclamations showing any departure from or any difference on this score. There have, however, been statements for unity of the two unions. A unity which could be accomplished only on the basis of division of spoils of position by both cliques and to the further loss of the rank and file. For the coal miners it can at least be certain that there would be no future union progress that way.

Where is Howatt Going?

It should always be borne in mind that the bulk of leadership of the new union is furnished by the Fishwick group which throughout its history has been part and parcel of all the crimes of the sell-out breaking down of working standards and union destruction carried on by the Lewis machine. The background of Howatt, and a few with him, is quite a different one. But judging by the present position there could be but scant hopes for the future to show a revival of their past. Their present route of travel is decisive and when concerning a union leader it becomes one for the rank and file to take serious note of.

The fight made by Howatt against the Kansas Industrial Court law is one of the few bright pages of American labor history. His fight during a number of years, up until his expulsion from the old union, against the Lewis corruption and betrayals added favorable weight to his record. His struggle for reinstatement into the union was a correct tactical position; but with that reinstatement the turn to the right began. He failed to renew his fight and to give any support whatever to the revolt which became particularly widespread during the period of defeat of the Pennsylvania-Ohio strike and found its expression in the "Save the Union Movement". He failed to support its further development in the organization of the National Miners Union. Regardless of the mistakes in development and weaknesses inherent in the N.M.U. from its inception, true progressives could not fail to support it. Howatt instead later chose to join with the corrupt Fishwick group.

At the convention forming the new union at Springfield Illinois, Howatt failed to fight against the seating of Farrington who so completely personified the agent of the coal operators in the union ranks. Honest delegates from the ranks had come there determined to fight and root out all vestiges of the Lewis wrecking machine, embodied as fully in the Fishwick group. They found in their former ally Howatt, now an opponent. Referring to them Howatt made the outrageous charge that, "a few delegates to the convention have been bought out by Lewis". The adoption of constitutional clauses barring Communists from membership and classifying them with the reactionary Civic Federation and Ku Klux Klan met no opposition from Howatt, instead he joined in red-bating. Yet the most decisive is the attitude towards the increased exploitation by the operators. And here the friendly "co-operation" can lead to no other career than the one so "successfully" pursued by Lewis.

Preying Upon Miners' Momentary Passivity

The squabble on the appeal against the injunction, now begun in the operator controlled court at Springfield, is expected to last until late in the fall. This has become one means of holding the general membership resentment against both the cliques in abeyance and retarding its development. But enormous bills, no matter whom the operators favor in this tilt, will be due for payment by this membership and perhaps help blow the lid off again.

Throughout the fields the coal miners are suffering under the crushing weight of unemployment constantly increasing by the advancing machine loading and mechanical mining. The major soft coal fields in Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky and other places are entirely without a union and with all gains of the past wiped out. Many bitter disappointments have been experienced. A certain degree of exhaustion in addition to the general more important effects of the economic crisis has engendered in the miners a state of momentary passivity though isolated spontaneous strikes have taken place.

Yet the problem in the mine field remains the building of a union which will embrace all coal miners and adopt the policy of militant struggle. What does the official Communist Party policy contribute to a solution of this problem? A big insurgent movement has just taken place growing out of discontent with the reactionary policies of the old officialdom. It was the first insurgency in the A. F. of L. for a long time taking place in a basic industry and important union with a generally favorable basis for the Left. Yet it did not lend strength to the Left wing at all. On the contrary, the main benefits went to social reformism. The N.M.U. is practically extinct. Its convention first scheduled for April first, then postponed to June 1, has now again seemingly been postponed to June 28th—or will there be none? What becomes of responsibility to the working class and to the miners in particular who did follow the Left wing?

The meaningless hurling of extravagant phrases of fascism and "social fascism", coming from the top, can be no substitute for correct policies and only confuses the situation, to put it mildly. Down among the ranks the small scattered Left wing groups, still existing, become footballs for either of the two old cliques. A continuation of this inevitably brings further isolation by members of these groups becoming compelled, in order to get a job, to rejoin either of the two unions having control without any policy of carrying on Left wing and progressive activities within.

Two main reasons for this isolation are easily discernible. Progressive elements who in the past became allies of the Left wing movement and should have been properly utilized as bridges to the masses were instead, during the period of right opportunist policies of the Party elevated to leadership. Hence they are now still able to maintain a commanding position while travelling definitely toward the Right. Secondly, the failure of the N.M.U., not caused by unfavorable objective conditions but by repeated mistakes of policy during the Communist Party's present course of opportunist adventurism.

From the Daily Worker (6-13-1930), in an article commenting upon the anthracite convention we notice somewhat of a turn at least toward a half recognition of the necessity of the Left wing working within the existing unions. This, partial though it is, is to be welcomed. But how can such turns become effective and clear to the workers without an explanation of the mistakes of the opposite direction, as for example, calling upon the progressive miners to stay away from the Springfield convention of revolt against Lewis. Precisely at that place was where all Left wing and progressives should have been to continue the fight against the reactionaries of all shades.

Left Wing Must Return to Fundamental Task

The problem of building a new union, we repeat still remains. And while a certain amount of passivity amongst the miners is prevalent, while they have been put on the defensive, opportunities are available. Perhaps nowhere better than in the unorganized fields for extension of organization and Left wing ideology, for building a union with militant policies. The additional fact that masses were set into motion through the recent revolt, as well as the course this motion has followed, must be properly evaluated. If it proves anything, above all it proves the necessity of the Left wing again adopting its fundamental task, that is, as the means of building one union, take up the indispensable work of organizing and extending its influence for a fighting program within the existing unions. In such fields as Illinois, Kansas and the anthracite there should be no doubt that the proper course is to organize the Left wing within the two unions having control to build the united front from below for the demands of the Left which correspond to the needs of the miners and thus to compel a united struggle with the N.M.U. where it functions.

To this end reinstatement of formerly expelled union opposition members must be taken up as a definite policy. A policy which guarantees the continuation and organization of the fight.

The field is ripe for such tactics. The rank and file will soon learn through experience to correctly estimate the position of the "progressives" now progressing toward the Right and one of the big tasks of the Left wing is to build and broaden the union with the masses, take advantage of the conflicts between the reactionary and opportunist leaders in a manner more effectively to expose them and win the influence of the masses for its program.

«Revolutionary Age» Barred from Mails

The denial of the mails by the Federal Government to the Revolutionary Age, organ of the Right wing (Lovestone-Gitlow) group in the Communist movement on the ground of "seditious" and "indecent" contents is an act which the entire working class movement must protest. At the same time they must emphatically demand the restoration of second class mailing privileges for the Revolutionary Age.

This high-handed act of the Post Office Department is a revival of the ugly Burleson-Wilson war days, and, if allowed to stand, is a lever to smash the press and organizations of the workers at the incitation of the government. Not for years has such an attempt been made. The U.S. Government has devised a pretext for the suppression of this organ. It can find like excuses for action against the Militant Daily Worker and other of the working class and revolutionary press.

The workers under capitalism have every reason and need to fight to maintain and extend so-called civil rights—free press, free speech and assemblage—the right for the workers to organize, etc. These are fundamental needs of agitation, propaganda and organization and can only be maintained through constant vigilance and struggle by the workers against the employers and capitalist government. A blow against one is a blow against all. It is in this light that the government's attack on the Revolutionary Age must be understood.

The Communist movement in the United States is unfortunately at the present time engaged in such a deep-going internal struggle that the Government conceives it can attack it with greater impunity. The three currents in the Communist Party are each represented by a separate organ. Up to now the Daily Worker, the organ of the Centrist Stalin faction which speaks officially for the Party, has maintained the silence of the deep on the victimization of the Revolutionary Age. To adopt an attitude of such unscrupulous factionalism (incidentally characteristic of the Daily Worker for a considerable time) is anything but revolutionary. It is unprincipled. Every worker must protest against the attack on the press of the workers, whatever faction in the Party they belong to.

A SQUEAK IN THE APPARATUS (A POPULAR EXPLANATION) OF RIGHTS AND LEFTS

By L. D. TROTSKY

(This is the concluding instalment of comrade Trotsky's popular exposition of the differences between Lefts and Rights in the questions of Soviet economy and the associated international problems. The Right wing "theoretician" of the Revolutionary Age surpassing himself in profundity lately attempted to prove that "Trotskyism" has made a "right" turn in denial of its past! It is nothing new for the Right revisionists to set up a straw man and proceed to knock him down—amid their own applause.)

The dishonesty of the Right wing group in matters of Marxist theory is in complete accord with the unscrupulous falsification of Trotsky's position on the "rationing" of Europe which Lovestone peddled in the Comintern some years ago and from which he never disassociated himself even after he had been convicted by Trotsky of a literary forgery.—Editors.)

From the Left or From the Right

As was not difficult to foresee, Yaroslavsky now "testifies" that the Left Opposition has gone to the Right. When we came out against the 4 per cent rate of industrial development and for 20 per cent—we were "ultra-Lefts". When we gave warning not to leap over to 30 per cent deteriorating the quality of production and overstraining the working force, we are "rights".

When as against the Thermidorian policy of reliance on the mighty middle peasant we demanded the policy of collectivization—that was denounced as "ultra-Leftism." When in the form of anti-religious propaganda, we came out against the myth of the faultless beginning of socialism, we are... "rights".

Ever since Molotov's feet became the measure of all things questions are decided with great simplicity.

All the Mensheviks, cackles Yaroslavsky, came out against the present tempos of industrialization and collectivization. It is therefore clear that the Opposition shares the Menshevik point of view. Yaroslavsky is out to scare somebody. Is it us? No, he is aiming to intimidate his own people—because he hears a squeak in the apparatus.

Menshevism is for the return of the U.S.S.R. to capitalism which must for Menshevik satisfaction be crowned by a bourgeois democracy. By the way, the Mensheviks supported the Stalinist industrialization program of yesterday against the Opposition platform, seeing in the former the elements of economic "realism" and denouncing the latter "romantic". This is the historic fact. It is self-evident that the Mensheviks are now too, for a lowering of the tempos of industrialization. Does this mean that from the Marxian viewpoint the tempos of industrialization have no limits in general?

It is remarkable that in the same article, Yaroslavsky refers with great satisfaction to the old socialist revolutionary, Minor, who spoke sympathetically of the collectivization in the U.S.S.R. at a certain Paris meeting. From the personal standpoint Minor's declaration undoubtedly does him honor, because it shows that he has a socialist conscience, that he is trying to understand what is actually happening, without the malicious pre-conceptions of an offended petty bourgeois. But from political viewpoint, it must not be forgotten for a moment that Minor is one of the oldest Populists (Narodniki) who by his whole past is the most insulated against Marxian ideas. How many spears did the Marxists not break in their struggle against the populist utopians in regard to the construction of a socialism based on the peasant's primitive plow and commune? Agrarian socialism bore an adventurist stamp with the Left wing "social revolutionaries" and a bureaucratic character with their Right. In the Stalinist policy the elements of adventurism and bureaucracy unite. It is no wonder that Minor found in the new Stalinism some of the elements of his own old past.

One of the possible definitions of Bolshevism is that it gave in practice the most remarkable synthesis of reform and revolution. At first the social democracy was for reform against the revolution; now it is even against reform out of fear of revolution. Social democracy is always against revolution. Does this mean that every denial of a revolutionary situation in a given moment is Menshevism?

The Mensheviks were opposed to the October revolution, together with Zinoviev, Kamenev, Rykov, Millyutino and others. The Mensheviks were opposed to the revolutionary offensive in Germany in 1923 (together with Stalin). The Mensheviks were opposed to a break with the Kuomintang and the building of Soviets in China in 1925-27 openly supporting Stalin against our views. Our demand to declare war on the General Council of the Trade Unions in the British coal struggle of 1926, the Mensheviks together with Stalin considered an "adventure".

On the other hand the Mensheviks were against the insurrection in Estonia in 1924, against the terrorist adventure in Bulgaria, against the Canton uprising in 1927. Does this mean that we must support adventurist uprisings or organize them?

In our work on the "Third Period" we demonstrated by means of facts and figures the criminal light-mindedness of Molotov and company in declaring France to be on the threshold of revolution. The reformists and capitalists may attempt to grasp at our figures for consolation. Does this mean that we should ignore facts and figures? That we should blow out the lantern? Roam about in the dark?

From this brief and incomplete review we see that at all critical moments for the past thirteen years, the Mensheviks together with the epigones denied the revolutionary situation whenever it was at hand. In all these instances they were opposed to us. On the other hand their judgement episodically and purely formally, happened to "coincide" with ours, when the Mensheviks condemned an insurrection as such, while we denied the presence of conditions for a successful insurrection. The same is now happening in the question of the tempo of industrialization and collectivization.

Tail-Endism (Chvostism) or Adventurism

Some comrades are disturbed by our accusation of the present Stalinist course as ultra-Left adventurism. One of our friends proves that the "complete collectivization" has on the part of the leadership not an adventurist but a purely "tail-endist" character. There is no contradiction here. "Tail-endism" always and unavoidably results in ultra-Left adventurism, either as its supplement, or else directly. The regeneration of Bolshevism means the unavoidable chemical disassociation of the elements of opportunism and bare "revolutionism".

It must not be forgotten that adventurism can be of two sorts. One expresses the revolutionary impatience of the vanguard and results in running ahead too precipitously, the second expresses the political desperation of the lagging rear-guard. In the April and July demonstrations of 1917, some of the Bolsheviks undoubtedly brought in the element of adventurism. The same kind of tendencies, but expressing itself more sharply and having far worse consequences can be perceived in the insurrection of the Spartacists in 1919, when they attempted to jump over the Constituent Assembly. On the other hand, the tactic of the German leadership in the March days of 1921 was an attempt to stage an insurrection on a declining wave. The tactic of the ultra-Left leadership in Germany in 1924 was an adventurist supplement of the tail-endism of 1923. The Canton uprising of 1927 was an adventurist transformation of the opportunism of 1925-27 and together with that a classic example of the desperation of the rear-guard.

The movement of the peasants into the collectives, called forth by a combination of economic and administrative reasons acquired a mass character. The policy of the bureaucracy was at bottom an example of tail-endism. But the bureaucracy not only proclaimed this policy as its greatest victory—to speed is to speed! exclaimed the parrot, when the cat pulled it by the tail—but also developed a mad pressure on the peasantry under the flag of the liquidation of classes. Tail-endism was transformed directly into adventurism.

Can this adventurism be called ultra-Leftism and can it be said that we, the Opposition, attack it from the Right? Strategically, this would, of course, be senseless because the tactical zig-zag of Stalin undermines the revolutionary class strategy. But tactically nevertheless, we have this time on the part of the Stalinists not a Right but an ultra-Left zig-zag—it cannot be called otherwise.

At the Third Congress of the Comintern while working out the tactics and strategy, we rejected the ultra-Left adventurism of Zinoviev, Bela Kun, Maslow and others. Lenin did not at all fear to say that he criticizes them this time from the Right. Some of our friends were confused by this. The fetishism of words is an unpleasant illness.

The Right course as a strategical line is the reliance on the capitalist farmer in the village—capitalism in instalments. In the first years Stalin travelled far on this road. At present Stalin is moving in directly the opposite direction. The program of the administrative liquidation of the Kulak is an ultra-Left caricature of a revolutionary course. Tactically we stand at the moment to the Right of the zig-zag course. Strategically, we continue to stand on the basic revolutionary line.

On July 14, 1929, when the official turn to the Left began to make itself felt, I wrote to Ch. Rakovsky and to other exiles as follows: "After the tail-enders missed the revolutionary situation in Germany in 1923, a very deep ultra-Left zig-zag followed in 1924-25. This ultra-Left zig-zag developed into Right channels; the struggle with the industrialists, the coquettings with LaFollete and Raditch, the Peasant International, Kuomintang, etc. When ultra-Leftism smashed its head on the Right path, a Right course developed. It is therefore not inconceivable that we have here an extended reproduction of the same thing in a new stage, that is, ultra-Leftism supporting itself on opportunistic premises. The accompanying economic forces may however, break down this ultra-Leftism at the very beginning and immediately give the whole course a decisive turn to the Right."

As the principal activity of Yaroslavsky is the stealing of Oppositionist correspondence he can easily check up on this quotation. Neither Stalinist ultra-Leftism nor the newest turn to the Right was unexpected by us. As Marxists we should orientate ourselves not on the bureaucrats psychology but on the "accompanying economic forces".

Our Prognosis

Shall we call for a "retreat"? The above mentioned comrade, expresses the idea that the slogan of "Back" does not suit us. Just the same, he says, Stalin will now continue to retreat. Is it worth our while to add our voices to the outcries of these drag-in-the-rear politicians? If this were a case of a bourgeois state such a criticism would be correct. We are not at all obliged to give advice even to the most democratic and social democratic bourgeoisies as to how to get out of their difficulties. On the contrary we must mercilessly exploit all its difficulties in order to rouse the working class against the capitalist state. The position of Urbahns in relation to the U.S.S.R. is a caricature of Marxist policy in relation to a bourgeois state. But in spite of the one thousand and one lies of Yaroslavsky we considered and still consider the Soviet State a proletarian state. Even though Yaroslavsky "brings" words he ascribed to us from the Bulletin about the "unavoidable death of the October Revolution", this honorable eavesdropper lies. We never said that, we never wrote that, and never thought that, even though we do not in the least hide from ourselves nor from the Party the tremendous danger that the October Revolution is approaching as a result of the monstrous mistakes of the last period. The Opposition does not identify the Soviet State either with Yaroslavsky or with Stalin. It considers the Soviet State its own State and will defend it not only from its open class enemies but also from the internal damagers among whom Yaroslavsky occupies not the last place.

In the same article "About the Evolution of the Trotskyites" Yaroslavsky once more repeats that "L.D. Trotsky was convinced a year ago that our Party would be compelled to call him back for aid." In that sense Trotsky was supposed to have warned those who "accompanied him"

(agents of the G.P.U. that in all probability he'd be called to save the situation within a few months." Yaroslavsky lies! This is not what I said. This is not how I spoke. Together with the whole Opposition I said, that the country is entering on a period of new difficulties on a higher historical basis; that the leadership does not see anything and does not foresee that these difficulties may bring about a sharp crisis after two years, after a year or even after several months. Then, I said, it will be revealed that the government apparatus as well as the Party is over-run with bureaucrats, careerists, political betrayers, etc. But the Opposition will devotedly fight together with the revolutionary core of the Party. You will be ashamed, I said, to those "accompanying" if you will have to call back for aid in that difficult moment the Oppositionists directly from the prisons and exile. This prognosis remains in force even today. What is truer, is that now it takes on a more real and acute character.

Flattering the Peasantry

The crude and senseless economic plucking of the peasantry is supplemented by Yaroslavsky with indecent politicalattery. In regards to my words that the peasantry, finding itself before the closed gates of the market "flings" itself in the direction of collectivization, Yaroslavsky writes, "Trotsky, still retaining his past views on the peasantry as an enemy force, cannot imagine the peasantry as any different than cattle which 'fling' themselves into the open gates in the direction of collectivization." I did not compare the peasantry with cattle. For such comparisons the lackey psychology of Yaroslavsky is needed. At no time did I consider the peasantry an enemy force, neither did I consider it a conscious socialist force. The peasantry is contradictory. Within it the dependence on the elementary forces of nature are still terribly strong even today, with its terribly split-up and helplessly economy. Marx and Engels wrote in their time about the "idiocy of rural life". The Populists uttered not a few sorry words on this theme, and deduced from the Communist Manifesto the supposed enmity of the Marxists towards the peasantry. In what way does Yaroslavsky differ from them? In as much as the peasant is a realist towards the questions surrounding him, just in so far does he become a victim of blind instinct on bigger questions. The whole history of the peasantry is such that after decades and centuries of heavy immobility, it plunges either in one or another direction. The peasant-soldiers crushed the Revolution of 1905. The peasantry elected in 1917 Social Revolutionaries to the Constituent Assembly but helped the Bolsheviks to throw off the "Social Revolutionaries". How many times did it fling itself from one direction to another during the civil war before it firmly bound its fate to that of the Soviet power. To liberate the peasant from the elementary forces pressing down on his consciousness, he must be "de-peasantized". This is the task of socialism. But this is decided not by a formalist collectivization, but by a revolution in agricultural technique. The advanced peasant will sooner or later understand that the Oppositionist is far more farsighted in the question of peasant economy than the ruling bureaucrats.

Evidently, fate wanted to enjoy a particularly hearty laugh at the expense of Yaroslavsky. In the same number of the Pravda (March 30th) where this malicious and wretched article is printed there is a report of Bullat's speech at the Plenum of the Moscow district conference. Bullat says, that in one of the sections "the Right moods within the Party organization were very strong. The district committee removed several leading functionaries. And then the whole organization flung itself to the 'Left' to the extent of a complete turn." This is what was literally said. This speech is not about a peasant mass but about a party organization which is supposed to personify the consciousness of the working class. And the official leader tells us how after removing several "Rights" the organization was "flung" towards ultra-Leftism. This is far more becoming of "cattle", to make use of the lackey vocabulary of Yaroslavsky.

Nevertheless, the picture drawn by Bullat symbolizes the whole fate of the Party for the past two years. After the instinctively loyal but bewildered rank and file, who the continual shifting of leaderships and chaotic "new turns" has plunged into apathy.

The dues paying membership has sunk to a "new low"—6,617 in January 1930. The Party influence in the old unions has been annihilated. The new unions under this suicidal leadership and zig-zag course have been reduced to mere shadows of their former selves. The National Textile Workers Union has been reduced to a membership of 2,000. The Amalgamated Food Workers has been split with a small minority of 500 workers pulled out by the Stalinists to form a dual union. The National Miners Union has shrunk to a few hundred members while the Daily Worker carries screaming columns of bluff about its "strikes against Unemployment." The Needle Trades Industrial Union is down to a few thousand members. A call has been issued by the Stalinists which will split off the few badly organized Left wingers from the main body of the workers in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

While the capitalist class is intensifying its drive on the Communists as the spearhead of the militant working class, the present Browder-Ellacht sub-agency of the Stalin regime has utterly failed to organize a mass movement against the Gastonia sentences, against the victimization of the leaders of the New York Unemployed demonstration and elsewhere.

The demonstration on March 6th showed the potential opportunity for developing a great unemployed movement around concrete demands—but the incompetent Centrist leadership could not have ruined these opportunities more successfully if they had deliberately set out to do so. After the March 6th demonstration—April, May, June have passed without any organization, without any planned attempt to give form to the movement, without any popularization of a concrete program. The truth can hardly be covered up that there is no organization of the workers, no linking up with the employed—no councils except those being hastily improvised for the Chicago Convention. And the Chicago Convention looms up as another glorified mass meeting to give the Daily Worker its material for columns of yellow sensationalism.

But the American Party situation is no exception to the situation in the rest of the Comintern. As we have demonstrated repeatedly the roots of the Party crisis are international. We will continue energetically to prepare fresh cadres in the Party who will take up the struggle of the Left Opposition for the revolutionary principles of Marx and Lenin

THE NEW UNIONS AND THE UNITED FRONT

In the work of forming new unions of the unorganized workers, no less than its work in the A. F. of L., the Party must revive and apply the united front tactic. Maintaining always its independence and freedom of criticism, the Party must-form alliance with groups and organizations willing to co-operate with us on a minimum class struggle program and win the non-Party militants over to the course of joint struggle. An approach to revolutionary syndicalist workers in the spirit of Lenin is especially necessary.

The Party must strive to establish its decisive influence and leadership in these united front struggles by its initiative, superior tactics and conscientious persevering work. These methods must replace the growing tendency towards exclusiveness and mechanical, monopolistic Party control which only result in the narrowing down of the base of the new movements and organizations, in their degeneration into impotent cliques, in their isolation and defeat. Under the present conditions and relation of forces, the Party cannot put forth the demand for arbitrary and mechanical control without endangering the developing movements and blocking its own approach to the awakening non-Party masses. The leadership of the Communists, which is alone able to steer the new movements on a correct course, must be won in struggle.

In Germany

Fascist Gains in Saxony

The results of the Saxony elections make ominous reading to the German and international working class.

It is generally known that the results of the Thuringian elections some time ago gave the Fascists ("national socialists") the direct and legal control of the police power. They became the governing party and have launched on the open suppression of the workers' press and organizations. The tabulation of the returns from the election to the Saxon diet (it used to be the Saxony!) now shows that the Fascists ("National Socialists") have tripled their strength and advanced from the position of seventh among thirteen parties to the second strongest party in the state. They polled 376,724 votes and acquired 14 seats as against five in the old legislature. The social democrats, it is reported, held their own, and the Communists won two seats. The socialists now have thirty-two, the fascists fourteen and the Communists thirteen seats.

These terrible results for the working class in a province that once had the strongest proletarian movement in Germany are the consequences of social democratic betrayal, developing deep disappointment among the masses. But instead of the revolutionary Communists being the gainers, it is chiefly the fascists. The Communist Party is hamstrung by its adventurist leadership, its false centrist theories, its third period policies. The Stalin regime, with its Molotovs and Manuilskys is, continually pounding the tom-tom of radicalization. The German situation really is the most fertile soil for the radicalization of the workers. The German capitalists have publicly announced their intentions for a universal wage cut, the Young Plan has been set into operation, the economic crisis will be sharpened by the situation in the United States.

But the disastrous course of the Stalinists must be held jointly accountable with social democratic betrayal for this failure to give leadership to the revolution and to bring the processes of mass radicalization to the surface in the form of political and industrial action.

Φ

On Friday June 20th some 400 workers employed by the Long Island Railroad were discharged. These fresh recruits to the army of the unemployed were mainly engaged in the maintenance of way department and the passenger and freight services. In addition 100 temporary employees taken on three months ago were dismissed. The corporation did not of course consult the workers before firing them out on the slave market.

The learned professor Carver of Harvard should try consoling these workers by proving that now they will live off the stocks, shares and dividends they own as capitalists. Suppose they start a business for themselves?

Switchmen's Union Convention

The Switchmen's Union of America concluded on June 18th a ten day convention at Buffalo, N. Y. Two hundred and forty-one delegates attended. During this long period the convention failed to deal adequately with the major and immediate needs confronting the Union. The greater part of the delegates was made up of those having seniority rights. Thus they failed to comprehend directly the acute issue of unemployment taking its toll among the railroad workers in the United States and Canada by the tens of thousands through layoffs, speed-up and rationalization.

The convention as a whole carried through a reactionary program, only relieved here and there by an occasionally progressive act of resistance to the reactionary proposals of the organization officialdom.

After Secretary of Labor Davis of the Hoover Administration had recited his piece of cant, the officers reports began. These reports were hopelessly inadequate and did not deal in any sense with the Switchmen's and railroaders' needs generally. They consisted of details on this and that point, but contained no proper review of the organization's gains and losses, its perspective for the union, the question of the unorganized, the unemployed, etc. The officers' reports had, as one rank and file delegate expressed it, no more information than a time-table. Of course, the officers showed why they needed an increase in salaries.

Nevertheless, a rank and file delegate took the floor and wanted to know where the union was heading? What were the aims of the organization? How were they going to meet the attacks of the railroad barons, the smashing of the unions, etc. A three hour discussion followed, in which sharp criticism was made of the poor and flabby reports of the officials. But nothing happened as a result and the convention returned to its routine work.

Red-Baiter Resolution Defeated

Later the Resolutions Committee brought in a resolution calling for the expulsion from the Union of all Communists, Amalgamationists, revolutionists, Reds, etc. in line with the ideas and practices of the Greens, Wolls and Cashens. This resolution aiming to eliminate all opposition and all remaining militants from the Union, was attacked by a delegate from the floor. He pointed out that the passage of this resolution meant playing the game of the bosses and of the bureaucratic officials, and was the way to break, not build, the union. He described the role of the "Reds", etc. as that type of union militancy which made fighting organizations of the workers against the employers. His speech aroused the delegates and the resolution was overwhelmingly defeated.

To everyone's surprise the reactionary officials tried to introduce the same resolution again in different clothing. But other delegates arose and denounced the resolution and it was once more defeated.

The program adopted was a lifeless, hopeless one, so far as the needs of the rank and file is concerned, with the bare exceptions indicated.

The Convention adopted a resolution addressed to the railroad workers of all crafts and industries to cooperate in a movement to establish the six hour day and five day week.

Resolution for Railroad Councils

The most important action of the Convention, if properly understood and measures are taken to carry it through, was a resolution for the establishment of Railroad Councils of all railroad workers in all railway centres. This is similar in plan and scope to the Railroad Council initiated in April by a delegated body of railroad men in Minneapolis and St. Paul. This Twin City Council, among other things, also called for a national campaign among railroad workers for the six hour day and five day week. The Railway Councils have potentialities for rank and file control by the railroad workers and for the rebuilding of the railroad organizations on a militant basis.

Railroad workers everywhere should strive for the establishment of Railway Councils similar to that begun by the Twin City Railroad men.

Another resolution adopted by the Switchmen's Convention provided for the attempt to set up machinery to consolidate the insurance features of the various Railroad Unions into one; and also to investigate ways and means to wipe out jurisdictional disputes. What the officialdom has in mind are those jurisdictional disputes which hinder their bureaucratic hold in their field. The rank and file have to agitate for actually removing causes for jurisdictional disputes through the amalgamation of the railroad unions, as a first step toward the reorganization of the railroad workers on an industrial union basis.

The officials not satisfied with their present huge salaries, even while unemployment is heavy, sought a further increase in salaries. To the bitter disappointment of the officers the Convention voted this down.

—RANK AND FILE DELEGATE

GENERAL STRIKE IN SPAIN

Ever since the fall of the Spanish dictator Rivera, the atmosphere in Spain has been charged. The general strike declared in Seville against police brutality towards strikers in a wage dispute in an olive factory, indicates how great the tension is. Police and guards brutally fired, killing and wounding men, women and children indiscriminately. One hundred and fifty people were injured as the police attacked with sabres and rifles.

Fourteen strike and trade union leaders and fifty "agitators" are under arrest. Workers are assembling in throngs in various parts of Seville. The city is virtually under martial law.

Alfonso's henchman General Berenguer issued the usual official "Order, has been restored in Warsaw" statement. "It appears that the trouble is past" he declared after a cabinet meeting.

The General is mistaken. The Seville strike is symptomatic of the development of a mass movement that will compel Alfonso and his corrupt regime to think seriously of suitable European refuges for aristocratic emigres.

Aftermath of Needle Trades Convention

2. Character of the Right Wing Unions

By James P. Cannon

One of the chief errors of the convention of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union—an error, like all the others, forced upon it by the Party leadership—was to regard the split in the furriers and ladies garment workers unions, and the formation of the new industrial union, as the final settlement of accounts with the reactionary leaders within the old organizations throughout the industry, including those unions which were not affected by the split. This estimation of the situation is profoundly false. The issue is not yet settled even with the unions in which the split occurred and will not be settled as long as these Right wing organizations control the majority of the organized workers in these trades. And in the field of the other unions, where there has been no split and where the new union has created no base in the shops, such an assumption is a sheer absurdity. A policy founded on this false assumption collides with facts which cannot be wished away.

The split and the formation of the new union in a section of the industry must rather be regarded as a stage in a long-drawn-out and complicated struggle. The first necessary stage was the formation of the Left wing in the old unions and its consolidation in battle. Without that the present existence of the new union would have been impossible. The Left wing is still confronted with this preliminary task in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers and in the Cap and Millinery Workers Union. It has yet to complete it in the I.L.G.W.U. and the Furriers Union. It also has the problem of uniting this activity in a comprehensive strategy with the task of strengthening the new Left union and organizing the unorganized. The goal of the Left wing is to unite the masses of needle trades workers into a single organization of the class struggle.

The goal is still some distance away, as the membership figures demonstrate with merciless logic. Under what conditions can the Left wing move in the direction of this goal. Only by demonstrating in practice that it is able to improve the material conditions of the workers in the shops. The most revolutionary program will not be accepted as a substitute for this. The workers want results in terms of bread and butter. If the Left wing union fails in this it fails in everything. The new union has the will to do this, but it is blocked by the Right unions which have the help of the bosses and the police—and, besides, have the great bulk of the organized workers in their ranks. The existence of these Right wing unions under the control of the reactionaries and traitors is not only a barrier to the new union in the organized shops; it is also a powerful force for sabotage and disruption of any serious organizing campaign of the new union among the unorganized. The Left wing must cope with this problem. That is the key to its future development.

Attitude to Right Wing Unions

The question of the attitude of the revolutionaries toward the Right wing unions needs clarification. The convention of the new union under the guidance of the Party leadership, put the question on the simple basis of "either—or"; that is, FOR the new Left wing union and AGAINST the old Right wing unions throughout the entire industry. The convention program states: "The I.L.G.W.U., the A.C.W., the I.F.W.U., and the other so-called Right wing organizations are company unions in the real sense of the word...The company unions cannot be reformed, they must be destroyed." It follows with the decision: "To abandon the maintenance of the T.U.U. L. groups within the company unions." And to "call upon every needle trade worker, regardless of craft or occupation, to join the new union."

This is a false approach to the problem as well as a false estimation of the old unions. What is needed is a two-sided policy of strengthening the new union and simultaneously working within the old unions, with a single objective: to unite the workers on a broader basis under the Left wing banner. Simple solutions "either—or"—will not work out. To liquidate the new unions would mean to deprive the workers of the concentrated gains of their long struggle and paralyze their fighting power for a long time. To call at the same time to build a strong Left wing in the old unions would rob the new union of any possibilities of broad expansion and condemn it to sectarian impotence.

The Stalinist master-minds who can see only along a straight line, and that only as far as the end of their noses, will have none of this "complicated" strategy. And lacking reasons to justify their narrow and sectarian policy, they invent them. One of these inventions is the theory that the Right wing unions are company unions. Even if this were so it would not free the revolutionaries from the necessity of working within them as long as they embrace masses of workers. Foster explained this some years ago in his writings on company unions, and as Lenin explained before him in his account of the work of the bolsheviks in the Czarist police-controlled unions in "Left Wing Communism". But, alas, we live in the "third period", and the onetime wisdom of Foster, to say nothing of the wisdom of Lenin is a forgotten song of long ago. Stalinist education requires that we forget today everything we learned yesterday.

The Company Union Argument

The "company union" argument is a theoretical fraud invented to motivate a false policy. There is no doubt, however that many of the Left wing workers are deluded by this schematic explanation of the matter; and this delusion stands in the way of a clear comprehension of the problems and tasks of the Left wing. This circumstance justifies and necessitates a discussion of the formula which is designed to save thought and avoid a complicated struggle.

The history of the American and International labor movement shows two types of trade unions; those based on the idea of the partnership of labor and capital—"Class collaboration" unions—and those based on the class struggle. Even between these two main types the line of demarcation is not always clear. They frequently overlap each other. More than one "revolutionary" union has proved to be conservative, even reactionary, in practice and many a militant strike has been conducted by unions officially committed to a policy of class collaboration. These contradictions between practice and program arise from the fact that the trade unions are not static bodies. They have their existence in the class struggle and are constantly under its pressure and influence.

The trade unions, which are the basic and elementary organizations of the workers, reflect in a general way the stage of class development of the workers in their ranks.

The corrupt and reactionary bureaucracy exerts a certain influence, of course, in holding back the development of the union on the path of the class struggle; just as the Communists, at the other pole, are a force for its acceleration. Between these two factors of conscious pressure for opposing ends the general level of class consciousness in the masses asserts itself and determines the character of the unions in practice regardless of their predetermined program. A revolutionization of the labor movement presupposes a revolutionization of the masses and has no serious meaning without it. On the other hand, with a real development of working class radicalization, all the machinations of the bureaucrats cannot prevent the trade unions from reflecting and expressing it.

The fact that this organization expression may, and most frequently will, be realized through deep splits in the old unions and the formation of new ones—a process that has begun in the needle trades—does not alter the fundamental proposition. The very existence of the new needle trades industrial union which was first crystallized as a Left wing in the old unions, is positive proof that these unions are susceptible to the pressure of the class struggle and the agitation of the revolutionaries. It is proof that, despite the despicable fakers at their head, they are actual organizations of the workers, the natural and legitimate field for revolutionary activity.

Company unionism is a different question altogether. Company unions are organizations formed directly by the bosses and directly controlled by them. Their officers are the bosses' employees, foremen, stool-pigeons etc. They have no independent life and no independent power to enforce decisions. They have no functions except those conferred on them by the bosses. History has never yet recorded a struggle of the workers conducted under the banner of a company union; although there have been a few instances where they served as the starting point for movements of revolt against the company unions, smashing through them and forming independent unions of the workers. No worker even the most ignorant ever mistook a company union for a real union.

Class-Collaboration Unions

Can the Right wing unions in the needle trades with all the corruption and treachery of their leaders properly be classified as company unions? Certainly not, if definitions mean anything. These are quite different organizations and this fundamental difference is not abolished by the recent trend of the Right wing officials toward closer and more open partnership with the bosses. The Right wing organizations are class-collaboration unions in all the accepted meaning and implication of that term. It is quite true that the Right wing officials have introduced a new efficiency and a higher technique into the business of betraying the workers under the old theory of a partnership between labor and capital. But at bottom there is nothing new in principle. The Right wing unions in practice are more or less typical examples of the doctrine of class collaboration.

What is there about the practice of the Right wing unions that distinguishes them from the standard type of reactionary American trade unions. Is it the agreement with the bosses to compel the workers in the shop to register in the Right union. Almost every American trade union for years and even for decades has attempted to make such an agreement with the employers. Many of them are based on such contracts. The printing trades, building trades, and many other unions have such agreements. The most conspicuous illustration is the United Mine Workers. For more than twenty years this organization maintained control of the organized coal fields, and froze out such rivals as the I.W.W. and the One Big Union, through the check-off system—an arrangement whereby the mine operators collected the union dues by deducting them from the miners' wages. The program of the Left wing convention cites the check-off as one of the "characteristics of company unions". This is really laughable when it is recalled that the check-off was one of the Left wing demands in the miners union up till a short while ago; the surrender of the check-off by Lewis in the anthracite strike in 1926 was bitterly attacked by the Communist Party.

Is it co-operation of their officials with the bosses and the police to fight the militant workers which makes the Right wing unions company unions? This again is the established and traditional practice of reactionaries in the labor movement; it is such practices, among others, that stamp them as reactionaries and agents of the bosses. Lenin speaks of this in "Left Wing Communism". The traitor leaders of the German trade unions were the saviors of capitalism and the butchers of the revolutionary workers. After that Lenin wrote his pamphlet advising the German Communists to go into these unions in order to wrest the workers out of the control of these betrayers.

Is it, perhaps, the enforcement of "production standards" on the workers and the selling of the unions as agencies of efficiency that "transforms" them into company unions? This again is nothing new. Such a policy is inherent in the very idea of class collaboration unionism. The slogan of traditional trade unionism, "a fair day's wages for a fair day's work", which Marx polemicized against, is the germ of all such policies. The latter-day agents of the capitalists in the labor movement have only extended and modernized the basic ideas and practices of the conservative unionism of the past.

While in all essential and fundamental features the Right wing unions in the needle trades conform to the standard type of reactionary labor organization represented by the A. F. of L., there is no ground for confusing them with company unions. The basic difference consists in this: The company union is a lifeless organization created by the bosses, in which no outside force is consulted and no agreement is required. The reactionary labor union, on the other hand is based on an agreement of the bosses with an outside force, namely, the unions represented by the Right wing officialdom. This relationship imparts to the union certain features never seen in a company union. These are: a formal independent life of the union organization and an independent apparatus not employed in the shop; a constitution and formal democratic procedure—business meetings, conventions, etc., without direct interference of the bosses; an independent treasury for the self-maintenance of the union; the settlement of disputes by agreement with an implied reserve weapon of compulsion on the part of the union. These are the essential features of a labor organization, a potential instrument of the class struggle and a natural field for revolutionary work.

It is quite obvious that company unions and reactionary trade unions are entirely different kinds of organizations. And this difference is not disposed of by the assertion that the Right wing unions, through their corrupt officials, also serve the bosses. This is true enough, and it must never be forgotten, but they serve the bosses in a different way than do the officials of the company unions who are directly employed by the bosses and represent no independent power. This is what we have to understand before we can draw the correct inferences regarding revolutionary tactics. To characterize the old unions in the needle trades as company unions means to play with catch-words. Those who want to think straight—and revolutionaries above all others must do this—must beware of catch-words. What we need is precise definitions of our problems and tasks. Intelligent thought requires that words have a definite meaning, although this elementary truth has not yet occurred to the phrase-mongering leaders who try to answer complicated problems with careless epithets.

If we compare the old unions in the needle trades with the standard A.F. of L. unions and such conservative independent bodies as the railroad brotherhoods we see that they all have the same characteristic features. The differences and variations between them are incidental and peculiar to the particular situation surrounding them. The important thing to see—because it is an inescapable fact—is that they are of the same basic type. Consequently, a policy of withdrawal from the reactionary unions in the needle trades, of refusing to organize a Left wing within them—on the ground that they are company unions—is, in reality, a decision to give up the fight in all the reactionary unions. Make no mistake about it. That is what the newly-baked theory of "company unionism" means.

Such proposals have been made before. In 1920 and 1921 we fought the issue out in bitter conflicts in the Party. The rise of the Left wing in the needle trades and all its great historic accomplishments would have been impossible if we had not defeated the abstentionist policy at that time and steered the Communist militants into the mass organizations controlled by the reactionaries—the same Schlesingers and Hillmans. In the early days of the Comintern a historic struggle on this question took place, the results of which were summed up at the Second World Congress of the Comintern and the First World Congress of the R.I.L.U. Thanks to the decisive leadership of Lenin and Trotsky the program of deserting the old mass unions, proposed by the German ultra-Left Opposition and sections of the British and American delegations, was rejected and the Comintern directed its course toward the masses in the reactionary unions. Without this decision the expansion of the Communist Parties of Europe as great organizations of the masses could not have taken place.

cover that we were always inclined towards heretical deviations, and that we never were much good anyway. There will be much slander and dirt as there has always been towards those comrades who have embraced the Marxian opinions of the Left Opposition. For the phrasemongers, shallow-minded bureaucrats, and despicable opportunists we have only contempt. We address ourselves to those sincere rank and file comrades who are devotedly sacrificing for Communism, but have been misled by the Browders, Fosters and Lovestones. Let there be no surprise for our and other comrades "sudden" conversion to the support of the Platform of the Left Opposition.

Bureaucratism Supreme

In a Party which no longer permits disagreements with the official line bureaucratically proclaimed—from above, in a Party in which there no longer exists the last vestige of centralized democracy, in a Party which demands only slavish obedience and mechanical execution of tasks, in a Party in which self-criticism means "Do not dare to criticize the leadership"—in such a Party where all honest opinion is driven underground, many unforeseen surprises are to be expected. When we read in the Daily Worker (June 3) such remarks as written by Herbert Benjamin, D.O. of the N. Y. District, as "No one in the Party now dares to deny the correctness of the basic analysis of the Comintern and Central Committee," when we hear such remarks during a pre-convention discussion period then indeed do we declare that Party democracy is an absolutely dead institution.

"The whole course in the Party and the Y.C.L. has shocked and aroused us. The present ultra-Left adventurist line, which is discrediting Communism in the eyes of the workers, and which is destroying whatever Communist influence there has been in the past, led us to a complete re-examination of the course pursued by the Party and the Comintern for the last seven years. We studied such basic and fundamental questions as socialism in one country, the Chinese Revolution, and the course of Soviet economy. We found that in the past we had been deceived about these questions. We found that Lovestone and Foster had lied about the Left Opposition and about the leader of the Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition in the U.S.S.R. and the International, comrade Trotsky. They suppressed the real opinions of the Opposition and ascribed to them false and untrue viewpoints. When for the first time we read the truth about the Menshevik and disastrous Chiang Kai-Shek course pursued by Bucharin-Stalin in the Chinese Revolution, we were stunned and appalled. Then we saw who are the real opportunists, and who carries forward the traditions of Lenin.

Fundamental Questions

From the beginning we avoided being provoked by the stupid blunders of the Party and falling precipitately into the opportunist arms of Lovestone. We avoided studying the problem superficially, that is, merely examine this or that tactical error, but went into the fundamental questions which we have mentioned. From Herberg of the Lovestone group we have heard such remarks as, "Who cares about socialism in one country? I don't care one way or the other. The American working class is not concerned about socialism in one country." We have known how to estimate such a crass opportunist and unprincipled approach to the international problems of the working class. Give the Lovestone faction a united front a la Kuomintang or pro-Purcell and they are happy. But for us the question cuts much deeper than that. For us the question is either the reactionary, utopian, anti-Marxian theory of socialism in one country—Lovestone's "exceptionalism" in a Russian dress—or a program of the international revolution.

The Decline of Party Influence

Failure after failure stares the Party in the face. The most outstanding characteristic in the life of the Party today is its absolute inability to take advantage of the favorable objective conditions which confront it—the incessant lagging behind. In the old unions there is not to be found a trace of Party influence. Work there has been completely forsaken. The new unions have steadily dwindled, and whatever mass character they once had has disappeared. The membership drive has been a miserable failure. In the New York District out of the total recruitment, 40% never appeared and 18% dropped out immediately. The unemployment campaign has collapsed like a house of cards. What has happened to the million and a quarter workers who were supposed to be ready to follow the call of the Party? Why is no mass campaign started to free Foster and the others? Why is nothing done about the workers facing the electric chair in Atlanta, Georgia? Why is not a broad united front movement launched in accordance with the big possibilities and necessities of this case? Why is there such paralysis in the Party? What explains that there were only 300,000 workers demonstrating on May 1 while there were a million and a quarter on March 6? Scolding and trying to place the blame on the membership for not doing enough work cannot explain it. The reason is to be sought in the anti-Leninist theory of the "third period" and the ultra-Left adventurist policies that follow from it. The empty shouting, the bombast, and sensationalism must be abandoned, the Party must return to the policies of Lenin, upheld by the Left Opposition.

Ruinous Policies

In the Young Communist League we have indeed seen a most deplorable state of affairs. The Y.C.L. does not seem to be able to hold the members who come into its ranks. The membership turnover has assumed an alarmingly rapid pace. Young workers come and go. Members who have been a short while in the League become passive and discouraged. They drop out or are expelled. This is the reaction to the bureaucratic regime, to the elimination of democracy, to the fact that they can find no opportunity for revolutionary expression inside the League, to the opportunism and adventurism of the present leadership. The Young Communists can only find a solution by finding their way to the platform of the Left Opposition.

Hence we demand:

1. The liquidation of the regime of bureaucratic suppression in the Comintern and the opening of an untrammelled discussion of the balance sheet of the Stalin regime and the Platform of the Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition these past six years.

2. The re-establishment of Party democracy and the re-instatement in the Party, International and the Soviet Union of the exiled and persecuted members of the Left Opposition.

3. The re-examination of the Program adopted at the Sixth World Congress and the elimination of all the revisionist theories of "socialism in one country", and the rejection of the Menshevik colonial and national policies pursued by the bureaucratic leadership in China and India.

A SQUEAK IN THE APPARATUS

ultra-Right course the theoretician of which was Bucharin—deafened by the Stalinist apparatus, "flung" in the direction of complete collectivization. If for the peasantry the "flinging" is a historic misfortune, then for the Party as a conscious selection such a condition is not only a misfortune but a disgrace. It is the Stalinist regime, in which Yaroslavsky occupies a shameful but not the last place that brought the Party to this disgrace.

However, about which of my past views of the peasantry as an enemy force does Yaroslavsky write? Aren't they those views that I expressed, let us say, thirty years ago, during my first exile, and about which Yaroslavsky gave an immeasurably enthusiastic account in the Spring of 1923? "Around himself," Yaroslavsky tells us, "Trotsky saw only the village. He was pained by its needs. He was depressed by its isolation and lack of rights", etc. Yaroslavsky considered it necessary not only to glorify my exceptional attention to the peasantry and acquaintance with the entire peasant life, but he also demanded that my youthful articles on the peasantry should be compiled into a textbook for the study of the young generation. Literally!

I mentioned this grossly flattering response in my Autobiography throwing into the face of Yaroslavsky and may others of my critics their own words of yesterday. In connection with this Yaroslavsky speaks now about "Trotsky's self-praises" in his auto-biography. He only forgets to add that these "self-praises" consist of quotations taken from those under whose leadership the campaign of poison and slander—the dimensions of which were unparalleled—went on for the past seven years. To stir all this refuse does not give us any pleasure. In this I will be believed, not only by a revolutionist, but by any thinking man, who is not poisoned by the degrading spirit of a Chinovnik (bureaucrat) careerist. I merely carried out what I considered my revolutionary duty. Stalin and his Yaroslavskies carry on against me precisely because I represent a system of views which they despise.

For the sake of this struggle they considered it necessary to stir up the whole history of the Party and Revolution, not leaving a single, living point untouched. To defeat then their whole slanderous front it was not so much a matter of personal self-defence, as a matter of political necessity. I fulfilled this in several works. In the book "The Revolution Disfigured", "The Autobiography" and finally in the book on the "Permanent Revolution". In all these works, I expose on the basis of exact historic data, documents and quotations, the fraudulent web of the Stalinist school in which Yaroslavsky occupies a shameful but not the last place.

In regards to these books which have already been published in many languages and continue to be translated and republished, the Stalinists have adopted complete silence. Let them try and refute my exposition. Let them defend themselves against those slanderous contradictions, falsifications and slanders of which I accuse them on the basis of undeniable documents and more often on the basis of their own previous declarations. Let them deny at least one of the quotations or at least one iota of the evidence used by me. They cannot do it—they stand convicted by their own deeds. They are in the clasp of their own contradictions, they are compromised by their own denials, they are revealed ideologically impotent by the inconsistency of their own lies. Life is not stagnant. Life goes its way bearing out the criticism and prognosis of the Opposition.

Why the New Polemic?

Why after all the preceeding liquidations, crushings and funerals of the Opposition is Yaroslavsky compelled or more correctly why was Yaroslavsky commissioned to enter into such a highly principled polemic with the Opposition? Even though with the grossest distortions, the eavesdropper was nevertheless compelled to quote the Paris Bulletin of the Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists) and to inform partly because of need, partly because of thoughtlessness something very inconvenient for the Stalinist faction.

If we look closer at Yaroslavsky's article we cannot but come to the conclusion that he wrote primarily in order to frighten the lower ranks of the Stalin apparatus. Bringing quotations from the Bulletin, clearly inconvenient for Stalin, Yaroslavsky speaks to some one: You hear what the Opposition says? Take care not to repeat these words! Under the pressure from the bottom the alarm in the apparatus is growing, the doubts in the leadership are growing and the voices condemning the latest zig-zag are growing. Precisely in view of this Yaroslavsky so unexpectedly speaks of Trotsky's hopes to be called upon to "save" the Revolution. Yaroslavsky was slightly over-conscious—ran too far ahead and revealed an over-abundant alarm. A squeak in the apparatus is heard, and Yaroslavsky "frightens"—whom? His own people: sit straight, be silent, whether you believe or do not believe in the genius of the leadership; be silent, do not arouse any doubts, i. not the apparatus is threatened by an "intervention" of Trotskyism! This is the sense of Yaroslavsky's article, this is what its political music consists of.

But this music can no longer drown the squeak in the apparatus. As a result of the most recent tests, which showed that the leadership plays around brainlessly, the differentiation inside the Party will greatly increase. The Rights will undoubtedly experience a new growth, will bring forth new leaders, perhaps with lesser names but more fundamental and more persistent. This danger must be foreseen. But also in the proletarian core of the Party a deep awakening will take place, undoubtedly is taking place already.

From day to day the urge to understand the latest Left jump in connection with the whole "general" line which alas, does not exist in nature, will grow. It is quite possible that the pre-Congress discussion will not be as quiet as the Bonapartist elements would like. The news that Stalin attempted once more to postpone the Congress until the Autumn, that is to complete another alternative "overturn", that one hundred and first by this time, and that his own Central Committee resisted is highly credible and at the same time very symptomatic. This signifies the beginning of the Party's awakening.

A new chapter opens before the Opposition—a very responsible one. Outside of the Opposition nobody will give the Party a clear picture of what is happening at present in unbreakable connection with the policy of the whole period after the death of Lenin. No one except the Opposition is able to secure for the Party a correct principled orientation.

The eavesdropper cites new declarations of repentance and skeptical voices of single Oppositionists. By the combined forces of the starvation diet, of G. P. U. measures, Yaroslavsky's admonitions, and the theoretical belaborings of the red-yellow professors, a new group of capitulators is being prepared for the Sixteenth Congress. But Yaroslavsky passes in silence the new hundreds of arrested Oppositionists in Moscow alone, the revival of the activities of the Opposition in the Party ranks and the growth and consolidation of the International Opposition.

Singly and by groups, Oppositionists who went dizzy over the complete collectivization are compelled by the logic of inertia to present their repentance to the Sixteenth Congress, at a moment when the difficult process of sobering up is beginning. Well, another group of crushed revolutionary reputations will be added. In their stead many hundreds more have already come out according to the statistics of the G.P.U. tomorrow thousands and tens of thousands will follow. It is not the Yaroslavskys who can break the Opposition away from the Party, no, now less than at any time before.

Y.P.S.L. Appeals to Young Babbitry

The Young People's Socialist League represents the interests of the petty-bourgeois youth. These interests are hostile and dangerous to those of the young workers. They run counter to each other, and clash irreconcilably. The petty-bourgeois youth aspires to establish himself comfortably and securely in some well-paying profession. In the Yipsels he can pursue his personal ambitions of well-being congenially and at the same time retain his "ideals". His interest is to preserve the capitalist relations which permit within its confines the fulfillment of his small-minded desires. Revolution and revolutionary working class activity is abhorrent to him. But capitalism with its innate contradictions refuses to run smoothly, and often disturbances occur which menace the attainments of the puny aims of the petty-bourgeois youth. Then he talks fiercely against capitalism, and indeed becomes terribly radical.

We have before us an appeal of the Y.P.S.L. entitled "Young Man, Young Woman—What are You Going to Do With Your Life?" which is eloquently expressive of the nature of this organization. It begins by saying that every young man and woman has two big things to think about. "The first is important...It is how you are going to make a living. But the answer to the second is even more important, for upon it depends the way you are going to live your life." Truly this could be said only to people to whom the question of earning a living is a matter of slight concern, something about which it is not necessary to worry, not a life and death question. And indeed, are we not all to be dentists, doctors or lawyers. Join the Yipsels not because it will help you to fight for better working conditions in your shop or factory, but in order to learn how to spend your money "culturally" and your leisure time "ideally".

Socialist "Doctors and Dentists"

Then America's future doctors and dentists go on to say, "Every young man and woman who is at school or college every youth who knows that school days will soon be over and that the struggles for a living are looming just ahead (this probably refers to the less successful dentists—G.R.) has to make a decision very soon as to how his life is to be led". Yes, indeed, we forgot all about our college education. There are apparently millions of college graduates working in factories for 14 dollars per week. But the poor fools have only themselves to blame. Who asked them to become B.A.'s. They should have become M.D.'s and D.D.S.'s.

The Yipsels perhaps do not know that one out of every four children who enter school never reach the sixth grade, that almost one half never reach the eighth grade, and that less than one third of the school age population enter high school, and that but one in eight graduates. It is not worth speaking of the number who graduate college. How can such facts concern petty bourgeois Yipsels?

And now listen to this most illuminating outlook on life—revealing the true soul of the American Yipsels: "Now after you are earning a living (such an unimportant and simple matter, you know—G.R.) or pursuing a course that will lead to such an honest and decent living (it's either the one or the other, of course—G.R.)—what next? What are you going to do with yourself and your life?"

"Are you going to establish a home, sit back, enjoy life to the extent of your means, and call it a day? Are you going to blind your eyes to the world around you?"

"Most men and women realize that merely earning a living and then going to the movies and motoring does not constitute a complete and wholesome life."

Ten individual holding each ranging from 250,000 shares upwards control the General Motors Corporation through the ownership of 20,000,000 shares.

The DuPont powder interests combined with the management interest controls 75 per cent of the 15 million shares. Under these circumstances what substance can the point have that there has been an increase of "165 percent in the number of small shareholders? (from 83, 415 on Feb. 16, 1929 to 218,413, Jan. 24, 1930)

"There must be something else."

The Conditions of the Working Youth

There are over ten million toiling youth in the United States, of whom more than five million are exploited in industry. There are over two and a half million child laborers. The average wage of the young worker is about $14, and his working day is about 10 hours under very bad conditions. Since the war there has been an intensive rationalization process which has drawn millions of young workers into industry and increased his importance in industry. There are some industries which employ exclusively or very large proportions of young workers. And amidst all this the Yipsels shout "There must be something else." As if in mockery of the bitterly and miserably exploited working youth who of course establish homes, sit back and enjoy life, go motoring and other such delightful pastimes, the middle class philistines advise "So while we do not suggest even for a moment that you give up any of your good times, that you cease enjoying yourself, we ask you to turn your thoughts to those questions that face your elders, and will face you."

Trotsky on the Grown-Up Yipsel

Permit me to quote comrade Trotsky's excellent and fitting description of this type of people. "In the United States there is a large group of successful and semi-successful doctors, lawyers, dentists, engineers and the like who divide their precious hours of rest between concerts by European celebrities and the American Socialist party. Their attitude towards life is composed of shreds and fragments of the wisdom they absorbed in their student days. Since they all have automobiles, they are invariably elected to the important committees, commissions and delegations of the party. And properly speaking they are simply variants of 'Babbitt', who supplements his commercial activity with dull Sunday meditations on the future of humanity. These people live in small national clans, in which the solidarity of ideas usually serves as a screen for business connections. Each clan has its own leader, usually the most prosperous of the Babbitts. They tolerate all ideas provided they do not undermine their traditional authority and do not threaten—God forbid!—their personal comfort!"

It would be an unjust slander to say that the post war generation of Yipsel Babbitts are in any way inferior to their Babbitt elders in the Socialist party.

Self-Criticism

The "self-criticism" of the ruling faction consists in making tardy admissions of the least significant of the errors they committed, without indicating any connection between them, or the basis upon which they arose. The important and more dangerous mistakes committed by them are "admitted" only under the most severe pressure and even then, in most cases they are falsely ascribed to the opponents of the very errors. The nature of the errors, the reasons and responsibility for them, are never repeated in the same form, or else they are repeated in an inverted form caused by irresponsible swings to the opposite extreme.

A genuine Leninist self-criticism is a primary requisite for the establishment of clarity, the raising of the ideological level of the Party and the elimination of the distrust and cynicism caused by its absence. Instead of self-criticism, the Party leadership has instituted a regime of diplomacy, concealment, distortion, and self-praise. Its own "achievements" are paraded and exaggerated in the most revolting shopkeeper's manner. A blank check of immunity from any error or crime is an automatic premium to any of its faction supporters.

—FROM THE PLATFORM OF THE COMMUNIST OPPOSITION ADOPTED (CHICAGO) MAY 20, 1929.

OPPOSITION RECRUITS YOUTH

In this issue of the Militant there appears a statement signed by a group of Party and Young Communist League members. This group represent the advance guard in the slow but steady march toward the Left Opposition which is bound to occur in the coming period among the Communist Youth now under the influence of the Stalinist regime or the Right Wing. Shallow-minded people may under-estimate the importance of this development because they do not see large numbers rushing forward to the support of the Left Opposition. But revolutionists, unlike opportunists who can base themselves only upon what happens under their nose have perspective and can project the meaning of immediate events into the future beyond the limits of tangible occurrences.

This declaration is not a detached and accidental event separated from the processes at work within the ranks of the Y.C.L. It is indicative of certain trends. These three comrades who have now proclaimed their adherence to the Left Opposition are by no means the only ones in the Y.C.L. today who are definitely for our platform. But for each one of those who are for us, there are many who are thinking and studying our viewpoint, and in due time will be with us.

Right Wingers Distortions

In the Y.C.L. there is a growing resentment and dissatisfaction, still weak and submerged, toward the prevailing course. The Lovestone opportunists are trying to divert this sentiment in their direction. But all young Communists are not to be deceived so easily. There are many who are not superficial or lightminded and will insist upon examining the platform of the Left Opposition. It is very significant that among those who are definitely for us today there are a number who were formerly supporters of the Lovestone group during the period when it constituted the leadership of the American Party. In the last issue of Revolutionary Youth under the query of "What is Trotskyism?" there is a whole page devoted to the distortion and misrepresentation of our viewpoint. There it is stated that "Trotskyism" is of very the only reason they speak of it is for educational purposes. But for anyone in the least acquainted with the Lovestone methods, this is just so much duplicity. The truth is that the Right wing in their efforts to win the more advanced comrades in the Y.C.L. have detected a current which flows in our direction.

The Future to the Youth

Despite these favorable developments, we harbor no illusions about our future growth. We realize that our inevitable victory is not a matter of weeks or months but years. Today we are assembling our forces, slowly, in small numbers. We are creating the cadres which will play a big and decisive role in the future of the revolutionary movement. A large proportion of this vanguard will be formed from the youth elements of today. The regime of bureaucracy and political corruption which has dominated the Comintern to an increasing degree in the last seven years, has incapacitated forever for revolutionary leadership the greater part of the present Party cadres. These will have to be replaced from amongst the youth. Here lies one of the most important tasks of the Left Opposition: to educate the youth in the real spirit of revolutionary Marxism and Leninism.

The platform of the Left Opposition will surely attract the Communist youth. It is permeated through and through with the spirit of revolution. It clashes with and repels everything that is narrow, provincial, and nationalistic. It is the antithesis of opportunism. It forms a harmonious whole in which all questions are linked to the main question of world revolution. That is why it is entirely in accord with the bold and revolutionary spirit of militant youth. It is necessary to reach them with it. We must shatter the barriers of prejudice and deception built for years by the Lovestones and the Fosters.

We are marching forward. The bureaucratic walls are showing signs of decay. To continue our work more effectively among the youth we are now faced with the question of the formation of an organization of the Opposition youth as a faction of the Y.C.L. Its outlines can already be discerned. In due time it will become a reality on a national scale.

License for Shriners Clubs for Workers

An object lesson in the uses of capitalist laws can be gained by the working class in examining an event that has just taken place in Toronto.

An organization known as the Ancient Arabic Order of Noble Mystic Shriners annually holds a convention, each yearly convocation being celebrated in a different city. This year Toronto was chosen as the place of meeting, the main attraction no doubt being the alluring glimmer of sparkling beer and whiskey. The Shriners, as this organization is usually known, is a branch of the Masonic Order; to become a Mason one must have affluence, influence and money; to graduate from a Mason into a full-fledged shriner further affluence, influence and money are the pre-requisite.

The first day of the Convention finds Shriners bedecked in outrageous medieval costumes thronging the streets, bands roam around, and headed by mounted policemen processions march through the main thoroughfares disrupting traffic and dislocating the routine of the day. Throughout the three day convention these antics continue sporadically, and according to capitalist laws they violated practically every municipal traffic regulation. Were they arrested? No, nothing is mentioned, they are unheld and condoned by their paid servant, the chief of police. Disgraceful scenes are perpetrated in the open street, vagrancy and loitering laws are plentifully broken. Were they charged with committing breaches of the law? Certainly not, the Shriners are just frisky and besides "this is our convention and we have the freedom of the city," they say. The police put the telescope to the blind eye when breaches are committed. Bacchus reigns and prostitutes reap a golden harvest. Practically every law was broken (and how!). Was punishment meted out to these Shriners? Why, says Chief of Police Draper, the budding dictator, we all had the time of our lives, no laws were broken and everybody enjoyed himself.

A fitting climax to the convention was a "peace" parade in which hundreds of Legionnaires in full uniform, steel helmet and guns with fixed bayonets marched. The 1930 version of peace.

License for "Shriners", Clubbings for Workers

Now let us look at the other side of the picture. The Communist Party calls a meeting in a park where incidentally, even capitalist laws are hard to break. The mounted police are present here also, and the workers feel the clubs as proof of their presence. No speeches are allowed and workers are refused the right to assemble. What have they done? Why, says Draper, these Bolsheviks have committed sedition, are vagrants, scoundrels, etc., etc., and immediately places these charges against the workers.

An unemployed delegation is met at the City Hall by the same police who met the Shriners. But what a difference in manner of greeting! Welcome for the parasites; clubbings and arrests for the workers by whose means these parasites are enabled to live in luxury. But when a worker at an election meeting says "Long live the Indian Revolution" he is arrested and a sedition charge placed against him. And now an edict has been issued against the holding of workers' picnics.

These are common occurrences wherever capitalism prevails. The bourgeoisie rules; they can do anything they please, they are the masters. Laws are made to impose upon the workers in case they become infected with "dangerous thoughts" resulting from a dangerous social system. Bosses make the laws, for use upon the workers.

In the face of the police terror in Toronto the Communist Party is unable to mobilize forces to combat it. With its "third period" tactics it is isolated, impotent. All healthy elements are strangled; the real Party slogan today is Stalinism, not Communism. The future lies in the hands of the Opposition and the correctness of its programme will be proven in the coming struggles.

APPEAL TO OUR READERS

Last week the Militant was compelled to omit publishing its regular number. Lack of funds made it impossible. The income of the Militant has been sharply affected by the intense unemployment and by the summer period which usually cuts down activities. The decrease in our income—never very high—has been a serious blow to the activities of the organization and to the Militant in particular.

The difficulties with the Militant are all the more harmful now, at a time when the Marxist truths it has been hammering home, against the greatest obstacles, have taken deep roots in the Communist and class conscious movement in this country. The living evidence of this is contained in the numerous statements of adherence to the Opposition made by rank and file and leading comrades of the Communist Party, which cannot forever be kept in a state of injurious ignorance by the prevailing regime of organized falsification.

The Opposition is growing, and the Militant must keep pace with it. Up to now, the financial support for the paper has been received largely from the members of the Communist League (Opposition) and their most direct sympathizers. The maintenance of the Weekly Militant by this small group has entailed some pretty heavy burdens in many cases.

It is imperative to maintain the Weekly! It is necessary to distribute this "burden"—one which we gladly assume as our elementary right and duty in the workers' movement—to broader sections of our readers. The existence and maintenance of a revolutionary labor journal is a precarious affair under the best of circumstances. At present, under multiplied difficulties, only the greatest sacrifices and solidarity can accomplish the task.

The National Committee of the Communist League (Opposition) decided to make an intensive drive for a $2,000.00 fund to maintain the Militant as a Weekly. A certain response has already been given. But it is far from sufficient. Much more money, forwarded at greater speed, is needed IMMEDIATELY!

The urgency of this appeal cannot be exaggerated. Money is needed NOW for the next issue, and the one thereafter. Upon the rapidity and generosity in the response to this appeal, depend the forthcoming numbers of the Militant.

The Supreme Court of California last week refused to recommend the release of Warren K. Billings, working class fighter who is serving a life sentence in the most notorious anti-labor frame-up that American history redolent with these crimes of capitalism has known for decades. Because Billings has been in prison before for his labor activities, the "governor cannot act on a pardon" until the Supreme Court makes a "favorable" recommendation.

A few days later, the Advisory Pardon Board of California handed in a recommendation to Governor Young against the pardon of Tom Mooney, the comrade of Billings, who was convicted together with the latter, allegedly for having thrown the bomb at the San Francisco Preparedness Day Parade in 1917, but in actuality, because his activities among the workers were a thorn in the side of the open shop magnates who have made "Sunny California" a hell for the workers.

In New York, at about the same time, the highest state Court of Appeals refused to act against the outrageous decision of the lower court in convicting and sentencing the leaders of the Communist Party, William Z. Foster, Robert Minor, I. Amter and H. Raymond who are serving terms for leading the unemployment demonstration in Union Square on March 6th.

The frame-up against Mooney and Billings is one of the most dastardly monstrosities of American capitalist class justice. In the 13 years of their imprisonment, exhaustive investigation has proved to the hilt that they were tried in the most prejudiced atmosphere and convicted on the basis of corrupted, perjured evidence, bought and paid for by the manufacturing and industrial interests of the State. One by one, the witnesses against the two militants were exposed as prostitutes, pimps, gamblers, drug addicts, forgers and similar types. The frame-up was so manifest that a commission appointed at one time by President Wilson revealed it publicly in all its criminal detail. Every development since then has only served to confirm Mooney's and Billings' innocence of every crime but that of having antagonized the California boss class.

Class conscious workers have pointed out for years that Mooney and Billings will be released only after a vigorous campaign of the workers to compel the jailors to open the prison doors. Liberal and socialist "friends" of the prisoners have, instead, sought to obtain their release by cringing before their jailors, by back-door dickering, by appeals to capitalist politicians. The false hopes raised in this manner have been shattered a dozen times, and once more today by the recent decisions.

Justice in capitalist courts is not meant for workers. We emphasize what we have constantly repeated: Mooney and Billings will be freed only by the mass pressure of the working class. Mooney was saved from hanging by the protest of labor. Labor can obtain his and Billings' freedom only by the same method. This holds true for the New York Communists, whose continued imprisonment is a blot on the working class movement and a burning indictment of capitalist class "justice".

The fight for the release of our class war prisoners is the fight of every worker of the whole labor movement. There is still time for the building of a broad, powerful mass movement of defense. The Left wing must initiate it and imbue it with spirit and determination. A united battle will defeat the jailors.

LOVESTONE'S SYMBOL

Gandhi, says Lovestone, is the "symbol of the revolutionary upsurge in India". Gandhi's closest lieutenant is Pandit Vallabhi Patel, president of the all-India National Congress. On July 6th the New York Times reported a speech of Patel's to the rich Parsee merchants of Bombay. And this is what this Lovestoneite "symbol of revolutionary upsurge" said:

"It has been suggested that the Parsees might lose all their wealth under swaraj, but instead of being millionaires as at present, you would all become multi-millionaires under swaraj."

Apparently imperialism abrogates the class struggle in the eyes of the Bucharins, Stalins, Roys and Lovestones but not in the eyes of the Chiang Kai Sheks, Patels and the good Parsees of Bombay.

CAPITALIST MURDER ON THE STREETS!

Three revolutionary workers murdered in one week. That is the toll taken by police savagery and reactionary labor thugs in New York City and Chicago.

In Chicago, Herzl Weizenberg, a member of the T.U.U.L., was set upon by gangsters of the Painters' Union bureaucracy because he was engaged in distributing leaflets for the Left wing group. The brutal scum of society, paid employees of the reactionary labor traitors, attacked comrade Weizenberg with brass knuckles, black jacks and lead pipes and left him in such a condition that he died a few hours later in the hospital.

In New York City, at a street meeting in Harlem of the Communist Party, the police came to the aid of the black chauvinists of the Garvey movement who had started to break up the Communist meeting. Wielding their clubs in a rabid frenzy, the blows fell thickest upon Alfred Levy, an unemployed member of the Party. The injuries he received at the hands of the police proved fatal.

Forty-eight hours had barely passed when the police claimed another victim. This time it was the Mexican worker Gonzalo Gonzales, also a member of the Communist Party who was shot down in cold blood by a policeman in Harlem for marching through the streets with a small group of workers on their way to an indoor meeting. Comrade Gonzales died an hour later.

The New York militancy responded to this outburst of barbaric police fury by an impressive funeral parade of more than five thousand workers, a united march of hundreds of Negro workers together with their white brothers, a symbol of the coming day of the revolutionary labor unity which the capitalist class seeks so desperately to hamper and destroy. The splendid march of the workers is only a beginning. A real struggle must now be begun—against police brutality, against the murder of the workers, and for the freedom of speech and assembly of workers.

Police Savagery

Why are the police so savage in their attacks on workers' meetings? There are thousands of gangsters engaged in the most nefarious work, openly, every day, in the city. Thirty thousand speak-easies run with cynical disregard for capitalist law. Corruption, bribery, speculation run rampant throughout the official administration. And the police are silent and inert as the tomb. But the activities of the labor movement, particularly of its revolutionary section, immediately arouse the uniformed thugs to mad activity; because the property, the wealth, the right to exploit and crush, the power of the boss class is endangered; because the threat rises of a working class aroused out of its lethargy and inspired to militant struggle. That is the function of the police: the suppression of the militancy of labor and the preservation of capitalist class power.

The awakening of thousands of workers under the influence of the economic crisis has impelled the police to more brutal activity. The working class must be kept in its place—the place of the underdog! The offensive against it must be sharpened on every front. Therefore, the most violent measures against the vanguard, the most militant section of the working class, the Communists. Break up their meetings! Raid their halls! Shoot down their fighters!

The attack on the whole working class is always started against its most conscious section. The capitalists and the value to the workers of the Communist movement, and its dangers to their class rule. They know that the Communists alone—not the bosses' agents in the trade unions or the middle class socialist party—seek to mobilize the workers for struggle against their misery. They hate the Communist Party and fear its potential strength—not because of the blundering and harum-scarum policies and leadership of the Party, but in spite of them.

Workers Stirred

The attack on the Communists is first blood drawn from the whole working class. The whole working class must therefore unite against this attack. It must present an iron front to the murderers of workers on the street. The workers have been profoundly stirred by these slaughters. The workers must actively resist the disruption of labor meetings.

The Communist Party must strike back at the police thugs and their masters with the weapon of the united front—the organized power of labor. We do not speak here of the paltry frauds, the hollow, self-deceptive "united fronts" that have been practiced recently by the official Party. We urge instead a genuine united movement of all the progressive workers and their organizations to batter down the police terror, to fight militantly for that which is being taken from labor so violently: free speech, free assembly and free press.

Such a movement and such slogans can make powerful reply to the blue-coated murderers and their capitalist employers. The creation of such a movement will proceed from the elimination of the Party's official phrase-mongering, meaningless to the masses of workers and incapable of setting them in motion.

The Crisis in the Communist Movement

New Party Forces Continue to Join the Communist Opposition

JERRY HILL FOR THE OPPOSITION

Jerry Hill is a young Negro worker who was elected an alternate member of the National Executive Committee at the last convention of the Young Communist League. He joined the Y.C.L. in 1925 and did Negro work in Jacksonville and Springfield in 1927-28. Comrade Hill was elected a delegate to the Fifth National Convention of the Y. C. L. held in New York City in 1929. He is working at present in Springfield.

I agree with and endorse "Back to Lenin" the manifesto of the Communist League of America (Opposition) which points out correctly the crisis in the Comintern and the American Party.

The Comintern has revised the fundamental principles of Leninism, especially on the question of Building Socialism in One Country. Leninism is internationalism and the theory of "socialism in one country" is impossible in an epoch of world economy. The Chinese Revolution, the British General Strike and the United Front tactic failed because of the wrong policies of the Right-Centrism leadership in the Comintern.

The present objective situation in America—the Wall Street crash—the Atlanta situation—the white terror in the form of lynching Negroes in Sherman, Honey Grove and Bryan, Texas; all offers the Party a great opportunity to organize the workers. But due to incorrect policies and lame and impotent leadership the Party is not only losing ground daily but also it has utterly failed to organize and defend the working class. This condition is especially shown in the Southern Illinois district. Although thousands of coal miners are unemployed and tenant farmers being driven from their homes, practically no work is being carried on, especially among the Negroes living in Southern Illinois. Thousands of Negroes live in Springfield, Peoria, East St. Louis and Rockford yet no effort at all is being made to carry on work among them. The Party must begin to carry work in this so-called "great Abe Lincoln" state upon such burning issues as; Jim-crowism, barring Negroes from mines, factories, unions, theatres and municipal bathing pools. The Party must also fight against the white chauvinism that exists among the Party members as for instance at West Frankfort during the last National Miners Union strike.

The "self-determination for Negroes" theory* of the Party is incorrect because the American Negro is part and parcel of the American working class and not a colonially oppressed people. This theory in America leads away from class consciousness to race consciousness and ultimately into the swamp of white chauvinism.

The Young Communist League in general reflects the failures and mistakes of the Party and further shows the bankruptcy of the Stalinist leadership.

The International Opposition, under the leadership of comrade Leon Trotsky adheres to the fundamental principles of Leninism and the Left Opposition is the true bearer of the International Proletarian Revolution. The unity of the Comintern and the American Party on the line of Leninism is the need of the hour. Therefore, I, as member of the Young Communist League, demand that the first step in this direction must be the reinstatement into the Party of the Left Opposition and comrade Leon Trotsky under whose leadership the Red Army was organized and the October Revolution made victorious and who is today the foremost teacher of World Communism.

—JERRY HILL

* The question of the slogan referred to by comrade Hill was left by the national conference of the Communist League to the discussion and elaboration by the organization.—Eds.

The 7th Convention of the Party - a Debacle

The seventh convention of the C. P. U. S. A. will take its place as one of the most lamentable in the history of American Communism. The current economic crisis constitutes a more powerful indictment of American capitalism and its tinsel "prosperity", than the arguments of a thousand theses. The lash of hunger curves about the bodies of millions of unemployed. In their conference rooms the financiers weave schemes for the reduction of the workers' existence levels. Yet in this crisis the Party claiming to be the revolutionary vanguard reveals a shallowness of political thought, a pettiness of spirit and impotence in action that bring malicious satisfaction to every enemy of our movement. In speaking of the Party, we draw a sharp line of distinction between the membership and the bureaucracy. Where criticism on all but secondary issues is stigmatized immediately as Right or Left "opportunism" and invites expulsion, the bulk of the rank and file still prefer silence. The convention was a formality—the theses had already been drafted and adopted in Moscow.

The New Zig-Zag of Centrism

In substance these theses illustrate all the characteristic features of centrism. Who does not remember Molotov's formulation of the period at the Tenth Plenum as "we have entered with both feet into the realm of revolutionary events". Regardless of time or space, the "third period" strategy of the imminent revolutionary crisis was uniformly applied to all countries. When Stalin's ultra-Left caricature of collectivization and the Five Year Plan brought the Soviet Union to the brink of disaster, the bureaucracy, sounded a panicky retreat and unloaded responsibility for the "excesses" on the ranks. In the Comintern, Stalin's agent, Remmele blamed the membership for the extravagances of the theory of "social fascism".

Accordingly, the Party statement on the convention condemns as "Leftist" those who do not recognize the cyclical character of the economic crisis. The Daily Worker wakes up to the fact that the struggle for social insurance is one of the foremost Party tasks in connection with the unemployment situation. But eclectic substitution for Marxist analysis still prevails. In the same breath, the theses state that "a revolutionary upsurge grips the masses". In the United States? Where, how, when? Only in the lurid headlines of the Daily Worker nonchalantly lying that "thousands of miners have gone out in a mass strike against unemployment". How can a really correct line of political action result from such confusion and self-contradiction.

Consider M. Olgin's report of the convention. Olgin is one of the present ideological Party leasers and editor of the most widely circulated Party organ. In an article in the Freiheit (July 3rd) he calls for a militant alliance between white and black workers "...to lead to a democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants" (our emphasis)—and this not for China or India but for the greatest imperialist power on earth. In other words, the coming revolution in America is not to be proletarian and socialist but bourgeois and democratic. Either the man knows what he is talking about or he is an imbecile. In either case he should be expelled from a Bolshevik-Leninist party.

Bureaucracy versus Bolshevism

This convention in the United States was a pocket edition of the Sixteenth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Both were simply rallies of the Centrist faction. While Stalin indulged his coarse witticisms amid the Bonapartist adulation of his apparatus pretorian guard, hundreds of Left Oppositionists were being arrested and rushed into solitary confinement and concentration camps in Siberia. Similarly in the U. S. we can record the biggest wave of adherents to our opposition movement since its formation after the Sixth Congress. The bureaucrats cannot stifle the Bolsheviks. Fresh cadres are maturing. We will continue our struggle for the Comintern against both Right and Centrists misleaders.

We shall yet have occasion to recur to the plenum of the Lovestone faction which met about the same time. It is the Lovestones in the Comintern who are jointly responsible with Stalin for the Menshevik corruption of the program and policies of the Communist International. Good elements though there are in the ranks of the group, the Lovestone leadership is the same old self-styled "Marxian trunk". Albert Weisbord criticized the Lovestone misrepresentations of the position of Trotsky on the international questions, the failure to protest the deportation, and the assassination of Blumkin. In answer, B.D. Wolfe came across with the same old fallaciousities about Trotsky's alleged "sectarianism", "conditional defence of the U.S.S.R.", "advocacy of Thermidor" (sic)! Lovestone has persuaded the group to "broaden out". He is prepared to admit all tendencies—"even Trotskyites"—under the hegemony of the "Marxian trunk," of course. The gap between Lovestone and Bolshevism widens.

FORMER N. M. U. HEAD FOR LEFT GROUP

The Letter of comrade Watt brings to the Opposition one of the best fighters among the American miners. In the Communist movement for many years, he was a leader in the Left wing fight against John L. Lewis. He was the first president of the National Miners Union. His opposition to the bureaucratic, mechanical tactics of the Stalinists was sufficient to cause his arbitrary removal from the union and expulsion from the Party.

Springfield, Ill.

I attended a very good meeting here in Springfield which was addressed by comrade Max Shachtman, Tuesday, May 24th, in which he explained the program of the Left Opposition, his meeting with comrade Trotsky and the preliminary Congress of the Left Opposition in Paris. Comrade Shachtman also dealt very effectively with the glaring errors of the Stalinite group in the various trade union and new union movements, dealing separately with their maneuvers, wrong policies, idiotic schemes and phrase mongering in the Needle trades, textile and mining unions.

To me it was a treat, for not only has it been sometime since I have heard officially of the happenings in the other industries of this country, but also his lecture on the world conditions was clear and free from the exaggerations so commonly used by the Stalinite press, which only serve as their purpose the further muddling of the worker.

Comrade Shachtman was honored (?) by having in his meeting a few Party members, who by their exhibitions of ignorance on fundamental questions facing the Party and the new unions, their Stalinite traits of exaggerations, vilification and slander, made it easy for Shachtman to show to the honest workers in attendance the hypocrisy and sham that has destroyed the Communist Party in the mining fields of Illinois and how impossible it is for the Party under such leadership ever again to lead the workers. One glimpse at the Stalinists present, at their scowling faces, their inexperience in the economic or political phases of the struggle, and the traps they made for themselves and fell into when comrade Shachtman gave them the privilege of asking questions and permitting them to answer, was enough to show to the audience why there is no miners union of the National Miners Union in Illinois, much less any Party branches.

The meeting was significant in several respects. The audience was composed of workers, some coming from many miles to hear the message of the Opposition. We were deeply interested in the program and the also had one colored comrade present who rest of the audience was made up of real progressive elements in the labor movement. It showed the possibilities of again recruiting the progressives and again taking the lead in the struggles now going on. It showed that the workers are interested in the cause of the Opposition, for those workers sat some three hours, very attentive to comrade Shachtman and I predict that from this meeting will develop a strong group for the Opposition, and that the Opposition will be heard from in the coal fields of Illinois.

Personally, it also proved one thing to me, and that was that I have remained too quiet under the lying statements that have been broadcast by the Stalin group in regards to my activities connected with the National Miners Union. I have decided now that I shall issue a statement dealing in detail with my experiences with these Stalinites from the time I got into the movement. This will be illuminating and instructive especially to the mine workers and the Communists and other progressives who have felt the iron heel of these bankrupt "third period", phrase mongering bureaucrats.

The Rank and File of Newark Speaks Out

The Worker-Communists in the ranks of the official Party are moving towards the Left Opposition in spite of all the abuse, slander, and suppression practised by the blind Party bureaucracy! This is manifest from the statements of adhesion to our platform which have been appearing in the last few issues of the Militant, and which we expect to continue for some time. The "liquidated Trotskyists" are on the march and nothing can prevent the victory of their ideas. In addition to the statements of support reproduced in other parts of this issue, we are glad to print the following letter from a young rebel in Newark, N.J. It is indicative of the process of development that is taking place inside the Party:

Φ

Newark, N. J.

Since the split in the Communist Party and the expulsion of the comrades of the Communist League (Opposition) I have tried to get the real facts of what caused the split. I did not know much about Communism at that time as I only joined the Young Communist League a month before the split. But since then, after reading between the lines, I seem to agree with your line much more than I do with the present Y.C.L. and C.L. line. You seem to think that you have no sympathetic workers in the Party and League. But let me tell you that here in Newark, N.J., the question of the Opposition is discussed very often among Party and League members, but not at meetings. I often try to bring this question up at Young Communist League meetings, but every time I am threatened with expulsion. I am not the only one, there are a few other League members who try to get the real facts of the split, but they are also threatened. They even went so far as suspending one League comrade for a month. Some of our League members received the Militant. They read it with great enthusiasm. Right around the corner of the Communist Party headquarters a newsstand used to sell the Militant. But no more, since they were threatened that they would get their stand broke up. I wish you would do something about this if you can.

If you would only do some work here I am sure that you could win both the Party and the League and establish a Communist League branch right here in this city. Do not make my name public yet —X.Y.

Aftermath of Needle Trades Convention

3. Tactics and Slogans for the Left Wing Struggle

By JAMES P. CANNON

It is high time to restate the fundamental tactics of Bolshevism on the trade union question and organize the struggle against their revision. The future of the Left wing in the American labor movement—and the future of the Communist Party—hinges on this issue. The decision of the convention of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union against the formation of a Left wing inside the old unions of the industry strengthens the grip of the reactionary leaders on these unions and thus strengthens the grip of the bosses on the workers. The nucleus of the Communist Opposition which is taking shape in the union, has for its first and most insistent duty the organization of a struggle to change this decision. Life itself will smash the decision, but the Communist militants must hasten the process in order that the least possible harm for the Left wing movement will result.

The building of the new industrial union and the organization of a fighting Left wing in the old unions are not contradictory tasks. They are two sides of the same task and are indissolubly bound together. The slogans and methods for the conduct of this two-sided struggle require explanation and discussion. This is all the more necessary since the convention failed to give a proper lead, and the document issued by the Lovestoneites at the convention is a typical product of opportunist straddling and half measures.

The policy adopted at the convention of the industrial union deals a double blow against the Left wing movement in the needle trades. On the one hand it forcibly tears away the more advanced and revolutionary elements from organizational contact with the masses of workers in the old unions. On the other hand it brings about a split in the ranks of the Left wing. In both of these consequences the policy runs counter to the basic line of Bolshevik tactics.

In the Amalgamated, which has a firm grip on the men's clothing section of the industry and where membership in the union is tied up with the question of a job, the new policy encounters insuperable difficulties from the start; and these difficulties will accumulate if any serious effort is made to enforce the policy. It will soon be demonstrated there that the workers who are willing to sacrifice their living in order to justify the stupidity of the Party are few. In the Cap and Millinery Union the new policy has already hit the rocks. The attempt to enforce the decision of the convention has split the Left wing of the New York blockers' local of this union in the middle.

The developments in the blockers' local are very instructive and they are symptomatic of what is to follow on a broader scale. In this local of 1,500 workers, constituting about fifty per cent of the workers in the trade in New York, the bloc of the Left wing and progressive forces has constituted a strong minority. The instructions to join the new Industrial Union have met with a categorical refusal on the part of all the Left wing and progressive elements except a handful of Party members. Let the Communist workers take heed of this situation in the blockers' local, it is a warning of what will happen everywhere.

Can a Left Wing Be Organized in the Old Unions

Is it possible under the present conditions to organize a strong Left wing in the old unions of the needle trades? Now more than ever. The program which the Party leadership forced on the Industrial Union convention, in arguing against it, cites the destruction of standards won in years of struggle and the failure of the Right wing officialdom to defend the interests of the workers at any point. The answer is: just because this is so, just because the conditions of the workers grow more and more intolerable and the treachery of the Right wing bureaucrats becomes more clearly manifest, the soil becomes more favorable for the organization and rapid development of a broad Left wing movement within the old unions. The bureaucrats are powerless to prevent it. The only real obstacle is the policy of the Party which has been imposed on the present Left wing forces in the industry. And—so loudly do all the circumstances cry out for such an organized movement in the old unions not even the Party can hold it back for long. If not with the official Party then without it for the time being, it must and will be organized.

The nucleus of needle trades Communists now crystallizing under our banner have the duty to take the lead in this struggle and show the way, regardless of the decisions of the Party bureaucrats to the contrary.

The Program of Demands

The first and most important step in this direction is the formulation of a concrete program of economic demands and a vigorous agitation for them within the old unions. This is the Achilles heel of the Right wing regime and there is nothing they can do to prevent a sympathetic response to such an agitation in the ranks of the membership. The more they join hands with the bosses against the workers, the more they collaborate with them in robbing the workers of their standards the more do they create the conditions for a movement of revolt against them on the basis of our economic demands.

Every attempt on the part of the Right wing fakers to throttle this agitation will strengthen the position of the Left wing for the advocacy of another powerful slogan, the slogan of democracy in the unions. In view of the narrow, bureaucratic and arbitrary practices which have been smuggled into the administration of the new industrial union itself, it may be thought that this slogan is out of date. Nothing could be further from such an assumption. Those who hold it reckon without the workers and their deep-rooted impulse for self-governing organizations, one of the truest impulses of the advanced elements of the class. Not for nothing has been the long schooling of the needle trades workers in trade union organization: not in vain the historic struggles of the Left wing for this slogan of the rank and file. The sentiment for trade union democracy, developed and strengthened in these long struggles, is not dead. Given a sensible policy and leadership, this sentiment will reassert itself and be a source of power for the new Left wing struggle in the old unions.

Does the policy of re-opening the fight in the old unions imply any reconciliation with the traitorous and bribed officials of these unions, as the soft-headed experts of the "third period" say? Just the opposite. It means the elevation of Left wing fight from phrase-mongering futility into action which will animate the Left wing movement with a new vitality. We do not speak in favor of a tip-toe activity in the old unions by grace of the fakers, but an open, militant and ruthless war to exterminate them and all their influence. This means to expose and denounce them before the workers on the basis of every concrete act of betrayal which they commit from day to day. It means to explain theoretically and practically their role as agents of the bosses and to imbue the workers with a deathless hatred for them. The constitution of a new Left wing movement within the old unions, uniting its struggle with that of the militants in the new industrial union, means to enter on another stage in the fight to cleanse the needle trades movement of the reactionary labor lieutenants of the employing class.

The Tactics of the United Front

The fourth important phase of Left wing strategy is the revival of the tactics of the united front and the slogan of trade union unity. The slogan of unity has power to move the masses. It corresponds to the necessities of their struggle and to their own inmost convictions, born of tragic experience in splits and defeats. The Left wing must raise again the slogan of unity in the new union and in the old ones. It must explain to the workers over and over again that it is the Right wing reactionaries who bring division and split into the labor movement and that it is the Left wing which fights for unity. The Left wing must prove this in its daily policy because words alone are not enough; it is deeds which convince. The Left wing in the needle trades took shape, grew and became consolidated in battle under the slogan of unity. The abandonment of the slogan has been accompanied by a weakened organization and a dwindling influence. The revival of the slogan now is necessary to turn the helm and change the course toward new victories for the Left wing and for the masses of the workers.

A general phrase about unity means nothing. What is required is a precise formulation for the concrete circumstances. The Party's talk about unity is good for nothing because it goes hand in hand with a policy of split. The workers are not as dumb as the bureaucrats think and they are not so easily fooled by words which are contradicted by deeds. The slogan put forth by the Lovestoneite faction—a typical production of opportunist generality and evasion—is no better. This shoddy crew, trying to capitalize the sentiment for unity in the old unions and fearing to offend the sectarian patriotism of the members of the new union, has issued the slogan: "Fight for one industrial union in the industry!" What does that mean? Like all the slogans of the opportunists it means anything you like. As to how it is to be realized, how it is to be put concretely in the new union and in the old unions—this is left to guess work and interpretation.

The Slogan of Unity

The Opposition Communists in the needle trades cannot trifle with double-meaning slogans. Their aim is to clarify the issues, not to attract the workers with catch-words. They are duty bound to act in the spirit of Lenin, who said: "Argue about tactics but give clear slogans!" Therefore they must formulate the slogan of unity with such precision that there can be no misunderstanding about it. The Stalinists propose to achieve "unity" by having the 175,000 workers in the Right wing unions withdraw from them individually and join the six or seven thousand members in the new industrial union. This is absurd. The Lovestoneites formulate the slogan so that it can be interpreted one way when they are under the attacks of the Stalinists in the new union and the opposite way when they are under the attack of the officials in the old unions. This is misleading; this is playing with issues according to the time-honored practice of these unprincipled opportunists.

In our opinion the slogan of unity should be formulated as follows: "Unite the old unions with the new industrial union into a single organization for the entire industry!" The slogan, thus formulated, should be raised in direct connection with the other slogans mentioned above regarding the fight for economic demands, trade union democracy and the elimination of the Right wing leaders. It should be issued by the new industrial union and by the organized Left wing in the old unions in precisely the same way and would be the most important means of uniting their struggles into one, along the front of the entire industry. The two sections of the Left wing, working in different fields of organization, would thereby be bound together into a single ideological force. From this organizational coordination of the joint struggle would follow.

On this basis both sections of the Left wing would bound forward in the confidence of the workers, and each section—the new union in the sphere of the unorganized and the reorganized Left wing in the old unions—would expand its organization. There is no contradiction in such a perspective. The two lines of activity supplement and strengthen each other. The existence of the new union as a growing force would constitute a standing threat to the bureaucrats of the Right wing unions against mass expulsions. In fear of the new union they will be compelled to hesitate and temporize with a Left wing in their own organizations, and allow it a certain room for development. On the other hand, a desperate fear of the movement within the Right wing unions, driving the officials to mass expulsions and splits again would bring new forces to swell the ranks of the industrial union, not handfuls of Communists as will be the case under the present policy but masses of workers who would impart to the new union the character of a mass organization.

The Question of "Reforming" the Old Unions

Against our proposals and perspective there remains a question of last resort for the Stalinist tacticians: "Is it possible to reform the old unions and transform them into genuine organs of the class struggle?" The Stalinists have answered this question in the negative and thereby disposed of it as far as they are concerned. As for us this schematic formulation has no meaning. We do not advise the Left wing workers to waste their time in speculation as to the possibilities of a "legal" conquest of the apparatus of the old unions. Experience in the needle trades struggle has already provided a certain answer on this point. When we speak of a conquest of the old unions we do not think in terms of the offices, the buildings and the banks. We think of the 175,000 workers in these unions and we say they can and they will be won for the revolutionary banner. When we proclaim the slogan of uniting the old unions with the new industrial union in a single organization we do not promise that this unity will be legally confirmed by the reactionary leaders with a voluntary abdication. But our slogan of unity is nevertheless a sincere one and it is put forward with confidence that it will be realized. With a correct policy and a competent leadership the Left wing will win over the masses and unite them—if not all, then the great majority—into one union. Let the reactionaries think of the unions in terms of contracts with the bosses, offices, buildings and banks. Let us think of the unions in terms of the workers within them. This conception will guide us toward the slogan and tactics of victory.

First Henri Barbusse - Is Michael Gold Next?

A number of weeks ago, we printed the correspondence of comrade Pierre Naville, of Paris, on the fate of Henri Barbusse, intellectual valet of the Stalinist regime, and his literary journal of pseudo-Communist confusionism, Monde. We announced then that the sale of Monde had been prohibited in the Soviet Union (for three months now) and that the bureaucracy of the Party was getting ready to unload Barbusse. We asked then why a journal which is prohibited in the Soviet Union is recommended as good revolutionary literature to the members of the French Communist Party in particular and the workers in general.

A reply of sorts has finally appeared in the French edition of the International Press Correspondence (No. 46, page 544), addressed to Barbusse by the so-called "International Bureau of Revolutionary Literature" which says:

"In a period of sharpened struggle, you, comrade, edit and publish under your name a journal by which there is emptied into the masses who have confidence in you the opportunist doctrine of the calumniators and enemies of the U.S.S.R. This journal which has no proletarian line, spreads ideological confusion in the masses, extremely detrimental in the present period...Are you with us in our struggle or against us? The only reply to our question will be the radical change of the line of the paper edited by you, or the withdrawal of your name from it. An evasive reply cannot be given in the present period."

All well and good—particularly if we bear in mind that the belated critics of Citizen Barbusse are precisely the same people who lauded him to the skies, started his paper Monde, and set it up as the model for all other "proletarian literary" journals to follow.

As is well known, the American prototype of Monde is the New Masses, under the ideological aegis of Michael Gold, Walt Carmon, Earl Browder and other prominent proletarian poets. The New Masses continues to publish advertisements for Monde, which—we repeat—has been prohibited in the U.S.S.R. The same New Masses fearfully rejects advertisements for the Militant or for any of comrade Trotsky's books. Like Monde, columns are open to every confusionist and dilletante hanging on to the fringes of the revolutionary movement, but not to the Left wing of that movement. They fear to anger the Stalinist commissar whose literary footmen they are, and the millionaire banker, Otto H. Kahn, patron of "proletarian art" and of Citizen Gold, the pallid devourer of Trotsky and Oppositionists.

M. Barbusse played the same role for a while. The Stalinists have now rid themselves of that embarrassing baggage. Were Gold one-tenth the sage in politics he imagines himself, he ought to be able to read handwriting when it is written on the wall.

Remember the days of "prosperity" when labor banking, was all the rage among the "constructive statesmen of labor?" Yet another "labor bank" has had to close its doors—this time the largest of its kind in the country (the Botheholds of Railway Clerks National Bank) as a result of the $1,000,000 kiting operations.

THE REVOLUTION IN INDIA

By L. D. TROTSKY

India is the classic colonial country as England is the classic metropolis. All the viciousness of the ruling classes, every form of oppression that capitalism has applied against the backward peoples of the East is most completely and frightfully summed up in the history of the gigantic colony on which the British imperialists have settled themselves like leeches to drink its blood for the past century and a half. The English bourgeoisie has diligently fostered every remnant of barbarism, every institution of the Middle Ages which could be of service in the oppression of man by man. It forced its feudal agents to adapt themselves to colonial capitalist exploitation to become its links, its organs, its convoys to the masses. The British imperialists boast of their railroads, their canals and industrial enterprises in India in which they have invested close to four billion gold dollars. Apologists for imperialism triumphantly compare present day India with what it was prior to colonial occupation. But who can doubt for a moment that a gifted nation of 320,000,000 people would develop immeasurably quicker and more successfully were it freed from the burden of systematic and organized plunder? It is enough to recall the four billion gold dollars which represent the British investment in India to imagine what England extracts from India in the course of only some five or six years.

Allowing India carefully weighed doses of technique and culture, exactly enough to facilitate the exploitation of the riches of the country, the Shylock of the Thames could not however prevent the ideas of economic and national independence and freedom from penetrating more and more widely into the masses.

Just as in the older bourgeois countries, the various racial stocks that exist in India can only be fused into a nation by means of a binding political revolution. But in contradistinction to the older countries, this revolution in India is a colonial revolution directed against foreign oppressors. Besides this, it is the revolution of a historically belated nation in which the relations of feudal serfdom, caste divisions and even slavery exist alongside of the class antagonisms of the bourgeoisie and proletariat which have grown greatly in the last period.

Social Antagonisms in India

The colonial character of the Indian revolution against one of the most powerful oppressors masks to a certain extent the internal social antagonisms of the country, particularly to the eyes of those to whom such masking is advantageous. In reality the necessity of throwing off the system of imperialist oppression which, with all its roots intertwined with the old Indian exploitation, demands the greatest revolutionary effort on the part of the Indian masses and by that itself assures a gigantic swing of the class struggle. British imperialism will not abandon its positions voluntarily; while dropping its tail before America, it will direct the remains of its energy and its resources against insurgent India.

What an instructive historical lesson it is that the Indian revolution, even in its present stage, when it has not yet broken loose from the treacherous leadership of the national bourgeoisie, is being crushed by the "socialist" government of MacDonald. The bloody repressions of these scoundrels of the Second International who promise to introduce socialism peacefully in their own home countries represent so far that small deposit which British imperialism brings in today on its future accounting in India. The sweet social democratic deliberations about reconciling the interests of bourgeois England with democratic India are a necessary supplement to the bloody repressions of MacDonald, who is of course ready, between executions, for the thousand and first commission of reconciliation.

The British bourgeoisie understands too well that the loss of India would not only mean the crash of its sufficiently rotted world power but also a social collapse in its own metropolis. It is a struggle of life and death. All forces will be set in motion. This means that the revolution will have to mobilize irresistible energy. The many-millioned mass has already begun to stir. They showed their half-blind force to such an extent that the national bourgeoisie was compelled to come out of its passivity and master the movement in order to break the edge of the revolutionary sword. Gandhi's passive resistance is the tactical knot that combines the naivete and self-denying blindness of the disunited and petty bourgeois masses with the treacherous manoeuvres of the liberal bourgeoisie. The fact that the chairman of the Indian Legislative Assembly that is, the official organ of the machinations with imperialism, gave up his post to head the movement for the boycott of English goods, is of a deeply symbolic character. "We will prove to you," say the national bourgeoisie to the gentlemen on the Thames, "that we are indispensable for you, that without us you will not calm the masses; but for this we will present you with our own bill."

The Jailing of Gandhi

By way of reply, MacDonald puts Gandhi in jail. It is possible that the lackey goes further than the master intends, being conscientious beyond reason in order to justify his faith. It is possible that the Conservatives, serious and experienced imperialists, would not at the present stage go so far with repressions. But on the other hand the national leaders of the passive opposition are themselves in need of repression as support for their considerably shaken reputations. MacDonald does them this service. While shooting down workers and peasants, he arrests Gandhi with an abundance of forewarning such as the Russian provisional government used to arrest the Kornilovs and Denikins.

If India is a component element in the internal rule of the British bourgeoisie, then on the other hand, the imperialist rule of British capital over India is a component element of the internal order of India. The question cannot at all be reduced to one of the mere expulsion of some tens of thousands of foreign exploiters. They cannot be separated from the internal oppressors and the harder the internal oppressors and the harder the pressure of the masses will become the less will the latter want to separate. Just as in Russia the liquidation of Czarism together with its indebtedness to world finance capital became possible only because to the peasantry the abolition of the monarchy grew out of the abolition of the land-owning magnates, to the same degree also in India the struggle with imperialist oppressions grows out of the countless masses of the oppressed and semi-pauperized peasantry, out of the necessity of liquidating the feudal landlords, their agents and intermediaries, the "chinovniks" and sharks.

The Indian peasant wants a "just" distribution of land. That is the basis of democratism. And this is at the same time the social basis of the democratic revolution as a whole.

At the first stages of their struggle the ignorant, inexperienced and disunited peasantry which, in single villages, opposes the individual representatives of the hated regime, always resorts to passive resistance. It does not pay rent, does not pay taxes, it escapes to the woods, or deserts from military service, etc. The Tolstoyan formulae of passive resistance were in a sense the first stages of the revolutionary awakening of the peasant masses. Gandhi does the same in regards to the masses of the Indian people. The more "sincere" he is personally, the more useful he is for the owners as an instrument for the disciplining of the masses. The support of the bourgeoisie for peaceful resistance to imperialism is only a preliminary condition for its bloody resistance to the revolutionary masses.

From passive forms of struggle, the peasantry has more than once in history passed over to the severest and bloodiest wars against their direct enemies: the land owners, the authorities and the loan sharks. The middle Ages were full of such peasant wars in Europe; but they are also full of merciless suppression of peasant wars. Passive resistance of the peasantry as well as its bloody uprisings can be turned into a revolution only under the leadership of the urban class which thus becomes the leader of the revolutionary nation and after the victory—the bearers of the revolutionary power. In the present epoch such a class can be only the proletariat, even in the Orient.

It is true that the Indian proletariat occupies a smaller numerical place in the composition of the population than even the Russian proletariat on the eve of 1905 and 1917. This comparatively small size of the proletariat was the main argument of all the phillistines, all the Martinovs, all the Mensheviks against the perspective of the permanent revolution. They considered fantastic the very thought that the Russian proletariat, thrusting the bourgeois aside, would take hold of the agrarian revolution of the peasantry, would give it a bold swing, and rise on its wave to the revolutionary dictatorship. Therefore they considered realistic the hope that the liberal bourgeoisie, leaning on the masses of the city and village, would complete the democratic revolution. But it turned out that their social statistics of the population are far from measuring the economic or the political role of single classes. The October revolution, by experience has proved this once and for all and very convincingly.

The "Only" Missing Condition

If today the Indian proletariat is numerically weaker than the Russian this in itself does not at all pre-determine the smaller swing of its revolutionary possibilities, just as the numerical weakness of the Russian proletariat compared to the American and English was no hindrance to the dictatorship of the proletariat in Russia. On the contrary all those social peculiarities which made possible and unavoidable the October revolution are present in India in a still sharper form. In this country of poor peasants, the hegemony of the city has no less a clear character than in czarist Russia. The concentration of industrial, commercial and banking power in the hands of the big bourgeoisie, primarily the foreign bourgeoisie, on the one hand; a swift growth of a sharply defined proletariat, on the other, exclude the possibility of an independent role of the petty bourgeoisie of the city and to an extent, the intellectual and transform by this the political mechanics of the revolution into a struggle of the proletariat with the bourgeoisie for the leadership of the peasant masses. So far there is "only" one condition missing: a Bolshevik Party. And that is where the problem lies now.

We were witnesses to the way the leadership of Stalin and Bucharin carried out the Menshevik conception of the democratic revolution in China. Armed with a powerful apparatus, this leadership had the possibility of applying the Menshevik formulae in deeds and by that alone was compelled to carry them to a conclusion. In order best to secure the leading role of the bourgeoisie in the bourgeois revolution (this is the basic idea of Russian Menshevism) the Stalinist bureaucracy transformed the young Communist Party of China into a subordinate section of the national-bourgeois party. In connection with that, according to the terms officially arrived at between Stalin and Chiang Kai-Shek (through the intermediary of the present People's Commissar of Education, Bubnov), the Communists had no right to occupy more than one-third of the posts within the Kuo Min Tang. The party of the proletariat this way entered the revolution as an official captive of the bourgeoisie with the blessings of the C.I. The result is known: the Stalinist bureaucracy slew the Chinese revolution. History has never known a political crime equal in extent to this one.

For India, just as for all countries of the Orient in general, Stalin advanced in 1924 simultaneously with the reactionary idea of socialism in one country, the no less reactionary idea of "dual composition worker and peasant parties". This was another formula for the same rejection of independent policy and of an independent party of the proletariat. The unfortunate Roy has ever since that time become the apostle of the super-class and supra-class "peoples" or "democratic" party. The history of Marxism, the development of the nineteenth century, the experience of the three Russian revolutions—everything, everything passed for these gentlemen without leaving a trace. They have not yet understood that the "worker-peasant party" is conceivable only in the form of a Kuomintang, that is in the form of a bourgeois party leading behind itself the workers and peasants in order later on to betray and crush them. History has not yet invented another type of a supra-class, or intra-class party. After all, not in vain was Roy the agent of Stalin in China, the prophet of the struggle against "Trotskyism", the executor of the Martinovist "bloc of four classes", in order to become the ritualistic scape-goat for the crimes of the Stalinist bureaucracy after the inevitable defeat of the Chinese revolution. Six years passed in India in weakening and demoralizing experiments with the realization of the Stalinist prescription for the two-class worker-peasant parties. The results are at hand: impotent, provincial "worker-peasant parties", which waver, limp along or simply melt away and are reduced to nothing precisely at a moment when they are supposed to act, that is, at a moment of revolutionary tide. But there is no proletarian party. It must still be created in the fire of events and at that it will be first necessary to remove the garbage piled up by the leading bureaucracy. Such is the situation! Beginning with 1924, the leadership of the Comintern has done everything that could be done to render impotent the Indian proletariat, to weaken the will of the vanguard, and to clip its wings.

While Roy and the other Stalinist pupils were wasting precious years in order to elaborate a democratic program for a supra-class party, the national bourgeoisie utilized this dawdling to the maximum in order to seize the trade unions. If not politically, then in the trade unions, the Kuo Min Tang has been accomplished in India, true, with the difference that the creators have in the meantime become frightened by their own handiwork, and have jumped aside heaping slander on the "executors".

This time the Centrists jumped, as is known, to the "Left", but matters will not improve by this. The official position of the Comintern in the questions of the Indian revolution is such a tangled ball of yarn which is apparently intended especially to derail the proletarian vanguard and bring it to despair. At any rate, half of it goes on because the leadership strives constantly and willfully to conceal its mistakes of yesterday. The second half of the tangle must be credited to the hapless nature of Centrism.

We have in mind at present not the program of the Comintern which ascribes to the colonial bourgeoisie a revolutionary role, completely approving the constructions of Brandler and Roy who still continue to wear the Martinov-Stalin cloak. We also do not speak of the innumerable editions of the Stalinist "Questions of Leninism" where, in all the languages of the world, the discourse on the dual composition worker and peasant parties continues. No. We limit ourselves to the present, to today's latest posing of the question which is in conformity with the Third Period mistakes of the Comintern in the Orient.

The central slogan of the Stalinists for India, as well as for China, still remains the democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants. Nobody knows, nobody explains because nobody understands what this formula signifies at present, in the year 1930, after the experience of the past fifteen years. In what way is the democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants supposed to be distinguished from the dictatorship of the Kuo Min Tang which massacred the workers and peasants?

Its TASKS and its DANGERS

Manuiskys and Kuusinen will perhaps answer that they now talk about the dictatorship of three classes (workers peasants and the city petty bourgeoisie) and not four as it was in China where Stalin had so happily attracted to the bloc his ally, Chiang Kai-Shek.

If so, we reply, then make an effort to explain to us why you reject the national bourgeoisie in India, that is that ally for the rejection of whom in China you expelled Bolsheviks from the Communist Party and then imprisoned them? China is a semi-colonial country. In China, there is no powerful caste of feudal lords and feudal agents. But India is a classical colonial country with a mighty heritage of the feudal caste regime. If the revolutionary role of the Chinese bourgeoisie was deduced by Stalin and Martinov from the presence in China of foreign oppression and feudal remnants, then for India each of these reasons should hold with doubled force. This means that the Indian bourgeoisie, according to the exact basis of the program of the Comintern, has immeasurably more rights to demand its inclusion in the Stalinist bloc than the Chinese bourgeoisie with its unforgettable Chiang Kai-Shek and the "true" Wang Chin Wei. And if this is not so in spite of the oppression of British imperialism and the whole heritage of the Middle Ages, the Indian bourgeoisie is capable only of a counter-revolutionary and not a revolutionary role—then condemn mercilessly your treacherous policy in China and correct immediately your program in which this policy has left cowardly but sinister traces!

Who Will Lead the «Bloc»

But this does not exhaust the question. If in India you construct a bloc without the bourgeoisie and against the bourgeoisie, then who will lead it? The Manuiskys and Kuusinen will perhaps answer with their characteristically gentle ardor: "The proletariat, of course!" Good, we answer, it is quite complimentary. But if the Indian revolution will develop on a basis of a union of workers, peasants and the petty bourgeoisie; if this union will be directed not only against imperialism, feudalism, but also against the national bourgeoisie which is bound up with them in all basic questions; if at the head of this union will stand the proletariat, if this union comes to victory only by sweeping away the enemies through armed uprising and in this way raises the proletariat to the role of the real all-national leader—then the question arises: in whose hands will the power be after the victory if not in the hands of the proletariat? What is the significance in such a case of the democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants in distinction to the dictatorship of the proletariat leading the peasantry? In other words: in what way will the hypothetical dictatorship of the workers and peasants be distinguished in its type from the actual dictatorship which the October revolution established?

There is no reply to this question. There can be no reply to it. By this course of historical development the "democratic dictatorship" has become not only an empty fiction but a treacherous trap for the proletariat. That slogan is correct which admits the possibility of two diametrically opposed explanations: in the sense of the dictatorship of the Kuo Min Tang and in the sense of the October dictatorship! There can be nothing in between these two. In China, the Stalinists explained the democratic dictatorship twice, at first as a dictatorship of the Kuo Min Tang of the Right, and afterwards of the Left. But how do they explain it in India? They are silent. They are compelled to keep silent for fear of opening the eyes of their supporters to their crimes. This conspiracy of silence is actually a conspiracy against the Indian revolution. And all the present extremely Left or ultra-Left noise does not improve the situation one iota for the victories of the revolution are not secured by noise and clatter but by political clarity.

But what has been said does not yet unwind the tangled yarn. No. Here is precisely where new threads are twisted in. Giving the revolution an abstract character and permitting it to be the dictatorship of the proletariat only after some sort of a mystical or mystifying "democratic dictatorship" is established, our strategists at the same time reject the central political slogan of every revolutionary democratic movement, which is precisely the slogan of the Constituent Assembly. Why? On what basis? It is absolutely incomprehensible. The democratic revolution signifies equality to the peasant—above all equality in the distribution of land. On this is based the equality of rights. The Constituent Assembly, where the representatives of the whole people formally draw the balance with the past and the classes actually draw the balance with each other, is the natural and inevitable combination of the democratic tasks of the revolution not only in the consciousness of the awakening masses of the peasantry but also in the consciousness of the working class itself. We have spoken of this more fully with regard to China and we do not see here the necessity of repetition. Let us only add that the provincial multifariousness of India, the variegated governmental forms, and their no less variegated bond with the feudal caste relations, saturates the slogan of the Constituent Assembly in India with a particularly deep revolutionary democratic content.

The theoretician of the Indian revolution in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union at present is Safarov, who with the price of a happy capitulation transferred his injurious activities to the camp of Centrism. In a programmatic article in the Bolshevik about the forces and tasks of the revolution in India, Safarov carefully circles around the question of the Constituent Assembly just like an experienced rat circles around a piece of cheese on a hook. This sociologist does not by any means want to fall into the Trotskyist trap a second time. Disposing of the problem without much ceremony he counterposes to the Constituent Assembly such a perspective:

"The development of a new revolutionary ascent on the basis (!) of struggle for the proletarian hegemony leads to the conclusion (whom? how? why?—Ed.) that the dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry in India can be achieved only in the Soviet form." (Bolshevik, 1930, No. 5, page 100).

Amazing lines! Martinov multiplied by Safarov. Martinov we know and about Safarov Lenin said, not without tenderness: "Safarchik will go Leftist, Safarchik will pull boners." The above-mentioned Safarovist perspective does not invalidate this characterization. Safarov has gone considerably Leftist and it must be admitted that he did not upset the second half of Lenin's formula. To begin with, the question of the revolutionary ascent of the masses of the people develops "on the basis" of the struggle of the Communists for proletarian hegemony. The whole process is turned on its head. We think that the proletarian vanguard enters or is preparing to enter or should enter a struggle for hegemony on the basis of a new revolutionary ascent. The perspective of struggle, according to Safarov, is the dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry. Here, for the sake of Leftism, the word "democratic" is shaken off. But it is not said frankly what kind of a dual composition dictatorship this: a Kuo Min Tang or an October type. But for that we are assured on his word of honor that this dictatorship can be accomplished "only in the Soviet form". It sounds very noble. Why the slogan of the Constituent Assembly? Safarov is ready to agree only with the Soviet "form".

The essence of epigonism—its contemptible and sinister essence—lies in the fact that from the actual processes of the past and its lessons it abstracts only the bare form and converts it into a fetish. This is what has happened to the Soviets. Without saying anything about the class character of the dictatorship—a dictatorship of the bourgeoisie over the proletariat, like the Kuo Min Tang, or a dictatorship of the proletariat over the bourgeoisie, like the October?—Safarov lulls somebody and primarily himself, by the Soviet form of the dictatorship. As if the Soviets cannot be a weapon for deceiving the workers and peasants! What else were the Menshevik-Social Revolutionary Soviets of 1917? Nothing but, a weapon for the support of the power of the bourgeoisie and the preparation of its dictatorship. What were the social democratic Soviets in Germany and in Austria in 1918-1919? Organs for saving the bourgeoisie and for deceiving the workers. With the further development of the revolutionary movement in India, with the greater swing of mass struggles and with the weakness of the Communist Party—and the latter is inevitable with a Safarovist muddle prevailing in its mind—the Indian national bourgeoisie itself may create workers and peasants Soviets in order to direct them just as it now directs the trade unions, in order thus to slaughter the revolution as the German social democracy, by getting at the head of the Soviets slaughtered it. The treacherous character of the slogan of the democratic dictatorship lies in the fact that it does not close tightly to the enemies, once and for all, such a possibility.

The Apotheosis of Confusion

The Indian Communist Party, the creation of which was held back for six years—and what years!—is now deprived, in the circumstances of revolutionary democratic ascent, of one of the most important weapons for mobilizing the masses, precisely the slogan of the democratic Constituent Assembly. Instead of that, the young Party which has not yet taken its first steps is inflicted with the abstract slogan of Soviets as a form of abstract dictatorship, that is, a dictatorship of nobody knows what class. It is truly an apotheosis of confusion! And all this is accompanied as usual with disgusting coloring and sugaring of an as yet difficult and not in the least sweet situation.

The official press, particularly this same Safarov depicts the situation as if bourgeois nationalism in India is already a corpse, as if Communism has either gotten or is getting at the head of the proletariat, which, in its turn, is already almost leading the peasantry behind it. The leaders and their sociologists, in the most conscienceless manner, proclaim the desired as the existing. To put it more correctly, they proclaim that which might have been with a correct policy for the past six years, for what has actually developed as a result of the false policy. But when the inconsistency of the inventions and realities are revealed, the ones to be blamed will be the Indian Communists, as bad exponents of the general inconsistency which is advanced as a general line.

The vanguard of the Indian proletariat is as yet at the threshold of its great tasks and there is a long road ahead. A series of defeats will be the reckoning not only for the general backwardness of the proletariat and the peasantry but also for the sins of the leadership. The chief task at present is a clear Marxist conception of the moving forces of the revolution, and a correct perspective, a far-sighted policy which rejects stereotyped, bureaucratic prescriptions, but which, in the accomplishment of great revolutionary tasks, carefully adjusts itself to the actual stages of the political awakening and the revolutionary growth of the working class. May 30, 1930.

Some Stalinist Activities in Czecho-Slovakia

The struggle of the Centrists against the Left Opposition Communists develops its own objective logic. Where there is default of principled policy, there precarious maneuvers arise, where revolutionary integrity is throttled, bureaucratic slander flourishes. Where the capacity to think is bankrupt, crude violence is the substitute. The Stalinists in Russian do not hold back from the abuse of revolutionary justice against the Oppositions proletarians and likewise they do not hesitate in Western Europe to make a united front with the police against Opposition worker-Communists. The facts are strong enough in themselves to make every commentary superfluous. We draw the attention of the workers to the following facts.

The Soviet Diplomats and the Police

A delegation of Communist workers made a demand upon the representatives of the Soviet Union in Prague, Arosew, for an explanation of the shooting of Blumkin. He thereupon alleged that he would make a direct inquiry of Moscow. After several futile interventions this successful Communist declared in the course of a debate on being driven into a tight corner by a worker, that the shooting of a Communist did not come within his diplomatic "jurisdiction". The comrades, on leaving the building, were surrounded by secret service men, detained and subjected to a severe cross-examination: the above-mentioned worker was then arrested. The bold Arosew had displayed his finished diplomatic "art" having arrived at a secret understanding with the bourgeois police for the handing over his Party comrade to them.

A "Communist" as State Attorney

Some time ago, two worker-Communists, members of the Opposition who had a long revolutionary past behind them, were hailed before the bourgeois court on the charge of having distributed illegal leaflets of the Opposition. As they belonged to the Red Aid, a comrade demanded that they supply a lawyer for their defense. The latter, a certain Dr. Bartoschek, refused to assume the duties of defense counsel as soon as he learned that it was a "counter-revolutionary Trotskyist" who was up on charges. Apart from the formal aspect of this affair, that is, that he was an official of the Red Aid who was supposed to defend every worker against the persecutions of class justice, the following is noteworthy: These were two Communists who had been hailed up for their revolutionary consciousness and activity, for their struggle against imperialism, and for the revolutionary defense of the Soviet Union (the leaflet they distributed left no doubt on that score). But still they were at the same time Oppositionists and therefore this would-be Communist Attorney, who is a leading member of the League of the Rights of Man, the Anti-Imperialist League, the Anti-Fascist League, etc., simply refused to take up the defense and stood by passively while these workers were being condemned to jail. A sorry picture indeed!

How the Workers Think

The bureaucrats have also not hesitated to exploit the confidence of the workers and their belief in the authority of the Comintern and the Russian workers' state. Under these colors they have often enough tried to rouse a pogrom sentiment against the Opposition. But the deeper one penetrates into the Party ranks, the more evident it becomes that the rank and file of the workers have a strong aversion to beating up their fellow workers. In Zizkov, one of the working class quarters of Prague, our comrades arranged a discussion evening on the lessons of the Canton insurrection. A Party official who learned of this meeting, thought that the best method of carrying it on would be by smashing in Opposition workers' heads. He demanded at one Party meeting that energetic measures be taken to break up our meeting. But the workers have their own opinion and were guided by their own instinct. Not a single man among them signified his assent to the proposal of the bureaucrats. Prague, June 17, 1930. —JAN

PUBLIC WARNING!

We note with alarm that Stalin's first public unleashing of Karl Radek (Inprecorr, No. 23, page 505), for the purpose of throwing a stink-bomb at the Opposition's standpoint in India, is immediately accompanied by a deviation! In the very second paragraph of his article, Citizen Radek speaks of "the so-called third period". What does he mean "so-called" third period? We demand that he be compelled to issue a new statement of error, and that forthwith. Why should he be any more privileged than Kameney?

Lessons of the Chinese Revolution

The Constituent Assembly and Soviets

By ARNE SWABECK

The epoch-making events in India today compel even the "theoretical" pigmies in the Stalinized Comintern, to cast an occasional glance at the historic lessons of the Chinese revolution of 1925-27. Unfortunately they continue to sink into the quagmire of their own confusion.

For the working masses who may not be able to follow the rapid changes of leadership in this "third period" we volunteer the information that Earl R. Browder is the latest Stalinist appointee to the position of superficial political director and "theoretician" in America. In 1927 he spent several months in China during the height of revolution and beginning of its defeat. Upon his return Browder wrote the pamphlet "Civil War in Nationalist China". In its foreword he promised an extensive work on the "more fundamental aspects of the Chinese revolution". We venture to predict that Browder will not keep his promise for fear of exposing the whole house of cards built up of the Stalinist policies.

Browder—Professional Confusionist

On the Chinese lessons and the standpoint of the Left Communist Opposition Browder says in the Daily Worker (6-6-30), in an article entitled "Opportunists and India":

"On China, where the revolution is in a much higher stage of development than India, Trotsky also issues the slogan of Constituent Assembly, putting it up against the slogan of 'Soviets' as organs of power of the democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants."

And further:

"The Trotskyites cover up their own surrender to the bourgeoisie in India and China with 'very left' phrases about the dictatorship of the proletariat, violent opposition to the slogan 'democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants' and then practically replace both with the open bourgeois slogan of 'Constituent Assembly'."

(Could opportunist confusion be more "eloquently" put?)

Browder goes on to explain that in a period when the bourgeoisie is historically a revolutionary class overthrowing feudalism, the Constituent Assembly is a revolutionary measure. But today the bourgeoisie as a class, as well as its organ, the Constituent Assembly, is reactionary standing in the way of the completion of the "bourgeois democratic revolution". Proceeding from this he draws the conclusion that the Left Opposition has united with the Right wing, and he then repeats all the cheap calumnies always held in stock for the Left Opposition hoping thereby to prevent the revolutionists from engaging in an objective study of the Chinese lessons.

Browder, in these passages quoted, commits one "little" error. He completely confuses the question of the essential character of the Chinese revolution with the question of a slogan to be applied at a certain stage of its development. To make our case clear let us recall a few important factors in the Chinese developments.

Browder's Confessions

In his pamphlet, "Civil War in Nationalist China", Browder tells of reports of Chinese trade union and peasant union leaders on March 16, 1927: "The countryside is in terror, the Kuomintang (revolutionary army) has turned against the people. At Kanchow, the second division has assassinated the secretary of the General Trade Union and occupied the union offices; the leaders are all in hiding and communication with the city is cut off." This is one side of the picture showing the so-called Right wing of the Kuomintang in its actual role, later repeated precisely by the so-called Left wing. For the other side of the picture Browder reports that during the northern expedition (from Canton to Shanghai), when the nationalist armies captured half of China, all the military victories were accomplished by the revolutionary masses who even overthrew and drove out the military rulers before the nationalist armies arrived. There were 2,300,000 trade union members and 10,000,000 members of the peasants union, several hundred thousand of them under arms, pledged to the revolution.

What do we find in these reports? In the first half of the picture those upon whom Stalin and Browder had pinned their hopes as liberators of the working class, and harbingers of the proletarian revolution tion and supported by the Stalin policies the Kuomintang, first its "Right" wing and later its "Left" wing, were already then beginning to show themselves in their true role as the hangmen and butchers of the Chinese revolutionary workers and peasants. In the second half of the picture we note the wide mass ferment, the mounting revolutionary wave of workers, peasants and soldiers; the ruling classes collapsing and power slipping out of their hands with a systematic struggle for power begun by the workers—the conditions for organization of Soviets as organs of power. But what in this situation was the policy of Stalin and Browder?

Stalin for Hankow

As late as the E.C.C.I. plenum, May 18, 1927, the Stalin policy still held to the theory of the Chinese revolution as based upon four classes (bourgeoisie, petty-bourgeoisie, workers and peasants). The plenum decided that the organizing center of the revolution must be the Hankow government of the Kuomintang, the hangmen of the Chinese workers. It hog-tied the Chinese Communist Party in subordination and political subjection to the Kuomintang. We quote from the resolution adopted:

"The E.C.C.I. regards as incorrect the view which underestimates the Hankow government and which in fact denies its great revolutionary role. The Hankow government and the leaders of the Left Kuomintang by their class composition represents not only the peasants, workers and artisans, but also a section of the middle bourgeoisie. Therefore the Hankow government being the government of the Left wing Kuomintang, it not yet the dictatorship of the proletariat and the peasantry, but is on the road to it and will inevitably, in the course of the victorious class struggle of the proletariat and in discarding bourgeois camp followers, develop in the direction of such a dictatorship. (1)"

"The E.C.C.I. calls the particular attention of the Communist Party of China to the fact that more than at any other time is it now necessary to maintain the closest contact between the revolutionary government and the masses of the people. Only if such close contact is maintained—and obtained primarily through the Kuomintang—only by maintaining a determined course toward the masses, will it be possible more and more to strengthen the authority of the revolutionary government and its role as the organizing centre of the revolution. (1)" (1927—Emphasis ours—A.S.)

the striking out of these paragraphs and all references of support to the Hankow government and the Kuomintang; to openly fight this center of counter-revolution and to proceed to organize Soviets as the revolution.

Whom did history, that is the actual revolutionary experiences, prove correct? The policies of Stalin, Bucharin and the Menshevik, Martinov, who had fought Bolshevism for twenty years? No! Their policy of strengthening the enemy led to disastrous defeat. The Hankow government established the organized bourgeois counter-revolution and drowned the workers and peasants in blood. Only after the turn downward, with the disarming, defeat and slaughtering of the workers and peasants, did Stalin propose the organization of Soviets. But then—too late.

It could lead then only to miscarriages and blunders culminating in the Canton insurrection—to adventurism as a product of opportunism. Yet even the Canton insurrection holds valuable lessons forged in the fire of revolution. It became a curtain raiser for the third Chinese revolution. Despite all its weaknesses and mistakes it indicated definitely this next stage. The shortlived Canton Soviet, not elected but merely appointed from above, proceeded to confiscate feudal lands, establish workers control of industry, nationalize big industry and banks and confiscate bourgeois dwellings and all property for the benefit of the laborers. Automatically it led to the proletarian dictatorship.

Browder in his present Daily Worker article, either in blissful ignorance, or else in a deliberate attempt to obscure all these historical experiences, proceeds to outline the tasks of the Indian and Chinese revolutions as follows:

The Bourgeois Democratic Revolution

"Revolution in India and China today has as its first task the completion of the bourgeois democratic revolution, that is, to carry out in India and China those measures which were the characteristic feature of the transition from feudalism to capitalism—national independence, distribution of the land among the peasants, breaking the power of the feudal elements, establishment of certain popular rights of organization and individual liberties." (So, this is the task!) He adds that it cannot be carried out by the bourgeoisie but only the workers and peasants can carry out the bourgeois democratic revolution.

This is the crux of the problem. Here we see that Browder like Stalin, still holds to a policy which could only spell another defeat for the Chinese workers and peasants.

Independent Workmen's Circle on the Coast

Comrades:

For the last several months I have read your weekly steady. I am a member of the Independent Workmen's Circle, refusing to join the International Workers Order—believing that we can do plenty of work in the ranks of the Independent. The Stalinists as you call them began calling me and my comrades names like renegades, traitors, Lovestoneites. It opened up my eyes. I began looking for the truth—who are these renegades and traitors, Lovestoneites and Trotskyites. I went over to the stand to buy a Revolutionary Age when I also noticed the Militant. I bought a copy—compared it with the Revolutionary Age and remained a steady reader of your paper.

Coming down to brass tacks the situation stands this way: The I. W. C. branches are hopelessly split. Branches which have been always Left, branches (5 of them) that have given money and energy towards the Communist movement are now split in half. They hoped to take away full branches, but instead they only got about 250 out of 500 members. They kicked us out of the Co-operative Centre which we have built and kept up. They refused to take our donation for the Frehelt when we were in. By the way on an income of $2,400 they have had an expense of $1,000. They also made Olgin a "proletarian" suit of clothes which amounts to $90 which was charged to the expenses of the Frehelt.

The Cooperative Restaurant existing for over a year has been brought to a dangerous condition by the same Stalinite leadership. It is about to fail utterly and miserably. The Cooperative Bakery fired the day shift and only works two men at night—in a city of nearly 100,000 Jews. The newly opened barber shop lost in its honeymoon months—$30 the first month and $50 the second month. The whole Cooperative movement including the Center is on the verge of failure and closing up entirely.

The Imperial Valley strike for which six of our best fighters were sentenced to one half year at San Quentin and Folsom was nothing but a fiasco, it never materialized; a bunch of inexperienced boys were sent down there, with no experience in union work—and how to conduct it.

In my branch of the Independent Workmen's Circle I am pushing the Militant all I can, and hope to organize a fraction here of the Communist League.

Yours for a clean Bolshevik policy,
Los Angeles, Calif. RO—EIN

Lenin on the "Democratic Dictatorship"

It was precisely on the problem of the bourgeois democratic revolution that Lenin, upon his return to Russia in April 1917, took such decisive issue with the views of the Pravda fraction, and Stalin as the editor of the Pravda. The Pravda fraction, through its spokesman Kamenev, demanded the completion of the bourgeois democratic revolution—that is the carrying out of the measure listed by Browder—Lenin replied that the bourgeois democratic revolution could find its solution in the proletarian revolution. Referring to those "old Bolsheviks" who more than once have played a sorry role in the history of our Party when they repeated a formula, once acquired, without thinking, instead of studying the peculiarities of new living realities" he added:

"He who now speaks of 'revolutionary democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry' only, is behind the times, is therefore in practice on the side of the petty bourgeoisie and against the proletarian class struggle; such a one should be placed in the archive of Bolshevik pre-revolutionary antiques (it may be called the archive of 'old Bolsheviks')." (Lenin, Letters on Tactics, Vol. 20 part 1.)

The bourgeois democratic revolution took place in China in 1911 and was completed in so far as a bourgeois democratic revolution in China could be completed, sufficient to prove that its problems could not be solved under the leadership of the bourgeoisie. The second revolution in China proved that the solution of these problems could be found only in the proletarian dictatorship. It further proved that it could not remain in the state of the bourgeois democratic revolution but would have to become transformed in the permanent revolution to find its final solution on the world arena. In 1927 the proletarian dictatorship in China was raised by history up to the first point on the order of the day. Its realization was sabotaged by the Stalin policy. The organization of Soviets was rejected by Stalin who chose the bourgeois leadership of the Kuomintang. The revolution, with the decisive sections of the masses of workers and peasants in revolutionary ferment, therefore took the road of the only other alternative—the establishment of the bourgeois counter-revolution which still rules today.

A "Revolutionary Upsurge" Here and in China

Browder now speaks glibly, in the seventh Party convention thesis, about the "revolutionary upsurge of the working masses of the United States" while demanding the bourgeois democratic revolution for China. Adventurist phraseology on an opportunist basis. He is now riding the peak of this "revolutionary upsurge in the United States" which may soon collapse because it rests on nothing but paper.

The actual revolutionary upsurge of the Chinese masses in 1927 Browder failed to recognize and understand correctly therefore he is now trying to turn its history backward.

Did the democratic revolution in Russia solve its problems—that is, the measures listed by Browder. No. These problems were solved by the dual power, by the rising proletarian revolution based upon the Soviets and culminating in the proletarian dictatorship. We repeat—from history these pigmy theoreticians have learned nothing.

The problems of the Chinese workers and peasantry, including the measures listed by Browder, which will rise more in the coming third Chinese revolution can find their solution only in the proletarian dictatorship. Since today, under the established rule of the bourgeois counter-revolution, it cannot be expected that the Communist Party can arrive at the seizure of power in one jump—the slogan of the Constituent, or National Assembly becomes a correct slogan to mobilize the masses.

It was after the establishment of the bourgeois democratic revolution in Russia that the Bolsheviks demanded the speediest convening of the Constituent Assembly. This as well as its final dissolution proved a correct tactic. And as Trotsky now points out: "The millions of the toiling masses (of China) can come to the dictatorship of the proletariat only on the basis of their own political experience and the National Assembly would be a conservative step on this road."

A Review and Criticism

The Communists in the South

By HUGO OEHLER

The T.U.U.L. drive in the South, starting in 1929 at the very inception of the "new turn" in the Communist Party has not yet been analyzed. Our articles on the South have dealt with tasks and later with shortcomings and "self criticism" but none have followed this to a logical conclusion and explained the basic causes of these shortcomings. With the majority of the American workers unorganized, the building of new unions is on the order of the day but this is not separate and apart from our work in reactionary unions to unite the broadest forces possible against the labor fakers, reformists and sectarians. Such a correct relationship of these forces to expose the reactionaries existed in several of our past campaigns as exemplified by Passaic and the Colorado coal strikes, both cases isolating the A.F.L. fakers and gaining trade union support. In the first case the gain was nationally for the Communist leadership and in the second case mainly in Colorado and Wyoming by Communist forces for the I.W.W. leadership.

Only by the correct disposition of our forces in the reactionary trade unions and the new unions will it be possible for us to defeat the treacherous bureaucrats and build our influence in the labor movement. Let us review the Gastonia struggle and the southern campaign to find the causes of our mistakes.

In the economic development of capitalist society ever so often culminating points are reached when the psychological reaction of the workers to those changes making for greater oppression one form or the other are transformed into class ideology of a rudimentary nature. This change due to the material transformation can be accelerated and definite organizational results obtained providing the vanguard of the workers, the Communist Party is able to apply tactics and strategy based on a Marxian program for the concrete situation to crystallize the developing ideology to an organized class consciousness.

The stage of economic transformation in the West when the I.W.W. continued the traditions of the Western Federation, where the vanguard applied tactics with considerable success giving them a crystallizing of this changing ideology and an organizational base. The transformation in the South in the last several years is similar to the change in the West in the period spoken of, except (to our advantage) we are in a different stage of historical development. In the West at that period the vanguard was able to organize a considerable base but up to the present the vanguard has yet to accomplish this first task in the South.

A review of our activity in the South will throw light upon our success and failure that we may not repeat these blunders again. To begin with we must point out that our Southern campaign up to the present can register the following positive points:

1. We have brought for the first time in this section, the class issue into the struggle to advancing the workers' conditions.

2. Through our Gastonia Campaign (only considering the Southern end of the campaign) we have agitational though not organizationally, gained the wide support of American-born workers and proper farmers to our broad struggle in spite of the rabid anti-Red campaign of the bosses.

3. We have proven agitational to a wide section of the Negro masses, Southern and Northern, that the Communists are the leaders in the struggle of the Negro masses.

4. To a fair degree we consolidated the unity of black and white workers at each step of the struggle and were consequently considered by these workers as the "best fighters" and known to the bosses and their henchman as the "worse enemies".

Since revolutionists don't need self-praise (nor the present official Party campaign of mechanical self-criticism) we will deal with the problem of how the class is could have been brought into the

In the beginning of our Southern work, before our forces were sent South the condition of the Gastonia area was in a state of tension without important open class conflicts. This period was a culminating point in the transformation of the new industrial South, dominating old forms of control and changing the "hill people" into machine automatons on a large scale.

Especially in the Textile section of the Southern industries was there a critical stage. A steady Southward shift of the cotton spinning section and an acute international textile crisis, accelerated competition between the North and the South. On the other hand modern mills with machines of enormous output had to be kept moving if the rate of profit was to be kept up. These contradictory forces resulted in intensifying the stretch-out system, in wage reductions, worse company town conditions and general lowering of the standard of living with wide-spread unemployment, pellagra and chain gang victims. Men, women and children of American born stock were being driven into open revolt and organization against these conditions.

In this period when the Party should have sent forces South the Cannon-Foster group was fighting to correct the official American Party leadership, who had been given leadership on a platter by the Stalin-Bucharin regime. The Pepper-Lovestone group considered that this industrialization was to create a reservoir of reaction and that no work could be carried on now. The R.F.L.U. was the first to clamor for the new line that was soon to follow in the international movement but instead of a correction of the Right mistakes in relation to our trade union work and the United Front tactics a mechanical swing to the Left was taken.

After months of fooling away time comrade Beal was sent South in February 1929 inadequately supported one way or the other. In fact from that period up until the October 13th conference and today the decisive voting majority at the Center of the Communist Party did not know what it was all about and was often a brake instead of a help. The mechanical shift at the top in these hectic days for the Lovestones was no remedy, because such is never a remedy for anything except bureaucratic consolidation. Beal's glowing reports of what really could be done in the South and the A.F.L. activity opened the eyes of more forces at the Center, some to reality but most of them to the possibilities of dashing spectacular "victories".

More forces were sent South and the pivot point of activity was properly selected as Gastonia, the cotton spinning center with the Loray Mill as the pace setter. This pre-strike stake with the intense activity of a small force was entirely new to Southern conditions, but several comrades with Beal did excellent work under the circumstances.

The leading committee was committed to a "rolling-wave theory" which in practice relied too much on the spontaneity of the masses and spectacular dramatization and not sufficiently on preliminary organizational activity.

The A.F.L. had already started their second drive since the war in the Southern textile field and were "coming in and taking over revolts of the workers" in Elizabethton, Greenville, Lexington, Ware Shoals Marion, etc., trying to get any kind of agreement with the bosses, selling out and leaving if it became too hot as they did in Ware Shoals and other places. The driving force of this campaign were the Mustekes who as a new development at this stage stood in between the reactionaries and the best progressives who in the immediate past had supported the Left wing led by the Communists.

Our mechanical interpretation of the policy of building new unions and the rejection of the United Front policy as a swing away from the Right blunders of the past in the united front action put a taboo on all kinds of united fronts, if not in words then in deeds.

This resulted in our refusal to utilize throughout the country all possible forces, so badly needed in that concrete situation, against a powerful enemy that was concentrating all forces against us.

In the Loray Mill, where the National Textile Workers Union was concentrating its forces the company had increased the stretch-out and systematically, department by department was reducing the workers' wages. Five thousand workers was the full time capacity of the mill. Before the union was ready for the counter-attack the Manville Jencks, owners of Loray started discharging union members.

This precipitated the strike and over 2,500 quit work. This was inopportune for the union, for a little more time would have found them better situated. Mass picketing followed. A great number of these workers were in a strike for the first time and were new trade union recruits which meant that more emphasis should have been put on preliminary organization work.

This premature forceful break could have been overcome by the tried and tested tactic so well used in the Lawrence 1912 strike and many times since. The tactic of going from department to department at the inception of the strike in an organized planned manner—Strike!—Strike! and pulling switches, etc. This was not done. The failure at the start to close the mill pre-determined the tempo of the positive force and choked the fighting spirit of the workers on strike making a breach with those in the plant and enabling the bosses to play these two forces against each other to our disadvantage. Naturally, workers in the nearby mills did not gain the necessary inspiration from the strike, especially considering the training of these workers in any kind of class struggles.

Browder vs. Luhani

Leadership among the Stalinist section of the Communist movement has become a very specialized function. In the motley collection that serves as the American "leadership", the specific function of Earl Browder is to "expose the counter-revolutionary renegades". That his "anti-Trotskyist" endeavors are limited structurally to abominable and deliberate falsehoods and politically to a vulgar admixture of Lester Wardism and a handful of Marxist platitudes is simply traceable to the natural character of the man. The trouble, however, is that he is permitted to inflict his sorry leadership upon the Communist Party.

Latterly, Browder has been firing his paltry weapons at the Opposition for advocating the slogan of the Constituent Assembly in India (and China) as a democratic slogan to arouse and coordinate the struggles of the masses and lead them to the victory of the proletarian power over the imperialist and nationalist bourgeoisie. In the Daily Worker (June 18, 1930), he writes:

"The Trotskyites cover up their own surrender to the bourgeoisie in India and China with 'very Left' phrases about the 'dictatorship of the proletariat', violent opposition to the slogan 'democratic dictatorship of workers and peasants', and then practically replace both with the open bourgeois slogan of 'Constituent Assembly'." (Our emphasis).

Browder's remarks on "surrender to the bourgeoisie in India and China" are of course instructive, and do not come from any mateur. Let us anticipate any criticism from readers on that score by reminding them that he banqueted with General L. Ti-Sin, the butcher of the Canton proletariat, AFTER this bourgeois Kuo Min Tang militarist had decapitated scores of Canton's best revolutionary fighters. He speaks with authority about "surrender to the bourgeoisie", for did he not bring back from China an official letter from the Kuo Min Tang expressing its most cordial thanks for the services Browder had rendered it in China.

But so far as the "Constituent Assembly" slogan is concerned, it is hard to say whether Browder is ignorant or base, for surely he must know the policy of the so-called Communist Party of India, advocated, so far as we know up until a short time ago. It is stated by no less an authority than G. A. Luhani, the Stalinist who replaced Roy and was the Indian "specialist" and spokesman at the Sixth Congress of the Comintern. On the very eve of that Congress, Luhani wrote:

"Finally, the Communist Party of India, as the Party of the revolutionary vanguard of the proletariat has put forward the slogan of the convocation of a Constituent Assembly for determining the constitution of India...In putting forward the slogan, the Communist Party of India declares:

"...The demand should be the convocation by the National Congress of a Constituent Assembly which will be the supreme organ of the people's power and as such settle the question as regards the form of government, relation to Britain, etc. The entire people must participate in the election of the Constituent Assembly. Committees for the election of the Constituent Assembly should be set up all over the country. Representatives of all the political parties, workers and peasants organizations and all other democratic bodies will sit on these committees. The election campaign must be carried on throughout the country over a period of at least a year. The largest possible section of the population should be drawn into the campaign through mass meetings, demonstrations, strikes, etc." (International Press Correspondence, Vol. 8, No. 6, Page 133).

The quotations speak for themselves and they speak facts. But we cannot say as much for Browder.

Open Letter to the C. P. on the Elections

June 28, 1930

To the District Committee of Dist. 2,
Communist Party of the U. S. A.:

The deep-going economic crisis, the growing army of the unemployed millions the renewed attacks on the living standards of the workers, prompts the capitalist exploiters of this country to initiate a ruthless drive against the Communist movement as the spear-head and most militant section of the entire American labor movement. The activity of the Fish Committee to "investigate Communist plotting" foreshadows a stage of wholesale persecution of the Communists, of jailings and deportations of revolutionaries. At such a crucial time the Left (Communist) Opposition deems it more imperative than ever that the enemies of the working class—the capitalists and their social democratic and labor bureaucrat lackeys—should be confronted by united Communist ranks.

Regardless of the fact that the present factional and Centrist Party regime falsely and stupidly slanders us as "counter-revolutionaries" and "renegades" and wages a campaign of hooliganism against us, we will never permit them to separate us from the Communist Party and the Communist International. As adherents of the principles of Marx and Lenin—undiluted by either opportunism or adventurism—it is our duty at one and the same time to criticize and correct the official Party line in its deviations from Bolshevism, and also to demonstrate our closest solidarity with the Party in the fulfillment of its tasks in the every day class struggle.

In view of these considerations and of the objective political and economic situation in the country, we herewith offer our cooperation in the forthcoming election campaign of the Party to secure signatures to place Communist candidates on the ballot, to supply qualified speakers for the election meetings of the Party and to carry on whatever other election work is assigned to us.

Awaiting your acceptance of our offer,
With Communist greetings,

The New York Branch of the Communist League of America (Opposition)

In our next number there will appear a full report and critical evaluation of the Unemployment convention held July 4th in Chicago. Do not miss this number.

Solidarity on the StreetsNew York Demonstrates for India

The British consulate was the scene of a militant demonstration of 1,500 workers who attempted to address the mass from the balcony. Following the mass meeting in Battery Park the march of the workers on Whitehall Street began. Shouting revolutionary slogans and singing revolutionary battle songs, the procession advanced to the vicinity of the consulate. It was here that Mulrooney's police thugs swept in with their accustomed brutality. One worker who attempted to address the mass from the steps of the building was arrested by the police and pulled down.

This was the signal for a concerted onslaught of the police on the demonstrators. The workers fought back bravely until the police re-inforcement arrived in the shape of an emergency wagon with sirens shrieking, prepared to hurl tear bombs. Four comrades were arrested, Rollins, Manusky, L. B. Cohen and one other. Several workers were terribly man-handled and one Beatrice Blosser was knocked unconscious.

The demonstration was called by the New York district of the Communist Party and all workers organizations were invited to participate. The Communist League (Opposition) in New York immediately signified its decision to take part. We wrote a letter to the International Labor Defense notifying them of our intention and asking whether legal aid and defense would be extended to any comrades of the Opposition who would be arrested in the course of the demonstration. We received no reply from the I.L.D. which still leaves the question open whether the I.L.D. is an organization for the defense of the revolutionary movement at large or only the auxiliary for the defense of the adherents of the Stalin faction which momentarily controls the Party machinery.

Immediately we arrived at the demonstration we unfurled the banner of the Communist League which bore slogans denouncing British Imperialism and manifesting solidarity with the Indian Revolution. It was here that the functionaries of the Stalin group struck an ally note that threatened to disrupt the mass meeting before the demonstration could get under way. A series of physical attacks began on our comrades who carried the placards bearing our slogans and militants. Among the rank and file Party comrades there was a noticeable current to resist this breach by their officials of the united front of the demonstration. But the officials went around agitating for a pogrom and comrades Berman and George Clarke were set upon by the functionaries tools, certain half-underworld types that have bored their way into the Communist Party under the present regime. Finally our placard was destroyed, but our comrades held their ground staunchly and would not be eliminated.

While the Daily Worker maintains silence regarding our presence at the demonstration, the Freiheit, and the Uj Eloré both shamefully surpass themselves.

The Freiheit is the Party organ whose editor is the old Menshevik, Olgin, Abe Cahan's old crony and a former strong believer in the Sisson documents that "Lenin and Trotsky were German spies". This Freiheit came out with the unspeakable statement that the "Left renegades were in a united front with the detectives to break up the meeting, etc., etc." It would be tragic if it were not so ridiculous that no worker in his senses reads this without shrugging his shoulders and feeling kept secret from the membership until they have received the approval of Stalin. Balam, Enckel and Wicks, the last of the Lovestone Mohicans in the Party leadership were dropped from the C.E.C. Ella Reeves Bloor takes the place of Anna Damon as the dowager. The Party secretariat—God save the mark!—is composed of Browder, Hathaway and Bedacht. However, Bittelman is on his way home from conquests in the Indian revolution and Bedacht will be transferred to Moscow. Alexander will now prepare to wield the sceptre while Browder and Hathaway run messages.

But the very last word in the Party will be with the Bolshevik-Leninists.

ashamed that what was once a Communist paper should have sunk to the degraded spiritual level of the yellow Forward.

We repeat—such factional tactics will not deter us. As Communists we continue to participate in every class struggle demonstration of the Party against capitalism and imperialism, without abandoning our Marxist right and duty to work for the clarification of principles, the correction of political blunders, and a Bolshevik Party regime.

«CLARIFICATION»

If ever one is looking for clarification on certain important questions and he wants to become muddled, he has but one thing to do. He can ask a member of the Communist Party to explain to him. A very striking incident occurred a few days ago, when another comrade and myself were walking through a park where many members of the Communist Party and of the Left wing unions hold unofficial meetings. One of them appoints himself speaker and chairman and answers any questions that his comrades may put to him.

When I joined the group, the self-appointed speaker was explaining to another the position and purpose of an industrial union. After he had exhausted all the stories he knew about his comrades in Russia about his shopmates, and had omitted to answer the question, he asked for other questions. I very naively asked him what the dispute was between Trotsky and Stalin and wherein they differed in principle. The question was taken up.

After speaking about a half hour to explain why he thought he ought to answer that question saying that in spite of the fact that Trotskyism is a dead issue he considers it his duty to explain to a young worker the truth and to keep her from going astray; he wasted another half hour telling me about Emma Goldman. Finally he came to Trotsky. He began from the end, he said to come to the beginning.

"Now this Trotsky, who sells himself to the capitalist class, who writes for their press, who betrays the working class, has been expelled from the Communist Party because he is a traitor." Here many of the other members of the Communist Party objected. That is not the way to explain a question, they all said. This is a very significant fact for us.

The comrade started again. I said that I would not listen to any scandal stories but I wanted to know the difference in principle. The comrade was in a loophole and again started to tell me all the black stories he knew about comrade Trotsky. Finally I was given the chance to explain the question myself.

After a short talk I noticed that quite a number of the Party members were in full sympathy with me. Many of them agree that it was not a question of personal grievances that put comrade Trotsky out. Many of them objected to the way the Communist League of America (Opposition) had been treated in the last demonstration. Some agreed that it was wrong for League members to be expelled because of their views. This all is very significant to us because it shows that we are growing in influence. Those that agreed with us that it was a question of principle and that principally comrade Trotsky is correct said that the only reason that they did not join us was that they had to keep the unity of the Party. That, to them, counts above everything else. However, we are breaking through the thick wall set up by the Party bureaucracy.

THE FOSTER FACTION

Lack of principle, characterlessness, intellectual and political cowardice on the part of the Foster-Bittelman group of "leaders", so clearly and so disgustingly revealed in the whole pre-convention and "anti-Trotsky" campaign, are the manifestations and the result of their contradictory and impossible position.

—FROM THE PLATFORM OF THE COMMUNIST OPPOSITION ADOPTED (CHICAGO) MAY 20 1929

A Stalino-Fascist AttackCleveland Workers Reply to Hooliganism

CLEVELAND—

Following a fascist attack by the Stalinist clique on the public meeting arranged by the Communist League to hear Max Shachtman speak on the Left Opposition and his recent visit to Europe, local police swooped down on the meeting and arrested eleven workers, including comrades John Brahtin and L. Bryar, the owner of the meeting place, a couple of Party members, and a half dozen others who came to the hall. The "broad and non-partisan" International Labor Defense proceeded to bail out everyone but the two comrades of the Opposition.

The meeting was scheduled for the Painters Hall, but when the committee and the audience of 100 workers gathered there, the hall was closed and the caretaker nowhere in sight. His failure to appear was greeted by the assembled C. P. members with knowing grins. It was impossible to get a new hall immediately, and the Stalinists were overjoyed, until the Hindu owner of a restaurant, sympathetic towards the Party offered to rent his place as a makeshift. The committee in charge accepted the offer and announced the change of place on the street. The assembled workers then proceeded to march through the city to the restaurant, located two doors from the official Party's district office.

After some 70 workers had entered the restaurant and taken seats, a gang of some 20 Party members came down from the Party office, up the stairs leading to the restaurant, and attempted to break through the guard at the door. They were composed largely of the same people who had come down armed with blackjacks and knives a year before to break up the meeting organized to hear comrade J.P. Cannon. In spite of their fascist record, the door committee offered to let 10 of their number come in free of charge in order to take the floor and speak for the Stalinist standpoint.

The hoodlums refused to accept this proposal and started to create a violent disturbance. The door was nevertheless held, until the gang suddenly pulled out their weapons of Stalinist enlightenment—blackjacks, clubs, iron bars, brass knuckles, knives—and began wielding them murderously against the Opposition comrades at the door. Our comrade, Joseph Keller was badly cut around the head, his lip was laid open and he was kicked repeatedly in the stomach. Despite their superior numbers, however, these fascists who disgrace the name of Communism were repulsed by the Opposition comrades who were aided by many of the workers in the hall, including members of the I.W.W., who were incensed at the outrageously anti-working class tactics of the Stalinists.

A squad of police and detectives appeared immediately, and were directed to

The Opposition in Brazil

Our comrades of the Communist Opposition in Brazil just issued the first number of their paper, A Luta de Classe (The Class Struggle). As has already been pointed out, the Left Opposition in Brazil is rallied around the "Lenin Communist Group", which has strong working class support in Rio De Janeiro and Sao Paulo, the largest industrial city in the country.

We enthusiastically greet the appearance of this paper which strengthens the Left Opposition on American soil. There now exist in the Americas four journals of the Left Opposition, around which the workers are being organized in spite of the difficulties that confront them: The Militant, in the United States, the Bulletin of the Communist Opposition, in Mexico, La Verdad in the Argentine, and A Luta de Classe in Brazil.

The journal of our Brazilian comrades will probably appear semi-monthly. It is printed in four pages of large format. In the first number we find an editorial on "Our Objectives", articles on May Day, on the new policy of the Communist Party, Trade Union notes, an extensive labor chronicle of Sao Paulo, Lenin's Testament, and an extract from Trotsky on the "Radicalization of the Masses".

The Opposition is on the march! Against the Right wing and Centrism and for the preservation and strengthening of revolutionary Marxism!

the hall by one of the Stalinists, Cullen name, who has probably been taught by the district organizer, Bimba that even cooperation with the police is permissible in the struggle against the "counter-revolutionary Trotskyists". The meeting, of course, was then broken up.

The Opposition comrades immediately proceeded to the Public Square and announced a meeting for the coming evening to protest against the shameful knife-work of the Stalinists. The next evening, the Opposition comrades arrived to find both Public Square "stumps" occupied by Stalinists, who were apparently in frenzied fear of having the workers listen to the Opposition's point of view. We nevertheless set up a park bench at the other end of the Square and comrade Boich had just begun speaking when the same hooligans appeared once more and began to boo and shout like madmen. They attempted to rush the platform, but meeting with better resistance than they expected, they had to give up. Again the cops arrived, and our bold Stalinists fled precipitately in four directions. We remained and continued our meeting, with the Party opening up immediately on the other "stump". Comrade John Foley, the chairman, introduced comrade Shachtman who spoke at length on the events of the night before and then delivered his lecture. Almost a thousand workers packed the square, and the loudness with which the radical workers of Cleveland denounced the fascist attack of the Stalinists was enough to make the latter's ears tingle. The Party speaker, one I. O. Ford, who was delivering himself of a despicable attack upon the Opposition as "counter-revolutionists" and "enemies of the workers", was properly exposed by comrade Boich as having been a private detective, i. e., a stool pigeon, just a little while ago, before he joined the Party and became so ardent a supporter of Stalinism.

The quick and authentic reaction of the Cleveland workers to Stalinist gangsterism was one of the severest blows the latter has yet suffered. These contemptible tactics imported into the labor movement from the armory of Mussolini, Lewis, Sigman and their ilk, only serve to disgrace and discredit the whole Communist movement, to expose the political weakness of Stalinism, and alienate the best sections of the working class. The rank and file workers in the Party have no stomach for them—wherever they are practised, it is only under threats of discipline from the bureaucrats who stay discreetly at home.

Let the Party members and the militant workers in general reflect seriously on this: What is it that the Stalinist bureaucracy fears so desperately in the platform of the Opposition that it attempts by the basest methods of fascism to prevent its being heard? These methods will not do. Many cities have already shown that Cleveland has just shown it again. The standpoint of the Opposition is making its way to the workers. It has only become stronger and better consolidated in Cleveland after the hooliganism of the Stalinists was used against it.

AFTER THE CLEVELAND RIOT

Cleveland, Ohio

Dear Comrades:

Although still in pain, I am determined to rush whatever little help I can toward sustaining our fighter, the Militant. Comrade Michael Miklovich paid his debt in renewing his sub for the Militant, while he decided to donate two dollars towards the Sustaining Fund. He offered said amount to me in order to help me pay the doctor's bill, but I advised him to help our paper since I am still in a position to pay the doctor's bill. Tell Max that I finally had to go to the doctor to have my wounds examined, and they were accordingly treated, and now I feel much better. I don't think you would believe what a terror the Stalinists organized against us. Max could tell you what a beating the Stalinists administered to my body, but my enthusiasm for our cause would surpass—any time—all the beatings of the terrorists in Stalin's camp. They got theirs and they have learned a lesson for future discussions. Enclosed you will find money order.

What Fish Committee Means

A Fighting United Front Needed Against the Sharpening Offensive of the Capitalist Class

The bubble of the Whalen documents has been loudly and derisively punctured. That clown and former police commissioner Whalen presented these documents as "proof" that Amtorg the official Soviet trading agency in New York was the center of Communist propaganda for the United States.

Three witnesses called before the Fish Committee have conclusively demonstrated from different angles that these "documents" are absolute and unadulterated forgeries. The first witness exposed sixteen internal mistakes and discrepancies that pointed to their fabrication by Russian white guards. A newspaperman testified that the "documents" had been offered for sale in Washington six weeks before Whalen released them to the New York press. But the most deadly testimony came from the man in whose print-shop on East Tenth street the letterheads of the Whalen documents were printed.

No one in the least familiar with the history of the series to which Whalen forgeries belonged could have entertained the shadow of a doubt as to their true character. The Sisson documents of some years ago, setting out to prove that Lenin and Trotsky were "German spies" could have been convincing only to such a product of the New York Forward as Moissaye Olgin. The celebrated Zinoviev letter could impose only on the willing credulity of a social-imperialist like Macdonald.

This exposure will, of course not stay the activities of the Fish Committee. It is the time-honored practise of the ruling class always to explain away "social unrest" as a malicious foreign importation. When the masses were once struggling in England for the blessings of parliamentary democ-racry, the aristocracy blamed this movement on the gold of the French regicides. The source of all evil, the Czarist bureaucracy had it, were the Jews. In our present epoch of proletarian struggle, the capitalists find the key to all the riddles of the universe in . . . Moscow gold. The one thing they will not admit is that the roots of the revolutionary are sunk deep in the crisis of a class society that has outlived its historic usefulness.

Commissioned by Congress to investigate Communist propaganda for the overthrow of the government, the Fish Committee was in reality an expedient to distract attention from the misery of the unemployment crisis. In line with this policy, the Fish Committee made a rabid attack on Amtorg. It is no pleasure to the workers of Russia to have to trade with the eneral Electric or Henry Ford but power in the United States still lies in the hands of the capitalist, not the working class. The development of trade even under these conditions is, however, of direct interest to the American working class. Amtorg bought more than $107,000,000 of American goods in 1928-9 and was planning to double that in the near future. The goods that Amtorg purchases here mostly with hard cash go towards facilitating the work of socialist construction in the Soviet Union and at the same time inevitably alleviate unemployment for thousands of American workers.

The baiting of Amtorg by the Fish Committee aided by the Matthew Wolls constitutes part and parcel of an attack on the interests of the American working class. The defense of the Soviet Union is their own best defense. This does not mean that the U.S.S.R. is any substitute for the action of the American proletariat. The Soviet Union is the friend and ally of the international revolution which is the only guarantee that socialist society can be built up and maintained in any country. But the development of the class struggle takes place on the basis of the conditions in each capitalist country. The world organization that fights for the establishment of a chain of Soviet Republics is the Communist International. The functions of the Soviet Government and the Comintern are sufficiently distinct without P. A. Bogdanov, the Amtorg head, having resort to Sokolnikov's worthless, dangerous and revisionist subterfuge at the Geneva Economic Conference to the effect that capitalist and socialist systems can cohabit the world peacefully side by side!

It is imperative to arouse the widest possible mass movement against this Fish Committee and its probable consequences. Elihu Root has already advanced the idea of creating a special secret Federal police, a sort of American Ochraza to spy more effectively over the revolutionary workers. Whether Root's proposal in this form is realized at this time or not, the coming storm and stress period in the class struggle will mark more and more vicious attempts to place heavier shackles on the labor movement. The Department of Justice will be more extensively solidized and its stool pigeon activities re-enforced. The revolutionary press will have a constant struggle against being barred from the mails. The industrial espionage system will be intensified. The jailing of militants who organize the workers will gain momentum. The capitalist campaign to terrorize the foreign born workers by the finger-print and passport route will revive. The criminal syndicalism and sedition laws of the various states will be brought into more frequent play.

As the counter-action to this capitalist offensive, the workers must organize a fighting united front. To make the most powerful appeal to the masses in the approaching elections, the Communist Party should demonstrate its re:linep; to place itself at the head of a movement for working class unity. The immediate objectives of this movement should be the release of all class war prisoners, federal, state and municipal grants for the relief of the workless, the enactment of unemployment insurance and old age pensions, the six hour day and the five day week, and the recognition and extension of large-scale credits to the Soviet Union.

—MAURICE SPECTOR

The 16th Congress of the C.P.S.U.

Convoked after two years of calculated manoeuvring for factional advantage the sixteenth congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union was one of the most ominous events in the annals of the October Revolution. There has been nothing quite like it in the entire history of Bolshevism.

Enthroned in the midst of the fawning adulation of his faction agents ("Comrade Duranty of the New York Times included) rose the sinister figure of Stalin, the man against whose aims and methods Lenin warned in his last testament, striking a note of the most poignant alarm. Every major leader of the October Revolution had been eliminated and crushed by the bureaucracy and its intrigue. But what was worse—or an accompaniment—the Party momentarily lies prostrate.

A measure of the degeneracy that has set in, is the spectacle of the Right leaders Rykov and Tomsky and others who were compelled by Stalin to drink the bitterest dreks of personal and political humiliation. For such self-abasement there is absolutely no Bolshevik tradition. Lenin never conceived of such a thing against his opponents inside the Party in the most desperate days of the civil war. But the keynote of this congress was that in Stalin, the apparatus-bureaucracy have far more reason to be satisfied than ever under Lenin.

Stalinism reigned supreme at the sixteenth Congress. There was no critical analysis of the course of political and economic events for the past two years. There was no honest and searching admission of mistakes. Self-praise and self-content pervaded the whole Stalin faction. The Congress was a mere fig leaf. It met; it dispersed. A few organizational charges were arranged to make the "Master's" power even more air-tight. Such "congresses" are of the soil of Bonapartism.

It is not the cowardly Rights and their captive leader Rykov who can give leadership to the Russian proletariat in the great crisis that looms up ahead of it. That leadership will come from the iron Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition led by Trotsky. It will come from the thousands of revolutionists who have been imprisoned and deported. It is from the Left Opposition in the Party that the Thermidorians will meet with the resistance that will give leadership to the revolution in the crucial events that are maturing behind the fog of the sixteenth congress. In the next issue of the Militant we propose to publish a detailed analysis of the significance of this congress and the situation in the Soviet Union.

A FORCED RETREAT

For the balance of the summer period, the Militant has been compelled to change its frequency of issue to a semi-monthly basis. This change, which we shall attempt to make as brief in duration as possible, was forced upon us by two factors: the severe unemployment situation which has sharply affected the financial income of the paper, and, added to it, the summer months, during which a certain organizational and financial relaxation usually sets in.

The change to a semi-monthly is an adjustment to this situation. It should be distinctly emphasized to all our comrades and sympathizers that the change is in no sense of the word a permanent one. Plans are even now being elaborated for the return to a weekly publication basis early in the Fall, and a corresponding expansion of the publishing, as well as the general activities of the Opposition.

The change is undoubtedly a blow to our movement, from which all our supporters can help us recover more speedily by immeasurably increasing their financial assistance, beginning immediately. A broadly grounded financial support, ORGANIZED NOW will not only signify a swift return to the weekly Militant, but its re-issuance on a sounder basis.

United, conscientious efforts are required. We expect the militants throughout the country to bend their efforts for a generous response. The return of the Weekly is our joint responsibility. Let it be met with the necessary speed!

The Mass Workers Join the Opposition!

George J. Saul Also Demands That Party Reinstate Our Group

Comrade Saul has addressed a statement to the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party, in which he declares his support for the platform of the Left Opposition. He joins the Communist League of America (Opposition) and demands of the Communist Party that it reinstate all expelled members of the Left Opposition and adopt its platform in the United States; and in the Comintern.

The adherence of George Saul to the Communist League following the action of Hugo Oehler, is still further evidence of the movement of the mass workers in our direction and the dissatisfaction of the honest Communist workers with the present disastrous Party course, and the steady growth of influence among the Communists of the ideas of the Left Opposition. Comrade Saul only recently returned from work for the Communist Party and International Labor Defense in the South where he was very active in helping to organize the Southern textile workers into the National Textile Workers Union. His activity in the Gastonia and other Southern regions brought about his arrest by the southern bourgeois and a sentence of six months on the chain gang. A new trial was recently granted him and Comrade Saul is returning forthwith to stand trial.

Comrade Saul was also one of the leaders and active workers for the Communist Party, along with comrade Hugo Oehler, in the Colorado Coal miners strike. He is at present working in the harvest fields of Kansas and is making his way East and South for his trial in South Carolina. The Left Opposition welcomes comrade Saul into his ranks. The following represents some of the views expressed by comrade Saul on the situation and needs of the Communist movement:

"The contradictions of imperialism are sharper than ever. The objective situation is favorable to the revolutionary movement of the workers toward the proletarian revolution and communist society.

"At the same time there is not the close relationship between our Party and the workers as a class which anticipates a growing confidence in our party as the leader in the class struggle.

"This is explainable when one considers the inner-party situation, the non-Leninist tactics being employed . . .

The Chicago Conference

The Unemployed Gather

By ARNE SWABECK

CHICAGO—

The Chicago unemployment convention, the first of its kind, sharply denoted, in more than one respect, the present degree of development of the unemployed movement in the United States. It was the first culmination point around this burning issue facing the working class. Called by the Trade Union Unity League, its policies became those of the official Communist Party.

While the crowded one day session brought out many healthy aspects it also glaringly showed the extremely narrow character of the movement to date. Moreover, the policies adopted will, instead of overcoming the difficulty, tend further to narrow a basis where now the broadest scope is not only essential but also possible.

Many Extravaganzas

A summary of the speeches made, all bristling with a healthy militancy, would indicate the complete absence of a serious tackling of the problem—how to set the working masses into motion against their class enemy. They were well typified by the first speaker from the floor, following the main report. This speaker, on behalf of the New York delegation, extravagantly pledged: to build the mass unemployed councils to build the mass "revolutionary unions"—to build the mass Communist Party, etc., etc. Nor were any of the "democratic encumbrances" of "ordinary" labor gatherings apparent at this convention. All was cut ready to order, its first business being the selection of a presidium from a previously made up slate. The presidium then proceeded to select those who were to speak from the floor, as per its announcement from lists submitted in advance by district delegations. This method "gently" eliminated in advance anyone who might not hew closely to the official "line".

On its positive side the convention had some real healthy aspects shown for example in a large Negro delegation, 153 out of a total of the announced 1120 registered delegates. Many splendid proletarian types had answered the call and came clearly evidencing the signs of pressure of the economic crisis drawing workers toward the Left, themselves being attracted by a movement which had fearlessly taken up their battles. Otherwise the composition of the delegation showed but little sweep of the movement beyond the general periphery of the Communist Party and closely sympathetic organizations and groups. 484 delegates came from the Chicago district alone, 150 from Michigan, 73 from Minnesota, 92 from Ohio, 56 from Indiana, 53 from New York and a sprinkling from some other states. There were none of those Southern workers who had taken such splendid part in the strikes of the Carolinas.

To understand the basic cause of the present narrow limits upon a movement which has great possibilities and has otherwise displayed vitality in struggle, should now be the object of serious efforts of all militants. Without that no shortcomings will be remedied. It is wrong to conclude as the Party does, that the present situation is one of a "revolutionary upsurge of the working masses in the United States." Riding the crest of such a wave which is artificially constructed will at best get us caught in the dip, and at the worst prepare us for serious defeat when the offensive begins. The March Sixth and other unemployment demonstrations have manifested splendid working class response, but nevertheless what is most outstanding at the present moment is a downward curve. Everywhere increased capitalist reaction; innumerable jailings of Communist and workers on strike (many delegates were arrested on the way and in Chicago); break-up of demonstrations; intensified speed-up; wage cuts, directly and indirectly; the trade unions, including the new industrial unions, losing members. With this reaction also increasing signs of workers' resistance through small defensive strikes. There have lately been, for example, the strikes of the southern textile workers in Elizabethton and Marion and those of the northern section in Nazareth and Abernethy, Pa., and Plainfield, N.J., the short so-called strike of the I.L.G.W.U. in New York; the strikes of the Pittsburgh taxi drivers, St. Louis bus drivers and the recent strike of the Pittston anthracite miners. All these were defensive strikes and none under the leadership of the Left. Where the Left does play a role has been on a small scale in the New York cafeteria strikes and the present Flint automobile workers strike.

Such is the picture at the present moment. Within it is contained the visible outlines of the upward curve in which the resistance, as yet isolated, can become a workers' offensive of possibly broad sweep and surely of much sharper conflicts. Each such curve requires its specific tactics. Each has possibilities of growth for the movement and the tactics of one must simultaneously be the preparation for the other.

First Tasks

At this moment the first necessity is the most elementary ground-work. Millions of workers are unemployed and only a small section set into motion. Millions are still blissfully ignorant of their future status as members of a standing army of unemployed. That is the first point to bring home. The bourgeoisie have set to work actively to divide the ranks of the unemployed workers from those having jobs and already with some success to isolate the unemployed movement in its organized expression from the working masses. Can these efforts of the bourgeoisie be effectively defeated in any way than the broadest application of the slogans for work or compensation, unemployment relief, shorter workday, credits for Russia, etc.? Obviously not. Certainly the successful carrying on of the struggle for the unemployed means to spare no efforts really to unite the working class, which cannot be done within the narrow framework of the T.U.U.L. There could hardly be any situation where correct united front policies are so essential than precisely in this one. Could the hypocrisy and deceit of the social reformists and self-styled progressives on the burning issue of unemployment be better exposed than just through a correct and genuine united front policy?

These, however, were not the matters given serious consideration at the unemployment convention. It was keyed up to a very revolutionary phraseology but forgot its elementary tasks. William F. Dunne, in his report for the T.U.U.L. correctly stressed the necessity of unification of all of the struggles of the workers. But from that came the wrong conclusion, in the program of action adopted, entirely to limit the unemployed movement within the framework of the T.U.U.L. Thus the exact opposite of unification. Each union and industrial league is to set up unemployed councils in their industry as a part of the T.U.U.L. General councils, according to the program, are not to be organized where a section of the T.U.U.L. exists. These additional mechanical limits which isolate the movement and confine it to that section of the workers ready to join the "revolutionary unions". There could be no better way of actually preventing a mass basis of struggle for the unemployed. The social reformist will thus have a free field to rally all those workers who by vain search for a job are turning away from capitalist ideology but are not yet ready to join the "revolutionary unions". In that broad field they can continue to sow their seeds of illusions and deceit. And it is precisely also in that field where a united front struggle around the burning issue of unemployment as well as Communist activities has such rich potentialities.

The Program of Action

The program of action lists the immediate demands to be made: Work or wages, unemployment relief, no evictions, 7-hour day, free employment agencies, etc. A total of 17 demands. Unquestionably the few most pressing ones, which are also the most elementary ones, must become the outstanding slogans. It would, however, have been more correct and realistic to advance the demand for the six hour day. More realistic, if for nothing else, in view of the fact that all of the railroad unions have officially gone on record recognizing the six hour day as a necessity.

But among all these demands no room could be found for the pressing one of large scale credits from this country to the Soviet Union to further insure her successful industrialization and build the bonds of solidarity between the working classes of both countries. The Stalinists will probably answer that the Soviet Union "does not need" such credits. But that is contrary to facts. Simeon Zuckerman, vice president of the Amtorg, reports that orders in the United States for machinery, equipment, etc. averaged $10,000,000 monthly for the first six months of the fiscal year. In April and May of this year, they fell to $3,000,000 while orders placed in Germany ran to $10,000,000 because Germany offered a full 100 per cent credit for eighteen months and on some deals for two years or more. He adds:

"A big Soviet construction program in the Urals—metallurgic plants, tractor and machine plants—were planned with the aid of American specialists, who are cooperating in building. But in the present difficult period, which our leaders never attempted to deny or disguise (so!) credits play an important role. If we get better terms from Europe we must place orders in Europe instead of America."

The Chicago unemployment convention did not take up or attempt adequately to solve the tasks which the present situation had placed upon it. Despite its narrowness, a correct policy could have made a substantial beginning toward laying the foundation for a broad genuinely united movement of the working class against the present capitalist reaction and in the struggle for the unemployed. The Left Communist Opposition must intensify its fight for such a policy.

The Iron Heel Grinds Mexican Labor

The white terror in Mexico continues in still greater force than formerly, there having been within the last few weeks numerous, especially vicious, attacks on the working class organizations on the part of the bourgeois counter revolution. Several working class leaders have been murdered by the present regime in widely separated sections of the country. Recently in an armed clash between a Communist demonstration protesting the government's anti-labor policy, twenty comrades were killed at Matamoros Laguna, State of Coahuila.

The Communist Party and C.S.U.M. (Unitarian Labor Federation affiliated to the R.I.L.U.) have been entirely incapable of resisting these attacks on the part of the reactionary forces. The masses under pressure of the general crisis, with its continuous shut-downs, and unemployment reaching the 700,000 mark, continue in a swing towards the Left. The Communists, however, are not able properly to organize this growing discontent, with the result that the anarcho-syndicalists of the General Confederation of Labor, also suffering at the present time the government's persecutions, are reaping a big harvest in fields of organization and influence. Lower California is becoming the scene of great struggles and the anarcho-syndicalists are showing activities far exceeding those of the Communists in both the Imperial Valley Region and in the mining camps of Santa Rosalia in the central part of the peninsula.

Not only is the Party incapable of carrying its struggle to new fields but is even losing heavily in sections where it formerly had great strength. In the State of Michoacan, the local labor federation, while actually manipulated by the state governor who is posing as a "Left" and a "laborite", has been greatly subject to Communist influence from some time back. Recently the Central Committee ordered the Party comrades in Michoacan to affiliate the state labor federation to the C.S.U.M. or else organize a dual organization dependent on the C.S.C.M. The Michoacan comrades, realizing that no profit could be effected by this policy which the masses could not fail to recognize as having an open splitting character, refused to obey the order of the Central Committee. The Party's organization in the state fell to

"The way to overcome the serious mistakes in the internal life of our Parties is to do what Comrade Trotsky and others were expelled for wanting to do, namely, to raise the level of political life in the Communist Parties in all their organizational links on the basis of wider internal democracy"

"The bureaucrats have lied to us long enough concerning the contentions of the Opposition. The methods of the bureaucrats has only resulted in the isolation of the Party from the workers, at a time when the objective situation tends for radicalizing the politically backward workers

"In view of these facts I will my strength and energy to the support of the movement led by the Left Opposition. I stand for the adoption of the fundamental views of the Left Opposition by Comintern internationally and of the views of the Communist League of America (Opposition) in the United States. I stand for the immediate reinstatement of the expelled Oppositionists into the Party and Comintern."

Yes! No?

The Daily Worker of July 18, 1930, prints the report made by Stalin at the 16th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. In it, Stalin says:

"The Chinese workers and peasants have already replied by forming Soviets and Red Armies. IT IS REPORTED that Soviet Governments are being formed. IF THIS IS TRUE, I do not find any cause for wonder. There can be no doubt that nothing but the Soviets can save China from final ruin and impoverishment."

"It is reported"; "if this is true"—that is how Stalin speaks of the much-advertized "Chinese Soviet regime". The Daily Worker, and with it the international Stalinist press, have been filled for weeks with columns of clap-trap sensationalism with "wirelesses from Shanghai", about the 80,000,000 Chinese who have established a Soviet regime in Southern China. These stories were used to justify the false policy of Stalinism in China and to confound the "Trotskyist renegades". Stalin now sings another song. Has the Daily Worker been bluffing, as we said it had?

Has an organized Chinese Soviet regime been established? Does the Comintern really know anything about it or not? YES OR NO?

pieces as a result, but the Communists remain for the most part at their posts in the existing state labor federation.

Comrades Eduardo Calero and Jorge Pino, members of the Central Executive Committee of the Young Communist Federation of Mexico, have been expelled for disagreement with the present Party "line". Comrade Calero has issued a statement in support of the Left Communist Opposition, by which step the Mexican Opposition group finds itself reinforced by one of the finest elements of the youth movement.

Pino and also comrade David Alfaro Siqueiros, recently expelled from the C.E.C. of the Party and from the Party itself as mentioned in a former issue of the Militant, are both among those remaining in jail, after their arrest for participation in the May Day demonstrations. They are being held together with a number of Party and Y.C.F. comrades without bail and without trial.

The Mexican section of the International Red Aid, which for a time, under the able (!) "direction" of Enea Sormenti, made a big stir on the basis of plenty of bluff but with no substantial national basis, is unable to do more in the present crisis with mass arrests, terror and almost complete illegality than to shout an occasional slogan or issue a few leaflets in protest. The Party claims that Pino and Siqueiros are government stool-pigeons and that they had themselves arrested in order to gain prestige among the Party rank and file! Naturally they are not receiving the benefits of the "non-partisan" defense of the Red Aid.

Northwest Experiences

Farmer-Laborism in Action

In the last seven years no question has received more serious study and attention by American Communists than the so-called Farmer-Labor Party, or Labor Party question. Up to and including the 1928 elections the Minnesota Communist Party devoted more time, money and energy to the "Farmer-Labor Party" idea than to any other question on its program. Numerous pamphlets and much literature was issued by the Party to show why Communists should participate in the "Farmer-Labor" movement and there fight for a "genuine Labor Party".

After chasing this Labor Party phantom from the moment it made its appearance in the post war days the Minnesota workers, who by training and experience should be best qualified to analyze the question, have come to the conclusion that this entire Farmer-Labor Party movement has nothing constructive to offer the American working class.

Reformist Labor Parties

In the first place it should be made clear to the workers that there are two kinds of political parties, revolutionary and reformist. Practically all Farmer-Labor, or Labor Parties, belong to the last named group. Like other political parties, the character and classification of a working-class political party is determined by its organization and program. The Farmer-Labor Association in Minnesota is of the reformist variety. That is, there is nothing in its program which calls for the overthrow of the present ruling class and to place the working class in power. Like all labor parties of the reformist character, the F.L.A. simply intends to function as a party of a subordinate class to ask for favors from the ruling class, the capitalists. Therefore, it can be seen, that a reformist political party of a subordinate economic class can only obtain for its members such favors as the ruling class is willing to grant them. On the other hand, revolutionary parties like the Communist Parties, have for their main purpose to put the working class in power as the ruling class.

Communist (revolutionary) parties of the workers stand for this because it is necessary. They know that the producing class cannot even realize their immediate needs under capitalist economy and capitalist rule, to say nothing about their legitimate aims. Communists also know, and they teach the workers this fact, that history does not disclose a single instance where a ruling class relinquished power because they were out-voted. More persuasive means were necessary to replace them. Votes are only practical in settling disputes between a class, but votes are useless in settling disputes between classes. This, of course, refers to cases where there are material issues involved, and not to such immaterial questions as to whether Hoover or Smith should be the President of the United States or whether Shipstead or Nelson should have a seat in the Senate. On such issues the capitalists do not object to abide by the result of the vote.

With this all too brief analysis of the aim and purpose of political parties, let us sum up the net results of ten years of Farmer-Labor activity in Minnesota.

Theory of Labor Reformism

The Farmer-Labor Association is supposed to be the organized political expression of the workers and farmers in the State of Minnesota. The intention is, on the surface at least, that through this organization the workers and farmers shall control the legal Farmer-Labor Party which appears on the ballot together with the Republican and Democratic parties. The Farmer-Labor Association is supposed to furnish the program and endorsed candidates for the State Farmer-Labor Party. However, this theory has not worked out very well in practice.

In the first place the organizational structure of the F.L.A. is wrong as a labor party in that it is partly based on individual membership. This arrangement admits politicians and office seekers whose sole ambition is to use the Farmer-Labor Association as a stepping stone to climb into some soft job. The representation to the F.L.A. conventions, where the political programs are written and candidates endorsed is based on territory instead of industry. The territorial basis is the county. There are 87 counties in the state. The farmers control 84 of them. The result of this is that the Farmer-Labor Association is controlled by conservative farmers, small-town lawyers, small business men and individual office-seekers, all of them incapable of political leadership by decree of history. At the last state convention the organized workers with their mild program were overwhelmingly defeated by the reactionary elements in control. At each succeeding election the Farmer-Labor Association is merely being used as a vote-getting machine for individuals like Shipstead, Wefald Starkey and others. The worker members of the Association merely furnish the votes and the campaign expenses.

A "Two-Class" Party

As mentioned above, one of the most serious defects of the Farmer-Labor Association is that it is reformist in program and outlook. Second, it is made up of two classes, farmers and workers, with the wrong class, the farmers, leading or rather strangling the movement. By the laws of economic development farmers and small business men are unable to furnish political leadership for either the workers or the capitalists, but on the other hand, must of necessity follow one or the other class. For this reason, any political movement headed by farmers or small business will soon find itself in a blind alley or will be forced to surrender its leadership to the workers or the big bourgeoisie, (the big capitalists).

In the recent Minnesota Primary election the labor vote for the Farmer-Labor ticket was very small. Thousands of workers paid no attention to the election as they could not see any object in voting. The workers have been fed up on broken campaign promises by office seekers masquerading behind the Farmer-Labor label. The wrong make-up and program of the F.L.A. has completely blurred both party and class lines, and party issues in the campaigns have degenerated to meaningless issues between individuals. Since the F.L.A. has become a plaything for ambitious politicians of the Shipstead-Starkey type the endorsements of the Association mean nothing to the workers and are generally ignored. That was the case in the Primary election just past where several endorsed state and congressional district candidates were defeated by individuals who carried no endorsement.

All the efforts which have been wasted in the last ten years by the Communist movement to build and maintain Farmer-Labor parties in the United States can be laid to the Right wing opportunist policy of the Stalin leadership of the Communist International. This false conception concerning the role of Farmer-Labor parties, is but another blunder added to the long string of wrong united fronts sponsored by the Stalin gang in the C.I. It will be the duty of the Communist League, the Left wing of the Communist movement, to furnish the American workers with a correct political program which will guide them along the most direct path toward their ultimate goal.

Why Doesn't Lovestone Answer Trotsky?

More than three months ago, the following letter from comrade Trotsky was transmitted to Harry Winitsky, business manager of the Revolutionary Age, organ of the American Right wing:

Buyuk-Ada, April, 16, 1930

Dear Comrade Winitsky:

I have received your organ regularly. The various addresses signify the same. In thanking you for your kind attention, I nevertheless feel the need of expressing openly to you a certain surprise on my part in connection with your letter. The Revolutionary Age has from its very beginning, and its present director* long before its appearance, constantly and energetically denounced me and my friends as counter-revolutionists. I cannot doubt that this happened out of honest conviction.

You sign yourself, dear comrade Winitsky, fraternally. The sincerity of this salutation, I also have absolutely no right to question. But since we are no diplomats, and what we say must correspond to what we think, I assume that if not the Revolutionary Age as a whole, then at least a section around it, no longer regards us as "counter-revolutionists". Would it then not be in place to acknowledge this openly?

I raise this question not in my interest but in the interest of political clarification in general.

In this spirit I also sign myself,

Fraternally,

L. TROTSKY

Three months, and many issues of the Revolutionary Age, have elapsed, but no answer has been made in that paper, unless one can count as such the continued misrepresentations of Trotsky's and the Opposition's standpoint that appear in it regularly. The letter, it is true, was reported at the recent "convention" of the Lovestone group, and interpreted by the professional Trotsky-slayer, Bert Wolfe, as a "bid for unity" with the Right wing! But Wolfe's conjuring tricks are not yet enough to obviate the need for an open reply to comrade Trotsky's letter.

What have Winitsky and his paper to say?

The Man Stalin Chose to Succeed Blumkin!

The French press is announcing new revelations on "the activities of the G.P.U." They are supposed to come from a high Soviet functionary. In fact, it refers to a new deserter of Bessedovsky's type, who as soon as he passes "over the other side of the wall", goes over body and soul to the bourgeoisie and swears to fight Bolshevism with all his power.

The cases of desertion by functionaries of the rotten apparatus abroad have become very frequent. Diplomats, military attachés, commercial agents, bank directors, the whole fine gang that is often recruited from the bourgeois world, seeks the first opportunity to betray the proletarian state. It is a normal condition and that is why we have not bothered ourselves with these people in our press.

But the case of the latest deserter is very characteristic of the Stalinist apparatus and of the struggle that Stalin, with the aid of the apparatus, conducts against the Left Opposition.

Agabekov, the name of the new deserter was charged with a secret mission of the G.P.U. for Turkey, Greece, Syria, Palestine and Egypt. And here is what Agabekov says in Miliukov's paper, Posledni Novosti (Latest News) of July 2nd, 1930:

"It is Blumkin who was charged before me with this mission. Last fall he was recalled to Moscow, and, suspected of Trotskyism, he was shot. I was designated in his place and I was given the order to relieve from their posts all his collaborators suspected of Trotskyism, too."

This declaration explains a lot about the methods of struggle that Stalin uses against the Left Opposition. In the same declaration, Agabekov says that while he was yet in Moscow he no longer believed in the dictatorship of the proletariat and that he "considered it as the dictatorship over the proletariat". But Stalin does not trouble about such a trifle provided the functionary is faithful to him and accepts all the dirty jobs against the Opposition. All the rest—conviction, fidelity to Communism, etc.—are secondary matters. The Opposition, hunted driven from their posts, deported like Rakovsky or shot like Blumkin are replaced by the Bessedovskys and by the Agabekovs.

The Agabekov case shows us again that in the bitter struggle against the Left Opposition, against the Bolshevik vanguard that has remained loyal to Communism, Stalin employs covert or open counter-revolutionists, people who are ready at the first occasion to betray the Soviet state.

KLORKEIT No. 4

Note that the fourth number of Klorkeit, organ of the Jewish Left Opposition group in France, has arrived. It contains among other articles the fourth installment of comrade Trotsky's "The Third Period of the Mistakes of the Comintern."

France

Opposition Progress

The minor effects of the world crisis which French industry has already come to experience (textile, wines, etc.) and the pessimistic perspectives created for it by the recently adopted U.S. protective tariff, do not as yet lead the French bourgeoisie to seek methods of despair ("fascisation") as the Party here would have us believe. It senses trouble for the future to be sure. It knows that the crisis is not going to leave France economically immaculate. And for this very reason it strains every effort to reinforce and consolidate its present political domination in the country. A stable bourgeois bloc, purged of all "extremist" elements, is its chief aim.

This was clearly demonstrated by the recent speech of Tardieu at Dijon. By threat and by persuasion he hopes to win over the Radicals to his Republican Concentration, because it is these that he needs to assure stability to his class-government. He openly admits that there are serious problems facing his class (the agricultural crisis, financial disorder, etc.) and he makes a strong plea for cooperation to the different bourgeois parties on the basis of what he has already "accomplished." As a major part of his "accomplishments" he cites his strong-handed suppression of Communist influence! This Communist influence, two, three years ago, was menacing. Today it is impotent! Now, he sees as the task of the government: "positive" achievement.

The Party up a Blind Alley

The Party writers pass over in painful silence this enemy class estimate of the movement. For, it is the solemn truth. The First of May, the inaction displayed in the campaign for the 13 martyrs of Yen-Bay attests it. Yet nothing stirs the leadership from their phillistine complacency. Vacant, optimistic phrases are still the substitute for effective class action. As long as the Party will not realize that a strong, solid working class resistance must be assembled to oppose the concentrated power of the bourgeoisie, its influence is going to decline still further. And such a working-class resistance cannot be achieved by "third period" antics, by mechanical control of the mass organizations, by bureaucratic execution of the trade union work, by leaving the basis of reality. By these methods, it only drives the workers into the arms of the reformists of all shades socialists, popists or syndicalist minoritaires. By these methods it discredits Communism as a whole in the eyes of the workers. The masses have to be educated through all possible phases of collective struggle for their historic class task and not by light-headed optimism and talk.

Opposition Growth

With all this tragic sterility of the Party leadership, the situation is, however, by no means hopeless. The Left Opposition is always there, watchfully exerting its pressure, struggling to revitalize the Party. The progress of the Left group is increasing. It was the Ligue Communiste which in conjunction with a majority of Anarcho-Communists here (who, after having carefully studied the events of the Chinese revolution, know where to find proper Communist guidance for their own) organized the first, real protest demonstration against the executions of Yen-Bay, before the president's palace. This demonstration and the impression it made upon the bourgeoisie contributed a great deal to awaken the membership of the Party to the insufficiency of the leadership and to force the Party itself into (belated) action, governmental measures striking our comrades heavily (expulsion and prison).

In the North of France a strong detachment of the regional C.G.T.U. has joined the Opposition Unitaire (which rallies about the political program of the Left Opposition and the Verite.) The C.G.T.U. Left Opposition is rapidly developing, parrying successfully the calumniating attacks of the both the Stalinist majoritaires and the syndicalist minoritaires ("Committee for Trade Union Independence") In the Party itself, different nuclei and subsections (Tours, 13th Arrondissement, Paris etc.) have started a struggle against the false policy of the leadership, backing and declaring their full support of the Left Opposition. The struggle for the Party and for the reestablishment of a Leninist line has only begun. —S.GORDON

What the 'New Masses' Refused to Print

Concerning the «Defenders» of the October Revolution

Dear Friend:

I have received a copy of the New York magazine the New Masses containing articles about my autobiography and about the suicide of Maiakovsky. I do not regret the fifteen minutes I have spent getting acquainted with the American Left intelligentsia. Magazines like this are to be found in several countries. One of their most important tasks is said to be the "defense" of the Soviet Union. This is a wholly praiseworthy undertaking, regardless of whether the Messrs. "Defenders" fulfil it from inward conviction or—as is sometimes the case—from less lofty motives. But it would be foolish to exaggerate the importance of this defense. These groups, sufficiently variegated in their composition, busy themselves on one side with the fringes of the bourgeoisie, on the other with the fringes of the proletariat, and offer no guarantee whatever as to their own future. As the majority of pacifists struggle against war only in times of peace, so these radical "defenders" of the Soviet Union, its titular "friends" from the ranks of Bohemia, will fulfil their mission only so long as this does not demand real courage and genuine devotion to the revolution. These qualities they do not possess. And where indeed should they get them? Their radicalism needs a protective coloration. For that reason it finds its chief expression in the "defense" of the Soviet Union—defense of a state possessing power, wealth and authority. It is a question of defending what exists and is already achieved. For such defense it is not at all necessary to be a revolutionist. You can quite well remain a mixture of anarchist and conservative. But at the same time you can seem revolutionary, deceiving others and, to some extent, yourself. We have seen this in the example of Barbusse and the French paper Monde, which belongs to the same category as New Masses. From the standpoint of time, their radicalism is chiefly directed toward the past. From the standpoint of space, it is directly proportional to the square of the distance from the scene of action. In relation to their own country, these bold boys always were and always will be infinitely more cautious and evasive than in relation to other countries—especially those in the East.

The best representatives of this type, excelling the rest by many heads both in gifts and character, is undoubtedly Maxim Gorky. He sympathized for years with the Bolsheviks and considered their enemies his enemies. This did not prevent him from appearing at the time of the proletarian revolution in the camp of its enemies. After the victory of the revolution he long remained in the camp of its enemies. He reconciled himself with the Soviet Republic when it became for him an unalterable fact—that is, when he could reconcile himself with it without departing from his essentially conservative outlook. There is irony in the fact that Gorky warred against Lenin at the greatest period of Lenin's creation, but now long afterwards, gets along very peacefully with Stalin. What can we expect of the pencil-sized Gorkys?

The essence of these people from the Left wing of the bourgeois Bohemia is that they are capable of defending the revolution only after it is accomplished and has demonstrated its permanence. In defending the yesterday of the revolution they adopt an attitude of conservative hostility to all those who are laying the road to its tomorrow. The future can only be prepared by revolutionary methods, methods as foreign to the conservative Bohemia as were the ideas and slogans of the dictatorship of the proletariat on the day before the October revolution. These gentlemen remain, accordingly, true to themselves and to the social classes which created them and feed them. Furthermore, in spite of a formal veering to the Left, to the "new masses" (!), their conservatism has really grown stronger since they are leaning their backs against—not the October revolution, no!—but against a great state as an "institution", independent of its guiding ideas and of its policy. They were with Lenin and Trotsky—by no means all of them, by the way—after that they were with Zinoviev, after that with Bukharin and Rykov, now they are with Stalin. And tomorrow? Upon that they will express themselves when tomorrow has be-the bourgeoisie and the social democracy? come yesterday. They have accepted every change in the governmental course as patriotic officials accept a change of uniform. There are always potential Chinovniks sitting around Bohemia. These people are courtiers of the Soviet power, not soldiers of the proletarian revolution.

The workers state, as a state, may have need of such characters for temporary goals, although I have always thought that the near-sighted epigones greatly exaggerate the weight of these groups—just as they exaggerated the value of the "defense" of Purcell or the "friendship" of Chiang Kai-Shek. As for these characters themselves, I am ready to acknowledge that it is better to be a courtier of the Soviet power than of the oil kings or the British secret service. But the proletarian revolution would not be the proletarian revolution if it allowed its ranks to be confused with this problematical, unreliable, fickle and wavering brotherhood.

Their moral triviality assumes cynical and sometimes insufferable form when they, in the character of "friends of the family", interfere in the inner problems of Communism. To this testifies the aforementioned number of the New Masses (a paradoxical name by the way for an organ of Bohemia!). These people, you see, think that my autobiography will serve the bourgeoisie against the proletariat, while New Masses, Monde, and other publications of this kind, are obviously necessary to the proletariat against the bourgeoisie. This aberration is easily explained: Fooling around the fringes of two hostile classes and revolving continually on their own axes, the Barbussees of all countries naturally get mixed up as to where is the bourgeoisie and where the proletariat. Their criteria are simple. Since the work of the Left Opposition decisively criticizes the domestic policy of the Soviet Union and the world policy of the Comintern, and since the bourgeois newspaper-writers exult in this criticism and try to make use of it—why, the conclusion is perfectly obvious: The courtiers are in the camp of the revolution, and we, the Left Communists, in the camp of its enemies! This is the usual depth of the political thinking to be found in Bohemia.

The bourgeoisie would be stupid if they did not try to use the inner disagreements in the camp of the revolution. But was this question first raised in my autobiography? Wasn't the expulsion from the Party of the President of the Comintern, Zinoviev, and one of the presidents of the Soviet government, Kamenev, a gift to the bourgeoisie? Did not the exile and subsequently the banishment, of Trotsky give the bourgeois press of the whole world a welcome theme for agitation against the October revolution? Was not the denunciation of the head of the government, Rykov, and the head of the Comintern Bukharin, as "bourgeois liberals" used by These facts, brought to the attention of the whole world, were far more helpful to the bourgeoisie than the theoretical reflections or historical explanations of Trotsky. But what interest has the anarcho-conservative Bohemia in all this? It takes all the foregoing events, because stamped with the official stamp, as once for all given and eternal. Criticism of the Stalin regime is impossible to them, not because the Stalinists are right, but because the Stalinists are today the government. I repeat. These are courtiers of the Soviet power, and not revolutionists.

For revolutionists, the question is decided by the class line, the content of ideas, the theoretical position, the historical prognosis, and the political methods, of each of the opposing sides. If you think, as we think—and as we have proven on a world scale through the experiment of the last six years—that the policies of the Stalin faction are weakening the October revolution, that they destroyed the Chinese revolution, that they are preparing the defeat of the Indian revolution and undermining the Comintern, then—and only then—our policy is justified. The bourgeoisie will grab up the fragments of our true and necessary criticism of course! But does that change in the slightest degree the essence of a great historical problem? Has not revolutionary thought always developed by the road of ruthless inner struggle, at whose fire the reaction always tried to warm its fingers?

I remark in parenthesis, however, that the whole bourgeois press, from the New York Times up to the Austro-Marxist Arbeiter Zeitung, in its political estimate of the struggle of the Left Opposition with Stalinist Centrism, stands incomparably nearer to the Centrists and never conceals it. You could publish a whole anthology of press clippings to prove this. Thus, in addition to all the rest, the "friends" and "defenders" of the revolution, having nothing in common either with the old or the new masses, crudely distort the genuine picture of the distribution of political sympathy and antipathy among the bourgeoisie and the social democrats.

Lying, by the way, is a necessary accomplishment in a courtier. In the article about Maiakovsky, as I turned over the leaves of the magazine, I hit upon the name of Rakovsky. I read eight or ten sentences, and although I am accustomed to much, nevertheless what I read made me gasp. It is related here how Maiakovsky "hated war" ("hated war"—what a vulgar formulation of the relation to war of a revolutionist!) and how, in contrast to that, Rakovsky, at Zimmerwald "was going to take off his coat and punch Lenin and Zinoviev...in the jaw" for their revolutionary struggle against war. Rakovsky is named here for no purpose whatever except for that of spreading this scandalous lie. It is necessary to spread it because Rakovsky is in exile and it is necessary to justify his being there. And so the courtier becomes a contemptible slanderer. He spreads this stupid scandal instead of stating—once he has named Rakovsky in connection with the war—with what revolutionary courage Rakovsky struggled against war under a hail-storm of persecution, slander, assault and police prosecutions. Exact for that struggle Rakovsky was thrown into prison by the Roumanian oligarchy and was saved from the fate of Lejkecht and Rosa Luxemburg only by the revolutionary Russian army.

That is enough. If the October revolution had depended upon its future courtiers, it would never have appeared in the world. And if its further destinies depended upon their "defense", the revolution would be condemned to ruin. The proletarian vanguard can guarantee the future of the country of the Soviets, and prolong the road of the world revolution, only by a correct policy. We must work out that policy, establish it theoretically, and defend it with tooth and nail against the whole world, and if necessary against the very "highest" institutions which have raised themselves up (or rather slid themselves down) on the back of the October revolution. But of those questions we need not speak in connection with the pseudo-revolutionary courtiers from the ranks of the petty bourgeois Bohemia. For them enough has been said.

Yours,

Hypocrisy for Art's Sake in the New Masses

Correspondence between Max Eastman, Walt Carmon, Mike Gold

The following letters are virtually self-explanatory. They arose out of a letter sent to Michael Gold, editor of the New Masses, by Comrade Max Eastman. In this letter comrade Eastman enclosed the article by Trotsky (printed in this issue of the Militant) and demanded the publication of the latter in the New Masses, in view of the slanderous attacks made by Gold and Earl Browder against the Opposition in general, and Trotsky and Rakovsky in particular, in a previous issue of that periodical. The first reply to Eastman's letter was in the affirmative from Walt Carmon, managing editor of the New Masses, followed by a cowardly negative reply from the editor, Gold, which is answered by comrade Eastman. The three letters are printed below.—Ed.

Max Eastman,
Chilmark, Mass.
Dear Max Eastman:

This will acknowledge receipt of your note and article by Leon Trotsky. We are certain to use this in the coming issue. Mike Gold is not in town. Back in a few days. You will probably hear from him as well on his return.

Yours,
WALT CARMON

NEW MASSES
112 E. 19 St. New York, N. Y.

July 16, 1930

Dear Max:

I'm sorry, but I really don't think we should print this in New Masses. We reviewed Trotsky's book, because it was "literature", but all of us here agree that the mag. shouldn't become an organ of political discussion and if we give up a lot of space to this Trotsky fight from now on—we immediately lose our function as a literary vehicle—

Sorry

July 18, 1930

Dear Mike Gold:

Your pretense that you will not publish Trotsky's rejoinder to your cheap attack on him because your magazine is too "literary" is an insult to my intelligence. The article to which Trotsky makes this rejoinder was written by an active head of the Workers Party and was a political attack from the first word to the last.

Moreover it was a total abandonment of the policy of your paper which had been to pussy-foot on this whole issue of the Left Opposition. You refused to let me write about it as a member of your Executive Board, even with an answer by a Stalinist in the same number. When I resigned, the pussy-foot policy was carried to the point of not printing my letter of resignation. When I stated this fact in a communication to The Nation, suggesting that this was not a shining example of "brave thinking", you replied justifying yourself on the ground that "We none of us used the magazine to express our opinions". (I quote this confession of yours from memory.)

Moreover about a year ago when I met you on 7th Ave. and asked how the magazine was getting on, you volunteered the information that, "We're through with the Party, we've learned that much anyway." (Here too I am quoting from memory but my memory is good.) It struck me strange that you should offer me this piece of inside information, when all previous negotiations with me had been conducted under the pretense that the magazine was independent of the Party—a "free revolutionary magazine" as it advertised itself. Upon reflection I wondered whether this gratuitous declaration of independence might not mean that you are now directly subsidized by the International.

Whether because you are subsidized, or because you depend upon the party for sales, the fact is that in publishing these attacks on Trotsky and Rakovsky you have at last shown your political colors. You are now overtly what you were before under cover, a Stalinist organ. And yet you have the brass to tell me that you won't publish Trotsky's rejoinder because you are too "literary".

And you have the folly to add, "All of us here agree etc.," although you know that ten days ago I received a letter from your associate Walt Carmon stating—what any courageous and independent editor having viciously attacked one man and slandered another would state—that "We are certain to use this in the coming issue."

What happened during these ten days? Do you really expect any grown person to believe that having attacked a political leader with a page and a half of vituperation written by a political opponent, you refuse to publish a brief rejoinder because you are literary? Even people who re-

NOTES of a JOURNALIST (Concerning ZINOVIEV, MANUILSKY, and "RADOVOY.") by ALFA

Zinoviev and the Evils of Printing

In Number 5 of the Bolshevik of this year, Zinoviev once more "fuses" with the Party—by that single method now accessible to him. Zinoviev writes:

"In 1922, Trotsky predicted that 'the real rise of socialist economy will become possible only after the victory of the proletariat in the most important countries of Europe.' This prediction has not been confirmed, just as many other predictions of the author mentioned. The real rise of our socialist economy became possible already prior to the victory of the proletariat in the most important countries of Europe. The real rise is developing before our very eyes."

The same Zinoviev, beginning with the same year 1922, accused Trotsky of "super-industrialism", that is, of demanding a too speedy industrial rise. How should this be reconciled?

The Opposition was accused of non-belief in socialist construction and at the same time that it wants to rob the peasantry. If that were so, why did it have to "rob" the peasantry? In reality, the Opposition spoke of compelling the Kulak and the upper layer of the peasantry in general to bring sacrifices for socialist construction—the one which the Opposition was supposed "not to have believed". A fiery belief in socialist construction was manifested only by those who struggled against "super-industrialism" and proclaimed the empty slogan "face towards the village". Zinoviev proposed to the peasantry, instead of cotton prints and a tractor, a pleasant smiling "face".

In 1930 as well as in 1922 Trotsky considers that "the real rise of socialist economy in Russia will become possible only after the victory of the proletariat in the most important countries of Europe." Only it must be understood—and this is not so difficult, after all—that by socialist economy we have here in mind precisely socialist economy and not the contradictory transitory economy of the NEP and that by a real rise we understand such a rise which will completely reconstruct the habitual and cultural conditions of life of the toiling masses, destroying not only the "queues", O wise Zinoviev, but also the contradiction between the city and the village. Only in this sense can a Marxist speak about a real rise in socialist economy.

After his struggle with "Trotskyism" in 1923-1926, Zinoviev in July 1926, officially admitted that the basic core of the Opposition of 1923 was correct in its prognosis. And now for the sake of fusion with Yaroslavsky, Zinoviev once more rushes into all the difficulties and warms over the old dishes.

It is worth while therefore, to recall that this same Zinoviev signed, and in part wrote on the question he now touches, in the Platform of the Opposition:

"When we, in the words of Lenin, say that in order to construct a socialist society in our country a victory of the proletarian revolution is needed in one or more of the advanced capitalist countries, and that the final victory of socialism in one country and a backward one at that as impossible, as Marx, Engels and Lenin proved, the Stalin group ascribes to us the view that we 'do not believe' in socialism and socialist construction in the U.S.S.R." (Platform of the Bolshevik-Leninists, page 72).

Not badly said, is it?

How to explain these scurrilous from falsifications to repentance and from repentance to falsifications? On this point the Platform of the Opposition does not leave us without an answer:

"MY LIFE"

All readers of the Militant and their friends who desire to get their copy of of Leon Trotsky, "My Life", should make it a point to order the book directly through the Militant. Shipment will be made the day the order is received, and the cost of the book, five dollars, ($5.00), covers the postage charge. Send your order, together with money order or cash to

"...The petty bourgeois tendency within our own Party cannot struggle against our Leninist views otherwise than by ascribing to us things we never thought or said." (ibid, page 72).

The last lines were not only signed by Zinoviev, but, unless we are mistaken, were written by him. Truly Joseph Gutenberg has rendered some people a very poor service. Particularly when they have to "fuse" with the other "Joseph" who, it is true, did not invent printing, but works very conscientiously at its destruction.

Has France Entered the Period of Revolution?

The Left turn in the C.I. began in 1923. In July, the "third period" was proclaimed. A year later, Molotov declared that France, together with Germany and Poland, had entered a period of "the greatest revolutionary events". All this was deducted from the development of the strike movement. No figures, no facts were cited. They limited themselves to two or three examples taken from the last numbers of the newspapers. We took (see Militant No. 29-33) the question of the dynamics of the French labor movement in the light of figures and facts. The picture given by Molotov, prompted by the words of others (the role of the prompters, we assume, was played by Manuilsky and Kuusinen) in no way coincided with reality. The strike wave of the last two years had a very limited character, even though it revealed a certain rise compared to the preceding year, which was the lowest of the decade. The weak development of the strike struggle in the last two years is all the more remarkable because France, during 1928-1929 went through an undeniable industrial revival, clear enough in the metal industry where the strike movement was the weakest of all.

One of the reasons for the fact that the French workers did not utilize the favorable conjuncture is undoubtedly the extremely superficial character of the strike strategy of Monmousseau and the other pupils of Losovsky. It became clear that they did not know the state of industry in their own country. As a substitute for that they characterized as offensive, revolutionary and political strikes the isolated, defensive economic strikes primarily in the light industries.

This is the essential part of the analysis we made in our work on the "third period" in France. Thus far we have not seen a single article in which our analysis is submitted to criticism but evidently a very acute need for such a criticism is felt. There is no other way of explaining the appearance in Pravda of an enormous feuilleton, "On the Strike Strategy of the Generalissimo Trotsky", where there are frivolous rhymes, quotations from Juvenal, and in general fathomless wit, but not a word about a factual analysis of the struggle of the French proletariat, (for the last decade), particularly for the last two years. The article which evidently belongs to the pen of one of the recent gifts of the "third period" is signed modestly Radovoy (rank and filer).

The author accuses Trotsky that he knows strike defense but does not recognize the offensive. Let us assume that Trotsky is guilty of that. But is this a reason for renouncing an offensive struggle in the metal industry under the most favorable conditions and at the same time designate petty, defensive strikes as offensive?

The author accuses Trotsky of not distinguishing capitalism of the epoch of rise from capitalism of the epoch of decline. Let us assume that this is so. Let us forget about the struggle over the relation of the crisis of capitalism and its cyclical crises which went on in the Comintern in the period of its Third Congress, when live thought was pulsing in the Comintern. Let us assume that Trotsky forgot all of that, and that Radovoy absorbed it all. But does this give an answer to the question whether France entered for the past two years into the period of decisive revolutionary events, or not? This is precisely what the Comintern has proclaimed. Has this question any significance or not? It would seem that it has. But what does the author of the witty feuilleton say on this point? Not a word. France and its labor movement are completely disregarded. As a substitute, this Radovoy proves that Trotsky is a "mistake" and that he serves the bourgeoisie.

Is that all? Yes, nothing more than that.

But, a well-meaning reader will object, can so much be expected from a young Radovoy? He still has a chance to grow. After all it is not he who creates the trade union policy for France. For that we have serious revolutionary strategists, tested in struggle, as for instance, the general secretary of the Profintern, Losovsky.

Correct—we will reply to the reader—all this would be convincing if...if only the Radovoy were not Losovsky himself. And in the meantime, the matter stands thus: the bouquet of soured light-mindedness and flaccid wit is such that it cannot deceive us.

The leading general, under the modest pseudonym, defends his own acts. With rhymes he drapes the calamities he inflicts upon the labor movement with his leadership. In connection with that, he assails the Left Opposition with all the magnificence of his vengeful irony: it can, don't you see, be completely seated on one sofa. Let the Radovoy investigate: Are there any sofas in the jails that are filled with Oppositionists? But if they really were so few in number as Losovsky would have it, this would not frighten us at all. At the beginning of the war, the revolutionary internationalists of all Europe went to Zimmerwald on a few carriages. We never feared remaining in the minority. It is Losovsky who, during the war, was very much afraid of remaining in the minority and therefore defended in print the Longuevists, with whom he tried by all means to unite us, against us. During the October revolution, Losovsky was afraid that the Bolshevik Party would be "isolated" from the Mensheviks and Social Revolutionaries, and he therefore betrayed the Party which he temporarily joined, and united with us, against us. During the October revolution, Losovsky was afraid that the Bolshevik Party would be "isolated" from the Mensheviks and Social Revolutionaries, and he therefore betrayed the Party which he temporarily joined, and united with its enemies in the most critical period. But even later on, when Losovsky did join the victorious Soviet power, his quantitative evaluations were just as little reliable as his qualitative ones.

After the victory of which he was not in the least guilty, Losovsky, putting the minus signs where he had previously had his pluses, at the time of the Fifth Congress of the Comintern, declared in a triumphant manifesto that the French Socialist party "no longer exists," and in spite of all our protests against this shameful light-mindedness, retained this contention. When it became clear that the international social democracy nevertheless does exist, Losovsky together with his teachers, crawled on all fours through the whole policy of the Anglo-Russian Committee and was in a union with the strike-breakers during the greatest strike of the British proletariat. With what triumph—with a triumph over the Opposition—did Losovsky, at the session of the Plenum of the Central Committee, report the telegram in which Citrine and Purcell generously agreed to converse with the representatives of the All-Russian Trade Union Central Committee, after they had crushed not only the general strike but also the strike of the coal miners.

After the destruction of the Chinese revolution and the disintegration of the organizations of the Chinese proletariat, Losovsky, at the Plenum of the Central Committee (where he came as a guest because Stalin had not as yet decided to bring him in as a member) reporting the fantastic data about the conquests of the Profintern, gave the figure of the workers organized in the trade unions of China as three million. Everybody gasped. But Losovsky did not even wink an eye. He operates just as lightly with millions of organized workers as he does with rhymes for the coloring of articles. This explains sufficiently why Losovsky's witticisms about the sofa on which the whole Opposition can be seated do not in the least overwhelm us with their magnificence. Sofas as well as furniture in general are undoubtedly in abundance in the offices of the Profintern, but unfortunately there are no ideas there. And it is ideas that conquer, because they win the masses...

"But why did Losovsky sign 'Radovoy'?" we hear a distrustful or a doubtful voice. There are two reasons: a personal and a political. The personal role of Losovsky is such that it is not of advantage to him to expose himself to blows. In delicate moments of ideological clashes he prefers modest anonymity, just as in the sharp, acute hours of the revolutionary struggle he is inclined to solitary deliberations. This is the personal reason. As we have said, there is also a political reason. Had Losovsky signed Losovsky, everybody would say: Is it possible that in the questions of the trade union movement, we really have nothing better than this? But seeing the signature of Radovoy (rank and filer) under the article, the well-meaning reader retains the possibility of saying: We must admit that Radovoy is a sorry scribbler. But nevertheless we still have Losovsky.

Another New Talent

Only a few months have elapsed since it was declared throughout the Comintern by command of Molotov that the ideological struggle against "Trotskyism" must be considered at an end. Well? The publications of the Comintern, beginning with the publications of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, are once more devoting an innumerable amount of columns and pages to the struggle against "Trotskyism". Even the most honorable Pokrovsky, who is burdened with the labors of instructing the youth, has been moved to the front trenches. This corresponds approximately to the period in the imperialist war when Germany resorted to the mobilization of those forty-five and fifty years old. This fact alone would suggest serious fears for the condition of the Stalinist front. Fortunately, the Nestor of the Marxist historiography has not only grand-children but even great grand-children. One of them is S. Novikov, the author of an article on the autobiography of L.D. Trotsky. This young talent immediately established a record by showing that one can fill one and a half printed pages without presenting a single fact or formulating a single idea. Such an exceptional gift could be developed only under the direction of an experienced master. And we involuntarily ask ourselves: Was it not Manuilsky, in the hours free from the direction of the Comintern, that nourished Novikov at his breast, this blessed baby of the "third period"? Or perhaps Manuilsky had no need of bringing up the young talent? Maybe Manuilsky simply made use...of his own talents? We will not tire the reader any longer: Novikov is Manuilsky. The same one who in 1918 wrote that Trotsky—no more, no less!—liberated Russian Bolshevism from national limitations and made it a world ideological current. Now, Manuilsky writes, that Stalin freed Bolshevism from Trotskyism and by that definitely strengthened it as an ideological current of the solar system.

But are we not mistaken in identifying the little Novikov with the great Manuilsky? No, we are not mistaken. We did not come to this conclusion lightly, and not by guessing, but through zealous investigation, to be exact: we read five lines at the beginning of the article and five lines at the end. More than that, we hope, nobody will demand of us. But why should Manuilsky hide under the signature of Novikov, somebody will ask? Isn't this clear? To have people think: If Novikov is so invincible then how must Manuilsky himself be! By the way, we will not repeat ourselves: The motives are the same for which Losovsky turned into Radovoy. These people are in need of reincarnation, like shiny pants—of a chemical cleaning.

CORRECTION

In the letter from South Africa by comrade C. Frank Glass published in the March 29, 1930 issue of the Militant, an unfortunate error occurred. The third paragraph read: "The cause which led to the severance of my connection with the C.P. was the newly adopted policy laid down by the C.I. This policy, with its central slogan of 'An Independent Native Republic, with autonomy for national minorities' (meaning the whites mainly) was one to which I was unable to subscribe." It should have read: "The cause which led to the severance of my connection with the C.P. was the newly adopted policy, subsequently confirmed and extended by the C.I., under the central slogan of autonomy for national minorities."

Opposition Problems

Deeper into the Party!

By JAMES P. CANNON

In a previous article on the character and limits of our faction reference was made to the experiences of the German Leninbund, and to the flabbiness of principle which brought it to impotence and ruin. In this case, as always, confusion and looseness on principle questions were bound up with errors in tactics which contributed to and hastened the debacle. One of the greatest errors of the Leninbund in this field, as the results have shown was its false attitude toward the Party. In common with the entire International Opposition we have drawn the lessons of the split in the Leninbund and reacted to a firmer intransigence in regard to principle questions. We must make use of these lessons also in determining our attitude toward the Party. It is particularly necessary now because we stand on the eve of new developments in the Party which will be vitally affected by our tactics.

A Question of Tactics

For us this is a tactical question. We do not make a fetish of the Party organization; our disregard of the bureaucrats' "discipline" is a sufficient indication that we do not put the form before the substance. What we are concerned with at the present moment is the composition of the Party, its influence among the radical workers and the present relation of forces in the struggle in the Communist ranks.

Our task is to win over the workers' vanguard to the platform of the Opposition. A tactic which gives us the best approach to them is the one we must seek and apply. A tactic which hampers our approach to them is wrong on the face of it. Such a tactic would block the path of future development for the Opposition.

Where are the American revolutionary workers today? This question we must answer first of all. Unless we close our eyes to all reality we have to recognize that the great bulk of revolutionary workers who play an active role in the class struggle today are in the Party, and around the Party. The Party has the unquestionable hegemony in the Left wing labor movement. Take the needle trades as an example. It is true that Communist influence has declined as a result of the monstrous errors of the Party leadership; but the Party remains the decisive leading force in the Left wing. The same thing applies to other fields, for instance, the miners'. There are many Communist workers not in the Party; there are many who have dropped out of the Party—thousands of them—but they are not an organized force.

It is possible, with an aggressive policy and an energetic independent activity, to reach some of these revolutionary workers directly and bring them into the ranks of our organization. This we must do. But the main road of approach to them is through the Party. Under the present circumstances and relation of forces a complete break with the Party—a course toward the organization of another Party—would weaken, not strengthen our connection with the Left wing workers who are sympathetic to Communism.

This relation is not fixed and final for all time; it simply determines the attitude for the present and the near future. In comrade Trotsky's letter published in the Militant some months ago he expressed the opinion that the relation of forces in America justified an orientation on our part toward the formation of an independent party. We did not agree with it at the time and we thought comrade Trotsky would change his opinion when he received more complete and detailed material on the situation in the Communist and Left wing labor movement. This proved to be case, as attested by a second letter from him.

Need Flexible Tactics

The peculiarities of our position as a body of expelled Communists impose upon us a flexibility of tactics. Dogmatic narrowness and one-sidedness will be fatal to our future development. We are confronted with the necessity of maintaining our position as a fraction of the Party, despite the prohibition of the officialdom, and at the same time of developing an independent organization with its own independent activities and its own discipline. To combine these tasks, to make each supplement the other is our problem.

The most important means of approach to the Party members is the tactic of the united front with the Party. Our participation in the demonstration for the Indian revolution was an excellent illustration of this policy and we must follow more energetically in the future. On the same order is our offer to participate in the New York election campaign, our repeated attempts to enter into joint class struggle action with the official Party in behalf of the unemployed, the class war prisoners, etc. By these means we are continually refuting in action the slanders of the Party overseers against us and gaining in the sympathy of the Communist workers.

The Centrist leaders are always aroused to the greatest fury by our attempts to make a united front with the Party in common struggle against the class enemy. And that fact ought to be instructive for our own members. The bureaucrats fear our contact with the Party workers on the firing line of the class struggle. They fear the influence of our example. They fear our arguments and our slogans. They want to tear us away from all contact with the proletarian Communists. This ambition of theirs is quite understandable. But we must not help them realize it by false tactics.

The Party—that is the Party membership—is not a dead body. It is a living organism constantly under the pressure of the class struggle. It cannot be kept in a strait-jacket. The Party reacts to events. It is influenced by criticism—especially so when the Party members see the criticism confirmed in life. Things which have just recently happened in the Party and others which are in a course of preparation bear out this contention.

A long time after the echoes of our expulsion had died down in the Party, after it seemed on the surface, that all our contact was broken—the Party was startled a few weeks ago by another bombshell. This was the declaration of Hugo Oehler for the platform of the Opposition followed the next week by a whole group of young Communists in New York. There are more to come. Just the other day we received a letter from a comrade in a city where we had no supporters up till now. The letter states that a number of comrades have been reading the Militant very attentively for some time and that they are about ready to make a declaration in our behalf. Hardly a week goes by without similar news.

There can no longer be any doubt that our propaganda is penetrating into the Party ranks and influencing the Communist workers more and more as they see it borne out by events. What is happening now is not the adhesion of isolated individuals here and there, but the beginning of a movement for the Opposition. We are breaking through the wall reared against us by the Centrist leadership. The second layer of Oppositionists is taking shape in the Party.

The Character of the New Movement

The new movement for the Opposition shows certain distinctive features. Its main current is made up of the best types of proletarian Communists who have been attempting to carry out the policy of the Party on the battle-field of the class struggle. Here they are confronted with the contradiction between the bluff and the fakery of the Party jacks-in-office and the realities of the situation. The more these comrades in the field try to apply the official policy the more they bump their heads against this contradiction. The result is a gradual awakening to the fact that something is amiss.

They begin to criticize and to propose modifications, and are met with accusations of "Right wing tendencies" and threats of discipline. The swivel-chair generals in the Party office have no sympathy for the grievances and complaints of the fighters in the field. Slogans and "instructions" cost the Browders nothing; they don't have to carry them out. Therefore they can be as bombastic as language will allow. Not so the Party workers in the field.

Deprived of the right to discuss anything really important in the official Party channels, the comrades begin to discuss among themselves. The gap between them and the leadership widens. This process has been going on now for a long time. That it has not exploded before now in a faction struggle over questions of current policy is accounted for by the terror regime in the Party and the lack of "prominent" leaders. This lack of leadership is not altogether a minus quality. While it retards the open manifestations of the proletarian current it drives it deeper into itself, compels it to weigh the questions more carefully and to relate them to the fundamental issues.

The logic of the situation drives the proletarian revolt in the Party toward the platform of the Opposition. Only on that basis can it develop into a real power. There are some who understand this already but who shrink from its implications. To think the conflicts through to the end means to connect the contradictions in local policy with the national, and the national with the international. This leads inevitably to a consideration of the standpoint of the Opposition. To study the platform of the Opposition objectively and honestly means, for a conscientious worker Communist, to support it. This means "disgrace". Loss of "position". Expulsion. Slander. The severing of social relations and other trifles. Some fear this. Others go forward resolutely and tell the truth to the Party. Such a type is Hugo Oehler. There will be other Oehlers.

Closer Bonds with the Ranks

It is our most important task at the moment to establish closer bonds with this coalescing proletarian movement in the Party and help it to take shape as a genuine political force. We must help from a political standpoint. We must stimulate its organization.

Regardless of the vacillations of some of the potential leaders, this movement in the proletarian ranks of the Party will develop and go forward. It will do this because it is rooted in the deepest needs of the Party of the proletariat to coordinate its policy with the realities of the class struggle. And this is not a question of empirical and short-sighted shrewdness and practicality. It is a question, in the last analysis of the Marxist fundamentals on the main issues of international import from which, and only from which, the correct everyday tactics flow. To make this clear to the revolting workers in the Party ranks is the task of the Leninist Opposition. In order to do this we must have the closest contact with the Party. We must go deeper into the Party. The decisive trend of this movement in our direction, already noticeable, is a justification of our attitude toward the Party. The successful development of the movement into a new fighting regiment for Leninism will confirm these tactics beyond all further dispute.

As the new developments show, the Party cannot be judged by the apparatus. With most of these people political stultification has been blended with moral corruption, and their reclamation is beyond the power of politics. Not to trust them, but to fight them; not to count on them for the regeneration of the Party but to see that they will be its first victims—that is our attitude toward them. It is different with the Communist worker who has no axe to grind. Let us not forget this distinction.

Our Independent Activity

One way—and one of the very best ways—to give real support to those comrades fighting for our views inside the Party is to increase the independent activity of the Communist League. The stronger we are as an independent force, the more rapid will be our progress in the Party ranks. The steps we have taken since the Plenum of our National Committee toward the formation of an Opposition group in the needle trades unions as an independent factor has a special value and importance in this regard.

We cannot foretell every fluctuation of the struggle for Leninism in the Communist movement nor the forms it will always take. The main tasks and the main line, however, are clear to us. Under a shower of slander we are organizing the fundamental nucleus of the future Communist Party and we must connect this nucleus with the larger body of worker revolutionaries and win them for our platform. At the present stage of the struggle—which we visualize as a long one—it is above all a fight for the Party. A clear understanding of this will hasten our victory.

The Truth About the Bolivian «Revolution»

The much talked of "revolution" in Bolivia is nothing more than a change of power from the hands of one clique to another of the same semi-feudal military exploiting class. It is one of those many "revolutions" so frequent in the turbulent and instable "democracies" of Latin America at the same time that it reflects the struggle between those elements favorable to British imperialism attempting to scratch the political control of the country from the hands of those indisputably on side of the North American bankers.

The recent occurrences in Bolivia have not the revolutionary class character that the Daily Worker gives them when it states in a recent issue that the workers and peasants almost captured power, which the Party organ interprets as proof that the revolutionary movement in Latin America is becoming "deepened and extended". In other issues of the Daily Worker during the last few days declarations are made in the sense that the Bolivian masses, truly viciously exploited by financial capital are already completely radicalized in the spirit of the "Third Period". This is a false and childish method of analyzing the situation, born perhaps of the desire to make it appear that a real mass movement exists throughout Latin America. "Revolutions" of the Bolivian type, in countries where the mass of the population is made up of peasants with few workers, and where no true class consciousness has yet developed, always turn out to be means by which certain cliques of the exploiting classes dispute for power and for the right to serve imperialist interests.

The state of disorganization of the toilers of Bolivia, in the mines as well as in the countryside could not be less promising. In Bolivia there is no Communist party, nor for that matter any real working class organization. Under these circumstances how could the workers and peasants take power. With this state of affairs, to speak of the workers and peasants almost capturing power, results only in cheap phrase-mongering; it is a miserable bluffing attitude towards the workers that read the Party's press, disfiguring the facts.

At the present time the only ones who have profited by the Bolivian revolution are certain military groups, some of the liberal petty-bourgeois elements and British imperialism, this latter only, in case the new regime does not reach an understanding with United States finance capital. These internal struggles among the exploiters in order to steal the booty from one another, offer an impulse to the masses for spontaneous participation in street fighting where they serve the ends of the opposition group, and as soon as the workers and peasants demand certain concessions bettering their conditions, they find the machine guns turned on them for the restoration of "order" and the "pacification" of the country.

A situation similar to that in Bolivia existed in Ecuador in 1925, and there were many comrades who interpreted the military rebellion at that time as a "social revolution", while others thought that a petty bourgeois democratic revolution had taken place; in reality it was nothing but a replacement of the dull swords of the old military chiefs for the sharper, newer ones of the younger elements.

Facts should not be exaggerated in this manner. A real analysis of each situation should be made in order to draw correct conclusions so as to better orientate the revolutionary movement of Latin America in particular and the international movement in general.

Trotsky's Autobiography has proved to be a dangerous subject for critics of his standpoint to review. The bad luck of the New Masses with this enterprise has not only caused these dilettantes to regret their venture into the field of politics; it has frightened away others who once posed as experts on the menace of Trotskyism. The Revolutionary Age announced in a previous issue that it would review the book, but in the intervening period it thought better of this rash promise. It serves up instead a quotation from a German paper of the Right wing. We would like to know what Lovestone has to say about the book. Or does he intend to surrender leadership in the struggle against Trotskyism to the New Leader, the New Masses, and the Daily Worker?

A Review and Criticism

The Communists in the South

By HUGO OEHLER

Success or failure of any struggle depends on how wide your first break is, and how fast you follow this up with additional attacks before the bosses can mobilize a counter attack. This is true in every stage of the development of the struggle. For example in Passaic, the first attack of the workers was followed up with not one but several victories before the bosses could begin an important counter-attack.

If our first attack is not broadened before the bosses answer, we are not so able to withstand these blows but if we make big inroads and then the bosses attack, it is not felt so easily and we can not only better withstand their blows but answer them much faster before the bosses can follow up.

Such was not our fortune in Gastonia. Our mass picketing was very good, but did not enable us to follow up this first point with anything of consequence. The bosses answered the first blow with the Loray Committee of 100, organized from overseers, thugs and superintendents, led by Major Bulwinkle of Loray Mill. To this was added wholesale arrests by the local police and the cavalry terror, the church and the local press. April 10th the cavalry was removed and 35 deputized American Legion men replaced them. In the meantime the National Textile Workers Union was doing its best to push ahead. Several hundred struck in Bessemer City several miles from Gastonia. The small force of organizers who had strike experience were pressed to handle this mass of determined but inexperienced workers.

The Strike in Full Swing

By April the 15th the strike was in full swing with the W.I.R., the I.L.D., and Communist youth handling the work. The use of police, militia, gunmen and press could be expected.

We did not have long to wait. On April 18, a bosses' mob, under police and deputy protection wrecked the union office in a well-planned fashion. The demolishing of the W.I.R. supplies and the continual wholesale evictions, arrests and intimidations of strikers through the rest of April and in May showed us that the bosses were gaining in the counter attack.

In this whole period from the strike to the mob terror the spirit of the strike rose and repulsed each attack with sacrifice and determination but without effective counter-offense, entirely confined to counter-defense. In this period of attack on the workers we could have answered in a more positive way, if our leading force had been handled right.

Half the time Beal and the other leading comrades were sent back and forth from Elizabethton to Lexington, etc. hundreds of miles with most of those in the Gastonia area handicapped and those in New York ordering these drives as though they were sending some one from New York City to Passaic. Such a broadening out activity and especially in relation to A.F.L. activity must be carried on but not at the expense of our base and Southern center and that only further played into the hands of a powerful enemy attacking us on all sides in the Gastonia area.

Added to this improper draining of the field center was the sending of comrades such as Crouch and Pershing, etc., who may be able to function some places under proper leadership but who only "messed things up" in the strike area with bombastic disconnected "radicalism".

This first mob action and police attacks were answered by rebuilding and continuing the work. Broken picket lines were reformed. Throughout the country the issue was raised for Gastonia and funds started to flow in to help. Mass meetings were held daily at the Union headquarters in Gastonia and workers for many miles around came in and asked for organizers for their mill towns. Hundreds were signed up into the Union from all parts of the area. The "unorganizable" were starting to organize.

The rebuilding and recruiting inspired the hope and the stubborn picket lines reformed ranks. The union planned to follow this drive with a new drive on July 1 to close the mill. This belated attack was known to the Committee of 100 before it materialized and the terror of the thugs increased with a plan of ending it all before the new drive would start.

The Company's plan, like the union's fell short with the murderous raid of Chief Aderholt and his death through the workers' self defense on June 7. The planned drive of the union was transformed into a counter attack of the law with the Committee of 100 to follow up and clean them out. The first part of this counter attack of the bosses' legal troops was transformed into their defeat by the heroic action of the striking textile workers. The bosses force followed up the June 7th raid with terror for a week, wholesale arrest, intimidation, searching of homes, beatings, attempted lynching of Beal and others who were jailed.

With the entire force of active strikers and leaders arrested, held without right of bail, the police closed the destroyed tent colony and union headquarters and reaction and terror rode the country.

In this atmosphere came the national representatives of the W.I.R. and I.L.D. and although at first arrested and intimidated the W.I.R. took the lead and opened a new tent colony with the I.L.D. preparing for legal aid. This force brought new hope to the shattered and scattered forces of blacklisted, arrested, evicted and terrorized textile workers.

One of the outstanding weaknesses of our work brought to the surface by this period of reaction following June 7th was that all members recruited in the union were admitted through the Gastonia central office AND IN THIS WHOLE PERIOD NO MILL LOCALS HAD BEEN SET UP, yet we had plenty of material and time to do so. If a few mill locals had been set up the union would have been able to weather this storm in a far greater stable fashion and chaos would not have reigned. And instead of the auxiliary organizations reorganizing and laying a base they would have acted in a helpful secondary fashion and on the whole we would have been able to answer this with greater success.

The mill bosses through the control of Gaston County and the City of Gastonia government as well as the state government, lost no time and indicted 23 for murder—16 for first degree murder.

The fact that the union did not answer this attack and indictment and replace Beal at once, lost our forces valuable time that as far as the Loray strike was concerned could not be made up.

The new force sent in over a month after this terror, July 12th, inherited the strike of Loray and Bessemer that weeks before had been settled as far as life and immediate demands were concerned but a strike that was still officially on. On top of this they inherited the bombastic action of the fly by night organizers sent in, and add to this, the loss of records and chaotic conditions of the union forces after this month period.

The Sources of Manuilsky and Co.

Manuilsky is now drooling about the "Bonapartist" tendencies of Trotsky. The cheap Bohemia of the New Masses and other publication of the same type have also seized on this theme. For these people, Bonapartism is an individual feature of character and not a regime flowing from class relations, from the policy of veering between classes. Where must one's eyes be to discover at present Bonapartism in the Opposition when all the preparations for the Sixteenth Congress represent a repitition, a rehearsal of Bonapartism on the Party proscenium!

But we do not wish to raise here general questions, but to contribute some historical data on the source of the spiritual inspiration of Manuilsky and his American and other pupils.

In 1923 a book by Oskar Blum appeared in Germany giving the personal characteristics of the leaders of the revolution. This book was first to discover in Trotsky signs of the "new Corsican". Before we give a characterization of the book, however, it is necessary to say a few words about the author.

In the period of the first revolution, Oskar Blum was considered a social democrat and a Marxist, a partisan of Plekhanov. In the years of reaction he was suspected of connections with the gendarmerie. Arriving from Riga to Vienna, he addressed himself to Trotsky with a request to help him re-establish his revolutionary honor. On the basis of his own tales, Trotsky came to the conclusion that Blum could not be tolerated in the revolutionary ranks. After the revolution of 1917, documents were found which proved conclusively that Blum was in the employ of the gendarmerie of Riga. Blum was arrested and afterwards, through someone's thoughtlessness, he was freed from jail after which he fled abroad where he published the book about the leaders of the revolution. The general character of the book can be sufficiently determined by the character of its author: it is scurrilous libel.

A Plagiarist from Oskar Blum

A review of Blum's book was printed in the organ of the Bureau of Party History, Proletarian Revolution, in November, 1923, when the campaign of the epigones against Trotsky was already being widely diffused. Nevertheless, in that period, the brains of the Party and the Comintern were not yet piled up with the tons of gossip and slander and generally with all kinds of refuse, and the official publications had not yet gotten out of the habit of using the language they were writing in Lenin's time. The author of the article in the Proletarian Revolution, not knowing that Blum had sufficient personal reasons to be dissatisfied with Trotsky observed in bewilderment the particular viciousness of Blum with regards to Trotsky.

"Therefore", it says in the review, "he let loose at Trotsky. Here the author puts into motion his whole baggage of the most impossible lies, slanders and charlatanism. In the face, the beard, the lips—in everything he anxiously looks for confirmation for his calumnious words. First of all—power. 'He (Trotsky) wanted the revolution,' it says there, 'because he wanted himself. Others spoke about the seizure of power because they considered the historical moment ripe for the transfer of power to the last powerless class. He spoke about the seizure of power because he considered himself ready to take possession of the power.' (Page 83.) In the building of 'Trotsky's ministry' exemplary order and cleanliness prevail. Aha! This is the secret of Trotsky's personal power. In Trotsky's military orders, military style is felt—Aha! There are the signs of the new Corsican. And the palace guard, and the body guard—true, not in gilded livery, but—in the orderly uniform of the Red Guard!... The pamphlet ends with a transparent insinuation: 'Material power is in his hands. What next?' (Proletarian Revolution, November 23, 1923, pages 247-248).

Now take Manuilsky's article on Trotsky's "Autobiography". Take the review of the New Masses and the rest of the reptile press: In what do they differ from Oskar Blum? In nothing. What have they added to his revelations? Nothing. Their writings are a direct plagiarism from the stipendiary of the Riga gendarmerie. Is it not because these gentlemen themselves have the psychology of stipendiaries, which is irreconcilable with the psychology of revolutionists?

Lenin on the Libellers of Trotsky

At any rate, the source of Manuilsky's inspiration is revealed very accurately. This, however is not the only incident. There is a more important one which, by the way, has already been quoted by the Opposition, but we will bring it to mind once more because it has incomparable conviction. It is known that the whole campaign against "Trotskyism" began with the question of the peasantry. Contrary to Lenin, Trotsky is supposed to have underestimated the peasantry in general and the middle peasant in particular. The epigones have forgotten the source of this legend. Nevertheless it is rooted in the agitation carried on by the White Guards among the peasants during the Civil War. Lenin, in his day, took advantage of the first suitable occasion in order to dispose of this legend. These are his own words:

"In the Izvestia of February 7th, there appeared a letter from the peasant G. Gulov, who asks about the relation of our Workers and Peasants gov-

The Lying Campaign

Some of our Jewish comrades may have read the account of the India demonstration given in the Freiheit. In the midst of overwhelming paragraphs describing the heroism of the workers in defending their demonstration, was a short reference to the part played by the Communist League of America (Opposition).

The Freiheit reported that we appeared, surrounded by a bodyguard of detectives. According to the reporter, our only purpose in attending the meeting was to advertise our organ, the Militant. Probably the reporter was too exhausted by his struggles to read the whole of the placard displayed by the Communist League of America (Opposition). Or perhaps it is more convenient to forget that our banner, as well as those of the Party, supported the Indian Revolution.

The comrades made short work of us "counter-revolutionaries" prevented our breaking up of the meeting, and destroyed our papers and leaflets, says the article. In spite of the confident report of the Freiheit, however, many of our members remarked the sympathy of the surrounding Party comrades. Most of them objected to, rather than helped in, the work of dispersing us. This in itself is a significant fact. It seems that they are beginning to realize that in a matter, such as the Indian demonstration, in which we are at one with the Party, to divide forces and fight among ourselves is the stupidest folly, and the best inducement to police intervention.

Having dubbed us "renegades", the program. In spite of the persistent lies, Party cannot reconcile this supposed character of the Left Opposition with our continued support of the correct part of its however, Party members are becoming more and more sympathetically inclined towards the Left Opposition.

ernment to the middle peasantry, and speaks of rumors to the effect that Lenin and Trotsky are not in harmony, that there are big disagreements between them, and especially upon this subject of the middle peasant.

Comrade Trotsky has already given his answer in Izvestia for February 7. Comrade Trotsky says that the rumors of disagreement between him and me are a monstrous lie, propagated by the landlords and capitalists or their conscious or unconscious servitors. I, upon my part, fully confirm this statement of comrade Trotsky. There are no disagreements between him and me, and, in regard to the middle peasants there are no disagreements not only between Trotsky and me, but in general in the Communist Party of which we are both members.

Comrade Trotsky in his letter explained clearly and in detail why the Party of the Communists and the present workers and peasants government elected by the Soviets and members of that Party do not consider the middle peasants their enemies. I subscribe with both hands to everything Trotsky wrote." (Lenin Vol. XIV, pp. 28-29, Pravda, No. 35, February, 1919).

This is the way the epigones and their office-holders, among them also the so-called Friends of the Soviet Union, simply repeat for a number of years what Lenin in 1919 characterized as "lies spread by landowners, etc., or their conscious or unconscious servitors."

This is how sadly matters stand. And not by accident. Centrism is not very inventive. It is ideologically poor and possesses a short memory. When this intermediary, shaky, unprincipled current leads a struggle against the revolutionary wing, it must necessarily borrow conclusions from the Right wing. It has none of its own and by its very nature, it can not have. And because by the logic of the struggle, Centrism is compelled to deepen its accusations against "Trotskyism" it is by that itself compelled to look for all the more muddy sources of inspiration. On this road matters have reached plagiarism of Manuilsky and Co. from the agent of the Okhrana, Oskar Blum.

What next?

THE YOUNG VANGUARD

The League's New «Plan of Action»

During the first weeks of the execution of the so-called Plan of Action adopted by the National Executive Committee of the Young Communist League, we predicted that it could not be successfully accomplished with the present false policies and opportunist regime. No doubt there were many members of the Y.C.L. who really believed that our prophecies were based on nothing but a malicious desire to see the Plan fail. But the facts of reality are daily demonstrating that the criticism of the Left Opposition is based on a thorough Marxian evaluation of the situation. The unvarnished fact of the matter is that June 30, the last day of the Plan, revealed an enormous disproportion between the figures on paper and the negligible gains actually made. Did the N.E.C. attempt to make an objective political analysis of the situation and initiate a discussion in the ranks on the basis of the experience of the last few months? To be sure not! For to do so would expose the complete bankruptcy of its false ultra-Left line. Instead there is much yelling that the membership of the Y.C.L. is not doing enough work, that they are substituting phrases for deeds, and that, forsooth, is a very crass expression for the «Left» danger itself.

The New «Shock Plan»

In order to evade drawing the balance of the so-called Plan of Action, it has been renovated, refurbished with a new name—Shock Plan—and extended for three months, to September 30. This however, will not prevent every sincere member of the Y.C.L. from putting the question squarely to himself (and honestly trying to discover the underlying cause of the whole unsavory situation).

Paper plans cannot be substituted for a correct line grounded on the actual situation among the young workers. Administrative decisions and bureaucratic commands and noise. The Shock Plan is a combination of all these negative qualities. It is a screen for all the recent failures, and an artificial attempt to make good all these reverses. An examination of its measures condemn it as an adventurist enterprise.

First, the Plan calls for a whole series of industrial youth conferences. These conferences are to be held in eight different industries—all by September 30. The industries are: textile, needle trades, mining, steel auto, metal mining, lumber and agriculture. The N.E.C. in all its recent resolutions and theses has recognized an unsatisfactory situation in the Y.C.L. But now, the Y.C.L. has acquired such immense strength and vitality, such resources, so many forces and organizers, that it can simultaneously in the period of a few months enter eight different industries of the United States, and can successfully carry on campaigns which will culminate in mass—mind you, the Plan says «mass»—youth conferences. Do the Steubens, Harveys, Greens, and the other marionettes, who place all these directives so easily on paper, understand the significance of these grandiose schemes? Is this not stupid and criminal adventurism? Can't these light-minded people realize that it would be far better to concentrate on some one or two industries—yes, we are modest and sensible enough to ask for only one or two—where the objective conditions are most favorable and really hold a successful mass youth conference? Whom are these bureaucrats trying to befuddle with their loud prattle?

Second, the Plan, as part of its recruitment quota, calls for the gaining of 500 young Negro workers for the Y.C.L. Here the inventors of the Shock Plan really become realistic. In order to win 500 young Negro workers it is necessary to do mass Negro work, you understand. This is actually stated in the Plan. So in addition to carrying on mass campaigns in eight industries, we are going to hold mass—nothing but mass, mind you—Negro youth conferences against lynching in seven League districts by August 15, and by September 30 we are going to have a mass (note well!—mass) Negro youth organization affiliated to the American Negro Labor Congress (another mass organization whose existence is grossly exaggerated). Presto! It is done.

And thirdly, in addition to waging mass campaigns in eight industries and holding Negro youth conferences in seven districts by August 15 which must culminate in a mass youth organization affiliated to the A.N.L.C. by September 30, we are going to have, unquestionably, mass unemployment youth conferences and a National Youth Unemployment Day Demonstration on August 20. And of course it goes without saying that by September 30, we will

Scranton Police Seize Communist Workers

Five workers arrested last week in Scranton and charged with sedition are facing 20 years in prison. They were jailed when the anthracite mine owners and their flunkies in political office feared that a strike of 1,200 members of the United Mine Workers Union for equalization of work would develop into a militant struggle led by the National Miners Union. The strike however, was short-lived as the Lewis-Boylan machine ordered the men to return to work.

Those arrested, and held in jail for the Fall Grand Jury are: Dan Slinger, district organizer, National Miners Union; John Little, youth organizer, Trade Union Unity League; Sylvan A. Pollack, district organizer, International Labor Defense; Joe Tash, National Executive Board member, N.M.U.; and Phil Frankfeld, Communist Party organizer. Joe Tash was arrested when speaking at a mass meeting at Dunmore where he was exposing the Lewis machine. The others were taken into custody the following day when state troopers and deputy sheriffs raided the headquarters of the I.L.D. and N.M.U. in Scranton. Without a warrant they placed the workers also transform the Labor Sports Union into a mass organization and win a mass circulation for the Young Worker, as well as double the League membership, create 48 shop nuclei, 85 shop bulletins, and recruit 10,000 young workers into the T.U.U.L. «That is what we, Bolsheviks, call a genuine attack.» (Stalin). This last quotation confirms the correct line of the Shock Plan.

On September 30, let every member of the Y.C.L. demand an accounting. Let him demand the truth and not be satisfied with specious figures. Then let him draw his own conclusions.

under arrest, confiscated all books, records and letters and took the organizers to the state police barracks where they were photographed and finger-printed. Only after being held 10 hours were they charged with sedition. Since the arrests several more raids have been made on the headquarters, a move to smash the militant labor movement being the apparent objective.

The International Labor Defense which is conducting the defense of the five workers must develop a broad united front movement for their liberation. Not only the N.M.U. locals which are very weak, but the rank and file of the U.M.W. must be appealed to and asked to participate in the campaign. This is an issue that can be used to strengthen the Left wing movement in the anthracite if properly handled. If a sectarian defense campaign is allowed to be conducted, conviction of the five workers is certain and the many class war prisoners in the United States will have new recruits. On the other hand, a real united front movement will not only be a step for the freedom of the arrested workers but a reservoir of strength for the Left wing movement in general and the N.M.U. in particular.

nounce thinking through a passion for «literature», do not necessarily renounce honorable and decent editorial conduct.

What is your real reason?

Either you backed down because you are too cowardly to print Trotsky's classification of you, or else you consulted your masters, the bureaucrats of the Workers Party, and they forbade you to print the letter.

Either position marks off your paper completely from The Masses, from which it borrowed its name. And yet I notice you have chosen just this moment to get out a new line of publicity giving what you call «the autobiography of the New Masses», in which you falsely pretend that it is a mere continuation of the Masses and The Liberator. Have you forgotten that your publicity when you started the magazine was to the opposite effect? What is the reason for this change? Is this one more trick suggested by your bureaucratic masters for grabbing prestige at the expense both of sincere ideals and real facts? Did it not once occur to you while you were composing that sweet history, and using my name in advertising your magazine, that it might be honest to mention among those other charming incidents the fact that I resigned from the Executive Board of New Masses stating that I despised its sly pussy-footing policies and total lack of intellectual and moral courage?

Yours sincerely,

MAX EASTMAN

Camp Nitgedaiget in Boston

BOSTON—

Another Left wing organization is being «organized» under the leadership of a few Party members: the cooperative camp Nitgedaiget of Boston. When the camp was founded in 1927, individuals as well as organizations were approached to buy shares. One of its shareholders is John Reed Branch 718 of the Workmen's Circle, and like most shareholders participated in camp affairs and contributed toward its establishment.

To the opening of the camp this season, Branch 718 was formally invited as usual to the banquet and responded by sending a delegate with instructions to buy another share. The branch in turn felt that Camp Nitgedaiget is its home and applied for the camp grounds for its annual outing which was to take place on June 29.

The board of directors of the camp extended their welcome to Branch 718 and all was fine and dandy, until a few days before the outing was to take place a letter was received by the secretary of 718 stating the withdrawal of the invitation to the branch for its outing, due to the fact that the board of directors suddenly realized that the John Reed Branch is a Right wing organization.

Did not this realization come a bit late in view of the fact that 718 was invited to the camp banquet not so long ago?

And now a question to the ex-manager of Camp Nitgedaiget who is now chairman of Branch 718: How does your own medicine taste, Mr. Robinson? We still remember last summer when the shoe workers of Boston were on strike and a committee came to camp with an effort to raise funds for the strikers. Mr. Robinson bitterly attacked the shoe workers' committee for coming on his ground to exploit his workers and was greatly in favor of putting the committee out of the camp.

It is interesting also to hear some of the members of 718 crying for a free platform for discussion when we recall an incident of about a year and a half ago when comrade Cannon was in Boston and our branch of the Communist League (Opposition) appealed for the platform and was rejected by these very members. It seems that it makes a difference into whose window the stone falls.

We hope that the camp board of directors will realize before it is too late the detrimental policy they are adopting in barring workers from the camp grounds while the members of 718 should, in the future, think for themselves and not be ruled by the iron hand of a clique. —C.D.

LENIN AND THE YOUTH

The Young Vanguard, beginning with this present issue will publish a number of important documents and statements by Lenin concerning the youth.

The importance of such publication is manifest although I, one were to judge by the neglect of this elementary educational work by the official Y.C.L., which wastes tons of paper on harmful drivel, one would not at all think so.

All young workers should read these fundamental documents.

In this first installment we publish the Resolution proposed by Lenin at the Second Congress of the Russian Social Democrats in 1903 on the attitude towards the student youth.

Previous to 1905, the various political parties of Russia obtained their propagandists and agitators from the students. This to a large extent included the working class party. With the clearing of the atmosphere that resulted from the storm of the 1905 revolution, and subsequent sharpening of the class war the situation changed and the intelligentsia of which the student youth is a section, gravitated toward their own petty bourgeois and bourgeois parties.—Eds.)

CONCERNING THE STUDENTS

Resolution moved by comrade Lenin on the attitude towards Students

(Passed at the Second Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party held in 1903, with the exception of that portion in parentheses.)

This Second Congress of the Russian Social Democratic Labor Party welcomes the revival of independent revolutionary activity among the student youth, calls upon all branches of the Party to render every possible aid to the youth in its strivings to organize and recommends to all groups and student circles: first, to make it their first duty to imbue their members with a complete philosophy and to get them to study Marxism seriously on the one hand, and Russian Narodnik-ism and West European opportunism on the other as the principle opposing groups within the modern fighting progressive tendencies. Secondly, to beware of the false friends of the youth who are distracting it from serious revolutionary education by rapid, revolutionary, idealistic phraseology and philistine chatter about the harm and superfluity of sharp controversy tendencies, for these false friends, as a matter of fact, cultivate merely lack of principle and a frivolous attitude towards revolutionary work, and thirdly) in taking up practical activity to strive to establish connection with social democratic organizations beforehand in order to be able to be guided by their instructions and to avoid as far as possible important errors in the very beginning of the work.

The Wage-Cutting Drive

What Green's Sellout to Hoover and the Bosses Really Means to the American Workers

What's Going On in China?

The Daily Worker, through its great Orientalist Doonping, announces that "the Chinese Revolution advances by leaps and bounds towards the establishment of a Soviet Republics" and that "the red armies grow like snowballs". (D.W. August 9). The stimulant to this latest effusion is the reported operation of the so-called "Communist armies" in the Yangtse Valley (Hunan, Hupeh, Kiangsu and Fukien).

A couple of months ago, its pages plastered with maps and rhetoric, an issue of the Daily Worker appeared greeting the convocation of the "All-Chinese Congress of Soviets". Thereafter with the same startling legerdemain this all-Chinese Congress completely disappeared from the eyes of men, "sunk without a trace". Long, weary weeks afterwards, with the intelligence service of a great state at his disposal, Stalin vaguely referred to this "Soviet Congress" in such terms as "it is said" and "if it is true, it would not surprise us".

Sands of Illusion

The Communist International cannot be built on the shifting sands of illusion. Such scruples however play small part in the factional calculations to those for whom the rising of a Bolivian military clique is a social revolution, a tribal raid is a war against imperialism, five thousand in Union Square are fifty thousand, water turns into wine and the wafer into the body of Christ. Wishes are not facts and we do not propose to replace Marxism by journalistic ballyhoo. We adhere to Lenin's "old-fashioned" practise of calling a spade a spade, and a putsch a putsch. To avoid mere emotionalism, one must retain a clear picture of the character and the perspectives of the Chinese Revolution.

The theses of the Second Congress of the Comintern energetically warned against the danger of permitting petty-bourgeois democratic movements in the colonial countries to masquerade as Communist. What shall we say today when amorphous guerilla bands of socially uprooted soldiery and peasantry have only to use the insignia of the hammer and sickle to be proclaimed as the genuine Soviet emancipators of China? Yet in this confusion for which the Stalin bureaucracy is responsible there is a certain logic. Here is more testimony to the political consequences that flow from the reactionary idea that the next stage in the social development of China is the "democratic dictatorship", in theory the peasant democracy—in fact, the regime either of a Kerensky or Chiang Kai-Shek. Yesterday this famous "democratic dictatorship" was to be realized through the bourgeois Kuomintang; today it is slated to emanate from peasant guerilla warfare. But what of the industrial proletariat... and the Communist Party? In 1925-6-7, the Communist Party was turned into a mere appendage of the Chinese bourgeoisie; in 1930, the fragment of the Communist Party left after the massacres of Chiang Kai-Shek, has become a red-tinctured edition of the "green" peasant parties of Raditch and Stambulisky.

The Third Chinese revolution is inevitable—if its strategy is Marxist, if its leadership is actuated by the recognition of its real driving forces. Between opportunism and putschism the Stalin machine has shown that it can only retard and ruin revolutionary possibilities. In 1925-6-7 the Hardly had the stock market collapse and the mass unemployment that followed right on its heels had time to sink into the minds of the working class than that ever faithful footman of the American capitalist class William Green rushed to the Hoover employers' conference to pledge that he would do all in his power to prevent any strikes in the coming period.

America's industrialists winkingly assured Green, without smiling, that on their part they would not undertake to cut labor's wages.

Green Remains Loyal

Green has of course kept his part of the bargain. In accordance with the role he is paid to play, and has played for years, he has religiously sabotaged any movement of the American workers to fight against the growing impoverishment to which unemployment, speed-up and wage slashing condemn them. He motivates his incessant scabbing with a reference to the employers' "pledge" to "maintain the American wage standard". Here is how it is being maintained:

The National Cash Register Co. of Dayton, Ohio, has put through a 10 percent cut for 6,000 employees.

"Fifty hosiery mills in the United States have abolished extra rates for continuous operation services," says the Labor Bureau, "which amounts to actually decreasing wage earnings, while members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron and Tin Workers in the Youngstown, Ohio district, are to receive 25 cents a ton less as wages during May and June as a result of a decline in the average price of steel bars. Similarly, employees of copper producers in Arizona are to receive a preliminary wage reduction based on the average selling prices of copper during April. 'Average selling prices for May will, of course, be lower and hence another wage reduction will take place on June 1'."

Sixty Wage Cuts

The August bulletin of the Labor Bureau reports 60 distinct wage cuts by as many firms or industries since May. It adds: "The wage truce, supposed to have been agreed to by employers at the Hoover conference early last winter, has been violated by reductions in pay." (Honor to Bill Green who would not violate the gentleman's agreement by organizing strikes against starvation wage cuts!)

These figures are but part of a much greater mass. And they relate only to those workers who have jobs. How about those that are jobless? The Labor Bureau publishes the following

Twelve-Month Comparison of Volume of Employment in percent

1928 to 1929		1929 to 1930
July.....	7	January.....	5
August.....	5	February.....	7
September.....	5	March.....	9
October.....	3	April.....	10
November.....	1-2	May.....	12
December.....	4	June.....	13

These figures represent only the percentage changes in the number employed. No account is taken of part-time employment. It is pointed out that the number of man-hours worked would show an even more drastic downward curve.

The cold figures speak an eloquent language. They show as clear as day that the American capitalist class is working to issue out of its own, crisis by squeezing the last drop out of the working class. The less resistance that is offered the more arrogantly will the bosses proceed to carve deeper into the standards of life hitherto won by the workers. The need for a militant front to include every worker is now more imperative than ever.

For Social Insurance

And for the unemployed, whose fate is so closely linked with that of the worker with a job, the broadest campaign to alleviate their difficulties must be conducted. The costs of the crisis must be shifted to the shoulders of those who profited by the prosperity, the capitalists, and who now want the workers to suffer from the decline. The demand must be raised everywhere for recognition of the Soviet Union and long-term credits to it so that it can commence the purchase of machinery here on a large scale. The demand for social insurance to be paid by the state and the bosses, must be developed until the force behind it cannot be resisted.

The Camorra of Green and Co. has betrayed the workers. They must lead the fight against wage-cutting and unemployment themselves.

Our Class War Prisoners Must Be Freed!

In a few days the third anniversary of the cold-blooded murder of Sacco and Vanzetti will be reached. Their memory, ever green in the heart of the world proletariat, remains a burning appeal for the struggle against class justice and persecution.

While the workers everywhere gather to commemorate their judicial assassination the pledge must be renewed for the fight to release all the class war prisoners who continue to fill the penitentiaries of the bloated plutocracy of this country. At this very moment, a cynical, farcical "hearing" is being held again on the case of Tom Mooney and Warren Billings. The whole miserable edifice of perjury, falsehood and crime built up against them has crumbled long ago. What is left is the hideously naked body of the American frame-up system, the acme of our capitalist culture. At the hearings, the prosecutors boldly declare that irrespective of the evidence relating to the alleged crime proper, they favor the imprisonment of Mooney and Billings because they were labor agitators!

The real crime in the Mooney and Billings case remains, as before, the passivity of the workers who let their fighters rot in prison. Hearing or no hearing, we have learned the bitter lesson sufficiently that no dependence can be put upon the capitalist system. The need of the moment is a broad protest movement to shake the country and liberate the two victims of Californian capitalism.

At the other end of the country, William Foster, Robert Minor, I. Amter and Harry Raymond remain imprisoned on Welfare (!) Island. The "magnanimous" Mayor Walker has kindly consented to have the first three released at the end of six months. Every additional day of their incarceration makes more crying the need for a defense movement that will release them and prevent others to come from taking their place.

In the fight for the release of these men, as for the defense of the Atlanta victims, the Centralia I.W.W., for the Italian Communist Serio, Malkin and others elsewhere, the Left wing must take the initiative and the leadership. Thus far it has failed signally. It is apparently too busy with phrase-mongering about the "Third Period" to carry out such "petty" work as defending the class war prisoners. It must nevertheless be done. And on a broad serious scale. Let the master class learn that they cannot murder and imprison our militants without hearing the reply of the working class!

Is Sylvia Bleeker to Be Expelled?

As we go to press, we are given the following important information:

Comrade Sylvia Bleeker, one of the well known leaders of the Left wing in the needle trades, was barred from attending the meeting of the Party needle trades fraction held in the Workers Center Friday night August 8. The Stalinist appointees in charge of the meeting informed her that she could not attend without a permit from the secretary of the Control Commission of the New York district.

The action is evidently the result of the meeting a week previously of the district Control Commission which comrade Bleeker was instructed to attend. There she was confronted with an anonymous accusation of being a "Trotskyist". In answer to a number of heresy-hunting questions, she replied that she was sympathetic towards the views of the Left Opposition. The Inquisition then demanded that she hand in a written statement of her views.

A Typical Case

The case of comrade Bleeker is undoubtedly typical of scores of other comrades in the Party, whom the ruinous course of the latter has set to thinking fundamentally on the situation in the Communist movement and the issues raised by the international Left Opposition. Comrade Bleeker is not only one of the most prominent militants in the needle trades, but an old devoted Party member. She joined the underground Communist Party in the United States in 1920 to which she had been transferred from the Russian Party, for which she had been carrying on responsible work in Poland during the most critical days of the Russian revolution. Since 1926, she was secretary of the milliners' local 43 of the Zaritsky union, and was one of the leaders in the Left wing fight. She was elected a vice-president and member of the General Executive Board of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union at its foundation, and still occupies the post of organizer of the Headwear Department of the organization. At the recent convention of the N.T.W.I.U., she was removed from the G.E.B. by Johnstone and Co. because of the militant defense of her views on the Party's trade union policies.

The question that now arises is this: is comrade Bleeker to be expelled from the Party by the Browders and their little Perillas because she, like so many others, dares to hold views, entirely Communist, that run counter to the momentarily official dogmas of the Stalinist clique? Thus far, it seems the question of her Party membership is pending. Her expulsion, like that of supporters of the Left Opposition in the past, would constitute a disgraceful act by the Stalinists and deepen the mark of bureaucracy with which their past acts have branded them.

The Aim of the Browders

There are many other in the Party like comrade Bleeker who allow themselves to think, to express their views and to demand the right to discuss the within the limits of Party democracy. Are they all to be expelled? Is the Party to be systematically cut down so that the membership is reduced to the apparatus crust at the top and blinded, gagged, devitalized yes-men at the bottom? Evidently, that is the ideal towards which the Browderian agglomeration is striving.

The National Miners' Union Passes

The National Miners Union has passed like a ghost in the night. After many long months of concentrated bluff in the official Party press about the thousands and tens of thousands of miners who were following the leadership of the N.M.U., about the strikes and demonstrations it was leading, the bubble of bluff has collapsed of internal vacuum. At the "convention" in Pittsburgh of a few dozen miners, representing very little more than themselves, the N.M.U. was quietly interred.

Characteristic of the whole policy of the swindlers now dominating the Party was the manner in which the affair was carried out. To this day, the Daily Worker, which mentioned the convention only casually, has not said a single word about the fact that the N.M.U. no longer exists. Its first and last report on the meeting (a few lines in one issue) says nothing about it. The whole procedure was typically bureaucratic, conducted behind the scenes, without the workers knowing what was going to be done, or, in this case, even being informed about what was done.

How the Retreat is Covered Up

Equally characteristic of the Party bureaucracy is the manner in which this mortifying retreat has been covered up so that it may be proclaimed as "another step forward for the T.U.U.L." In place of the quietly cremated N.M.U., a brand new (but no less weak) organization has been formed, in the same dark hour of the night at which the funeral took place: The Mine, Oil and Smelter Workers Industrial Union!

We won't speak of the "mine workers" in this "new union". But where are the oil workers in it, or the smelter workers? The answer is that they are not in it, and assuming that the Browders and Bedachts continue to ruin the Party's trade union work, there are good grounds to add that they will not be in it. The M.O.S.W.I.U. was formed bureaucratically. No agitation for it among the workers was carried on; there was no preliminary preparation for it among them; there was no official announcement that the N.M.U. was dissolved, or the reasons for it given.

None of this however interests the collective Browders in the slightest. They organize and disorganize unions with the magician's wand of the "third period". What they bring to a tenuous life one day, they kill off the very next. That they discredit the Communist movement, and the movement for organizing the unorganized into new unions, in the process, is of even less concern to them.

There was no good reason for the debacle of the N.M.U. It started off with excellent prospects of growth and authority among the American coal miners. It was strangled by Stalinist arbitrariness and bluff. Capable Left wing and Communist workers who dared to disagree with the crudely false policies of the Stalinist clique running the Party and the N.M.U., were immediately removed from office and expelled from the union. The narrowest, most sectarian policy of isolation was foisted upon the union without ever asking the membership.

No serious attempt was made to organize the unorganized miners: talk and headlines in the Daily Worker were substituted for genuine activity. No serious attempt was made to approach and win over the workers in the Lewis or in the Fishwick-Howat unions: the former were simply labelled "fascist" and the latter "social-fascist", which was taken to mean that the N.M.U. was absolved from the need of working to win them over.

Bluff and Adventurism

In place of competent workers, incompetent and factional hacks were appointed from above—never selected by the miners. The official organ of the union was allowed to die, although the Daily Worker continued to speak without cease about the steady advances being made. Unprecedented bluff was made the order of the day, interspersed with light-hearted adventures like the ill-fated Illinois "mass strike".

A creeping paralysis seized the organization. A movement like the one that broke out in Pittston, with thousands of miners involved, passed by without the N.M.U. influencing it in the slightest (which

The big-hearted boss....

"Oh boys, I'm ruined."

"Business is something fierce."

"This year I've made only $100,000."

"What in God's name can I do?"

"You see for yourselves I've got to cut down your wages!"

did not prevent the Daily Worker from publishing the most monstrous falsehoods about the "N.M.U. leading the miners in a strike against unemployment"). The policies of the Party entirely demoralized the already weakened trade union center at Pittsburgh, so that the whole last period passed by without a single union official working in the national office. While the bluff campaign about "advances" was going on in the official press, a young stenographer was the sole and single director of the fate of the N.M.U. in Pittsburgh!

The "convention" assembled with the hand of death already heavy on it. There was not a single Left wing miners' leader present even to make the report to the delegates: a new precedent was set by having W.F. Dunne, of the T.U.U.L., make the official report on the situation and the tasks of the union! The W.I.R. was more prominently in the fore in every phase of the work there than the N.M.U. as such.

Our Policy and Browder's Tested

When the Communist League (Opposition), in its statement on the problems of the Left wing in the mining industry, proposed a serious, and not a fake, campaign of organizing the unorganized miners, and at the same time building a Left wing inside the Fishwick-Howat union in Illinois and the Lewis union in the anthracite, the Party leadership shouted themselves blue in the face with their dreary vilification of our group and its program. We warned the Communist and Left wing workers against the Stalinist policy in the miners' movement. The Stalinists confidently boasted of the correctness of their "line".

The latter has had its test. The test has cost the Left wing miners' movement many harsh blows. It has already killed the N.M.U.—nothing less. The wreck cannot be made whole again by the cheap, mechanical artifices of forming chemically pure "new" unions on paper for the edification of Moscow archivists. The evil must be cut down at the root. And at the root lies the malicious religion of "social fascism" and the "third period". The future will be replete with debacles similar to the one that just culminated in Pittsburgh until the Communist workers throw overboard these concepts and those who conceived them. —MARSH

Wherein Lies the Difference between Them?

The Daily Worker has been publishing a number of urgent calls to unemployed workers to resist evictions from their homes by landlords for non-payment of rent. What it says in this connection is entirely correct, and the calls should be heeded. The Daily Worker will probably be interested in a case of threatened eviction which is particularly flagrant. It can do a lot to remedy the situation for the workers involved. The landlord of one of the big apartment houses in the Bronx has sent a number of his tenants the following communication which we reproduce in full:

"You are hereby notified that unless you pay your rent on time, i. e., on the first of every month in advance and at least a part of your arrears every month, we shall be obliged to take legal action against you, i. e., to dispossess you."

"This is the last warning. Come to the office and make necessary payments. Phil. Amron. Manager"

The worthy landlord who signs this communication and is so ready to resort to legal action in capitalist courts is manager of the "famous" Bronx Cooperative Apartment Houses, controlled by the same Stalinist clique that was recently so busy—on paper—eradicating petty bourgeois deviations in the cooperative movement! Most if not all of the tenants to whom this brutal communication is addressed are unemployed workers who have already contributed enormous sums towards the maintenance of a thoroughly corrupted group of bureaucratic Business-Communists.

We never had very much enthusiasm for these high pressure, high finance adventures sailing under the flag of "cooperative Bolshevism"; we have much less today. We despise the bloated landlords of the East side who evict their unemployed tenants who cannot pay their rent "on the first of every month in advance" and we heartily endorse the Daily Worker for urging these workers to resist evictions with every means at their command. We haven't much more use for the smug landlords who conceal their appeals to the bosses' courts behind a red Party card. Their unemployed tenants who cannot pay rent at the present moment, we also urge to resist evictions.

Do not the Daily Worker and the Freiheit, which have so much influence with the manager of the Cooperative Apartments, think likewise? —J.

The Real Results of August First

The August First demonstrations this year were not only marked by a sobering-up of the official Party policy, but by a sharp decline in participation that indicated more than anything else that the class struggle cannot be arranged to fit the bureaucratic calendar markings of the official Stalinist clique.

No "General Strike"

There was nothing said this year, as it was last year, about "appropriating the political and military-technical experience of the struggle of the Berlin workers". Unlike last year, there was this time no irresponsible call issued for a "general political mass strike" on August First. Under pressure of hard facts and the relentless criticism of the Opposition, the bureaucracy in the Party was compelled to modify its adventurous course and drop some of its mystic "Third Period" jargon.

But changes made in a bureaucratic manner, without explanation, and over night, are not so lightly and quickly followed by the workers. The constant swinging between extremes in Party policy do not bring the workers along with it. And when in addition to this, there prevails a sectarian, isolationist course which steadily narrows the Party's base among the masses, results such as August First must be expected as natural.

All the shouting and beating of tom-toms cannot conceal the chagrin felt even by the Party leaders at the meagerness of the response to this year's demonstration. The reports from the principal cities in the country were significantly vague. The "hundreds of thousands" who, we were assured by the Daily Worker, took possession of the streets on March 6th, seemed to have dwindled amazingly to a few thousands five months later. This in spite of the fact that the objective conditions for the strengthening of the movement have improved rather than otherwise; in spite of the "fact" that the Party has again been "internally and externally consolidated". The cold truth of the matter is that the demonstrations were an almost universal failure. The Daily Worker which on August 4th, promised an "analysis" of the demonstrations by the C.E.C., of the "insufficiencies" and "shortcomings" (of the membership, of course, never of the leadership), has not presented the analysis yet. And for cause. Any serious analysis would have to reveal not only the incompetency of the Party leadership, capable only of producing defeats, but the falsity of its policies.

This holds not only for the United States, but for Europe as well, for the demonstrations there were small and resembled more a series of ordinary mass meetings than demonstrations in a "period of incessant and stormy upsurge".

The N. Y. Demonstration

New York was one of the cities where a clash between the demonstrators and the police occurred. The demonstration itself, with its 9-10,000 attendants, was a scandalous affair about which the Party comrades are still talking. It had the air of being nothing so much as a picnic on the streets. No attention was paid to the speakers. Everywhere here were little knots of comrades, conversing blithely and munching ice-cream sandwiches. Only a shooting gallery and side-show were lacking to complete the picture.

When the meeting had been adjourned, the police maneuvered a section of the crowd down a side street, and without warning, streamed down from a hall where a squad had been concealed and let loose their bestial fury upon the workers. The "good" police commissioner, Mulrooney, correctly says that the police had no clubs. But for that, every one of them carried a prominently "concealed" blackjack, which they were soon swinging brutally at the workers. The courageous cops even beat up a 16-year old girl.

An official "investigation", which tickles every good liberal, is now being conducted. Of course, it will change nothing in the attitude of the police. Their savage attacks on the workers will continue until the latter win the fight for freedom of speech and assembly, and learn to give these blue-coated thugs the proper reply.

The Persecution of the Russian Bolshevik Opposition

By N. MARKIN

Since the Spring of this year, the Stalinist leadership has again been compelled to pose as a task of the moment the question of the "extermination of the Opposition". This task arises out of the fact that, in spite of the boastings to the contrary by the members of the apparatus, the Opposition lives, works and will continue to work. It is enough to run through the Soviet papers to be convinced that rarely does a nucleus meeting or Party conference take place without Oppositionists or semi-Oppositionists taking the floor. The apparatus struggle against the Left Opposition is developed exclusively by means of repression. In connection with this Congress, the repression mounted frightfully. The rotten monolithism of the top is guaranteed by the coercion, the arrests, the banishments at the bottom. The Solitaries replace the discussion that should have preceded the Congress. That is how the Congress of the Party was prepared.

The aim of this article is to give the genuine facts, particularly on the "preparations" for the Congress. In January-February there was a strong wave of arrests of Oppositionists, of comrades who sympathized with them, and even of comrades simply suspected of sympathizing with them. According to an approximate reckoning more or less correct, 300 comrades were arrested in Moscow alone. A large number of comrades arrested in the provinces passed through Moscow to the Butirskaya prison, coming mainly from the Ukraine, and especially from the Donbas (the proletarian mining district).

Non-Party Workers Arrested

At Butirki, there were a few dozen non-Party workers of Moscow, arrested for the sympathy they expressed for the Opposition, who are now deported to Siberia. Among the prisoners, there was also a certain percentage of capitulators, mainly of those who repented under the influence of a momentary weakness, and who subsequently declared, almost openly, that they had made a mistake. Many of them are no longer just deported, but sent to the Solitaries. They now demand from the capitulators not only the complete and absolute disavowal of their convictions but also that they disclose all their connections. For refusal—there is the Solitary (Zabrovskaia, Blumenfeld, and dozens of others).

The lengths to which they will go in arrests and deportations can be seen by the fact that among those arrested there is a big percentage of people arrested by chance, "seized" for reasons of relationship or simply because of saying Hello to an Oppositionist. That is how dozens of people were arrested who have no connection with the Opposition (it frequently happens that they become real Oppositionists in prison or deportation!) During this period the Moscow comrades have distributed a leaflet and have assumed charge of a whole series of strikes which were provoked by the policy of the bureaucracy (in Serpuchov at Moscow, four factories of Mostriutaga and elsewhere). This has still further irritated the bureaucracy.

A wave of arrests that began at the end of the winter continued to rise up to the month of May. The number of persons arrested in this period is at least 500, without counting more than 100 arrested persons who were transported to the Solitaries. By this time the figure has further increased.

A remark must be made here. The Stalinist repression exercised against the Bolshevik-Leninists is distinguished from that practised against the Mensheviks and S.R.s. While the latter are simply isolated from the social life of the country, to hamper them in their counter-revolutionary action against the proletarian dictatorship for the Oppositionists who fight Centrism which upsets the dictatorship of the proletariat—the Stalinist course is directed toward their moral strangulation and their physical extermination.

Among the Oppositionists arrested in Winter were comrades Silov and Rabinovitch, who had unleashed against them the special hatred of the apparatus: they have been shot. How comrade Plunkin was shot before them—this crime is known to the whole world.

The repression has been sharpened against all the deportees. A regime of horrors has been established: they have lost the right to work, that is, the right to serve, and by that they have acquired the right to be hungry. The official aid a deportee receives has long ago been reduced to 15 rubles ($7.50 a month) and that means hunger, and cold in winter. Since they have no right to be members of the cooperatives, they can frequently buy nothing, even with these 15 rubles; they live in lodgings without fire, remaining for weeks without warm food, often without light. Especially painful is the situation of the deportees in Narym, one of the most terrible places of deportation in Siberia. The Narym deportees are literally condemned to death by hunger. Moreover at Narym which, by the harshness of living conditions, is similar to a Solitary, they transport the Bolsheviks originally deported elsewhere, in an ever growing number. It is a course deliberately directed towards the physical extermination of the Opposition.

Over and above the material privations, every deportee is exposed to innumerable "little" vexations, the fruit of the absolute arbitrariness and impunity of the local G.P.U. The already tiny aid is kept back (a case is cited where it was withheld for four months and where the only reply to the demand for it was mockery of this sort: "Go to Moscow!")—that is: Capitulat! In a similar situation a comrade reduced to despair asked that he be led to a Solitary, and that is not the only instance; people simply suspected of knowing a deported Oppositionist are arrested, thus sowing terror among the local population in order to cast the Oppositionists into absolute isolation.

Systematic raids are organized, in which not only political works are seized (from comrade L.S. Sosnovsky, in prison, his work on the agrarian policy of Centrism was seized; at comrade C.G. Rakovsky, his declaration to the Party was taken, etc.)—but also quotations from the works of Marx and Lenin. This is accompanied by a courier blockade so as to isolate the deportees politically. During the Congress, the G.P.U. did not let a single letter go through in order to prevent the elaboration of a collective declaration of the Opposition. But this did not succeed, and a declaration bearing the signatures of comrades Rakovsky, Meralov, Kasparova and Kossior, was presented (all the deportees joined with it). In deportation the receipt of a letter is an event! We are not speaking even of political, but of family letters.

All the deportees live under the constant threat of being transferred to a Solitary (and this threat exists for the smallest thing: for instance, a delay of five minutes for the compulsory registration at the G.P.U.) Often they do not even give formal reasons. The real aim is to shatter the revolutionary intransigence of the Oppositionist. At the same time with an open tendency to transfer the points of deportation to the harshest regions of the North, the Solitaries are filled up more and more. Their number is always growing because those that exist are already full. The regime in the prisons and Solitaries is incomparably worse than that of deportation. In the prisons there is rarely any light (the windows are covered with an opaque panel), the damp cells are occupied by two or three times as many prisoners as the rules provide for; place is lacking for sleep, not only on the cots, but even on the floor.

In the Solitaries

What the sanitary conditions are is not difficult to judge. In their cells, the Oppositionists, kept separate from each other, are mixed up with counter-revolutionaries and criminals who not only detest our comrades as the representatives of Bolshevism but hate and jeer at them, casting upon them all the hatred they nurture against the Soviet power. The system of the G.P.U.—holding Oppositionists in common cells with criminals—did not even exist in the prisons of czarism. This system is applied only to Oppositionists. The Mensheviks (at Butyrki, for instance) enjoy all the rights of political prisoners; they are kept separate from criminals, their cell doors are open; they have a small library at their disposal.

The cells of the Oppositionists are closed, nowhere is visiting allowed them, they have no rights to anything sent from the outside. And in addition to all this, they are treated coarsely and laughed at. Under such a regime, hunger strikes break out without end, and sometimes last until a mortal end (let us remember the heroic death of comrade Butov) To the hunger strikes, to the minimum demands of the prisoners, the prison direction replies by having them systematically beaten, by soaking them with water in the bitter cold of winter, etc. Beatings are a system known in the prison of Kharkov, in the Verchne-Uralsk Solitary, in the Leningrad prison, and in a whole number of others. It was through blows that comrade Haenrichsen was killed in the Leningrad prison.

The colony of Oppositionists deported at Tomsk has gathered a great deal of information on the absolutely terrible crimes Stalin has perpetrated against our comrades. It has presented a document of protest to which all the other colonies of deportees have rallied. In this document it is learned that hunger prevails in all the places of deportation for Oppositionists; it is established that for Bolsheviks, the conditions of Stalinist deportation are incomparably worse than those of czarism. Many deportees have become invalids (there are dozens of them) for lack of any medical succor, at Narym and similar places elsewhere. The seriously ill are not even transported to the nearest inhabited regions where a doctor might be found. When it is decided to transport an ill comrade, it is only when he is in a hopeless state. This winter, many comrades had their limbs frozen, and some had to undergo amputations because no medical aid was given them in time.

Babies, right after their birth, have been taken from their mother, and the latter sent into Solitaries (comrade Yanovskaia among others). The same document informs us that a new shooting of Oppositionists took place at Solovsk; it is no rare thing for the G.P.U. now to pronounce sentences, not of 3 to 5 years, but of 10 years, in vengeance for the political conduct of a comrade. For instance, without any formal proof, comrade Golodni was condemned to 10 years in Solitary. In all the colonies of deportees, before the 16th Congress, comrades were arrested and sent to the Solitaries. We do not give here the names of the colonies nor the names of the comrades arrested; we will deal only with the most striking facts.

A Hunger Strike in Ichim

In May, at Ichim, the whole colony was arrested—9 comrades—as well as 15 inhabitants of the city who, according to the accusation of the G.P.U., had been propagandized by Oppositionists. All are now in terrible condition, our comrades write us—they are locked up in the Sverdolsk prison. Two of them are seriously ill, they do not receive the political prisoner's ration, they are locked up in different cells, and have been compelled to declare a hunger strike. How this hunger strike ended, and above all, what was subsequently the fate of the Ichim deportees, we do not know.

The comrades informing us, call this arrest together with 15 non-Oppositionists an "amalgam", which means an artificial liaison for the purpose of discrediting our comrades by means of people alien to the Opposition. The destruction of the colony and the creation of a Thermidorian amalgam are the work of a provocateur. The provocations practised against the Opposition recently have assumed Homeric proportions.

Not only are the Opposition groups still filled with provocateurs, but these "operate" also in the deportation and in prison. There, their task is to disclose the most intransigent, to provoke decomposition by leading comrades to capitulate, etc. A provocateur showing himself under the mask of a "capitulator" is now a current phenomenon in the deportation.

That is how the colony of deportees at Kaminsk was destroyed. Two comrades, Stolovsky and Densov, were transferred to the Tomsk prison, the others, to the furthest corners of Siberia. This colony was dispersed only because it didn't produce a single capitulator. In their declaration to the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U., the Kaminsk comrades showed how the cadres of the local Party organizations are recruited. Basing themselves on exact information, they name more than 30 members of the Party now occupying responsible posts who were agents of the White terror during the days of Kolchak and who shot Reds. These elements are leaders of this district to this very day. The Kolchakists are chiefly to be found in great numbers in the G.P.U. This fact throws a striking light on the question: who is carrying out the Stalinist policy which hounds the deported Bolsheviks, which aids in their extermination? Ex-Whites, and not accidentally!

At Rubtsevs, Siberia, without any accusation being formulated against them, four Oppositionists were arrested: Abramsky, Antokolsky, Veskresensky, Evingelstaedt. From the Rubtsevs prison, they sent a declaration to the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U. on June 4, in which they said: "We can only consider this repressive act exercised against us only as a preparation by unusual means for the 16th Party Congress..." "The repression will not halt the struggle for the redressment of the Party, just as the damage done will not prevent the Party from returning to the positions of Leninism". What was subsequently the fate of the Rubtsevs comrades is not known to us. But there is no doubt that they will be imprisoned in the Solitaries.

A similar destruction took place at Kansk (comrades Kusminsky and Landau), at Alma-Ata (comrades Goldin and others), at Slavgorod, Chimkent, and many other places. Raids have taken place everywhere. The impudent raid upon comrade Rakovsky has been told everywhere and is well known. Upon him, as the leader of the Russian Opposition, the Stalinists are concentrating their hatred. Seriously ill (afflicted with heart trouble and malaria), comrade Rakovsky, far from being sent to a more clement climate (as the doctors ordered) has been transported from Astrakhan to Barnaul. Comrade Rakovsky, who is 57 years old, of which 40 have been devoted to the struggle for Communism, passed a very painful Winter, his sick organism having to undergo cold of 40 to 50 degrees. The isolation in which he is held is more rigorous than for anybody else. The game of Stalin is clear: slowly but surely to finish off Rakovsky.

Sosnovsky in Danger

It is in an even more painful situation that another eminent leader of the Opposition, an old Bolshevik, comrade L.S. Sosnovsky is to be found. He is incarcerated in the Tomsk prison, in a regime of isolation more severe than any known in the czarist prisons for those condemned to death. No correspondence is allowed him, no authorized mail, no relation with the other prisoners; he must take his walks in company with a special agent of the G.P.U. The state of health of comrade Sosnovsky is critical. A prolonged imprisonment under such conditions means the end for him. It is under similar conditions than another old Bolshevik, E.D. Eltsin, is to be found (in the Supdalsk Solitary) this comrade is afflicted by spinal meningitis.

That is how the 16th Congress was prepared on the back of the Left Opposition. By using the power of coercion of the apparatus for factional ends, the Stalinist leadership has set this apparatus against the Left proletarian wing of the Party. Fire to the Left! the more terrible this fire will be, the clearer will appear in the eyes of the proletarians the lamentable bankruptcy of Centrist policy.

By hunger, by cold, by the blockade, by outrages, by blows and by shootings, Centrism aims to squeeze out of the weakest ones a capitulation, and the strongest ones it condemns to ruin. Only the working class can thwart this Thermidorian plan. There is its duty, there is its task. By making an end of the Left wing, Stalin will make an end of the October revolution. That must be understood, that must be prevented, that must not be permitted.

* * * * *

We take this occasion to inform the foreign comrades that in reply to the greetings of the international conference in Paris to the deported and imprisoned Russian Oppositionists, there have arrived in the editorial Board of the Bulletin of the Russian Oppositions numerous greetings not only from the places of deportation but also from the Solitaries.

The Danger of Fascism in Germany

By KURT LANDAU

The advance of Fascism has alarmed the proletariat. The results of the Saxony elections are thoroughly discussed in all the factories, at the registry offices, wherever workers gather.

But it is not the Saxony elections alone that have refuted the blinded leaders of our Party. This holds true to a still greater extent for the developments in Thuringia. On May 9, the Rote Fahne editorial took up the reactionary policy of Frick in Thuringia and the anti-labor attitude of the National Socialists (Fascists), and reached the conclusion:

"No wonder that all this affected the National Socialist worker elements like a cold douche. They are beginning to get enough of Hugenberg and Hitler... In the open country too, that is, where the land proletariat found a determined leader in the Communist Party, the advance of the Hakenkreuzler was brought to a standstill in recent months."

Two days later the elections took place in Gotha (Thuringia) with the result that the Fascists outstripped the Communist Party and increased—in spite of Frick!—its vote since December 1929 from 5192 to 6136.

What Are the Driving Forces of Fascism?

In 1927-28 we were able to establish a definite Leftward development of the masses. The number of strikes rose from 330 (1926) to 751 (1927) and 687 (1928), the number of strikers from 54,399 (1926) to 224, 131 (1927) to 271,473 (1928).

Simultaneously there began an influx of workers into the trade unions, whose membership rose from 3,977,309 (1926) to 4,150,160 (1927) and 4,653,581 (1928).

The rising activity in the proletariat was accompanied by a Leftward development of the masses in general. The reactionary policy of the bourgeois bloc government had an alarming effect. Enormous masses, swept along in tow behind the bourgeois parties, awakened and turned to reformism. In the Reichstag elections of 1928 the votes of the Socialist Party were jerked upwards from 7,881,000 (1924) to 9,151,100 and the C.P.G. won more than 500,000 new voters.

The accentuation of the economic crisis in the last year brought the masses in the bourgeois camp into a still stronger conflict to the old bourgeois parties. But one thing changed fundamentally: The expectations the masses put in reformism in 1928 were bitterly disappointed. That is how the direction of the departure of the masses from the old bourgeois parties had to change especially because the C.P.G. under its present leadership did not understand how to show these masses a concrete path in the struggle against their growing impoverishment.

The disappointment of the semi-proletarian and petty bourgeois sections, stirred up by the policy of the trust bourgeoisie, with the betrayal of reformism and embitterment with the incapacity of the C.P.G. leadership to help them—that is the real driving force of Fascism.

At the present time, the semi-proletarian, petty bourgeois masses, who formerly followed the bourgeois parties, especially the German National and the German People's Party, are in large part gathering in the camp of Fascism: officials, coupon-clippers, intellectuals, former officers, primarily the petty bourgeois, nationalist youth. But there is no doubt that Fascism has already begun to hammer a breach in proletarian fortresses, especially in Saxony, Thuringia and Northern Bavaria.

Fascism is already exercising a palpable and dangerous influence upon large sections of the proletariat that are politically strange to it. There arises among many workers a feeling of impotence towards the stormy rise of Fascism; a fatalistic attitude becomes noticeable.

It is precisely these phenomena in the proletariat that are especially dangerous; precisely this influence is required by Fascism in order to triumph.

The Party leadership also approaches this attitude when it attributes the growth of Fascism to "a series of objective causes".

These "objective causes"—the impoverishment of the mass, its despair of the old bourgeois parties, its disappointment with reformism, its search for a radical solution—all these causes should have led primarily to an enormous growth of the Communist movement, providing there was a correct strategy of our Party.

But that is just what is not the case, either so far as numbers are concerned, or ardor, activity and impetus of our Party.

The Weakness of Communist Leadership--the Strength of Fascism

In the days that Fascism utilized to prepare a mighty advance, the period of the coalition government, in this period the Central Committee of our Party did not see the growth of Fascism at all, but intoxicated itself with its own, slowly crumbling strength. On January 21, 1930, the Rote Fahne proclaimed:

"The German proletariat is marching to the attack with the slogan: Dictatorship of the Proletariat!"

Ten days later, on February 1, the full weakness of the Party showed itself, which did not prevent the Rote Fahne from pathetically proclaiming:

"That is how things stand: Everything the Communists want to do, they do."

This reckless self-intoxication, combined with the block-headed theory of "social-fascism", crippled the Party. It has now already sunk into oblivion that only a short time ago the beginning of Fascist rule was announced with the words:

"The gorged priests, the cursed secretaries and functionaries of the social fascist Party apparatus want civil war and a blood bath that will surpass all the previous misdeeds of Noske and Zoergiebel. This is no longer the preparation, but rather the beginning of Fascist rule in Germany, erected with the bloody hands of the social democratic party" (Rote Fahne, January 15, 1930.)

It is hardly possible to imagine a more insane disregard for the difference between Fascism and reformism.

Insofar as Fascism was noticed at all by the Party leadership, the struggle was exhausted in the slogan: "Beat the Fascists wherever you meet them!" or in the memorable proclamation: "We want a revolutionary state power that lets no Fascist live..." (Rote Fahne, January 28, 1930.)

How was Fascism not to grow when the revolutionary Party is beaten over the head like this by its leadership!

When Fascism proceeded more and more to combine the propaganda for its "third empire" with refined, demagogic slogans, to build up its nucleus system in the factories, the Party leadership sought to beat Fascism by "Bolshevizing" the Fascist "leader cult"; and when the Voelkische Beobachter wrote of the "great leader Hitler", the Rote Fahne replied with the "greater leader Thaelmann". Is it to be wondered at that Fascism could become, unhindered, a mass movement?

Differentiation within Fascism

The possibility for a counter-offensive by the Party against Fascism is favorable right now, since a noticeable differentiation is now proceeding in the camp of Fascism. The influx of great masses from the bourgeois camp has had a strong effect on the tactics of Fascism. Hundreds of thousands of bourgeois voters, former adherents to the German National and the German People's Party who turned to Fascism, are not satisfied with the outlook for the "national revolution", with the promises of the coming "third empire", but demand immediate measures in their interest, above all customs policy, tax and similar advantages.

Under the pressure of these sections, Hitler has for the time being decided in favor of the bloc with the other bourgeois parties and for participation in the government. Against this new line, viewed by Hitler as a transitional stage until the Fascist mass movement is sufficiently strengthened—above all among the proletariat—to accomplish the overthrow, the Berlin Fascists (Strasser group) have launched an assault. The Berlin Fascists know the mood of the Berlin workers, 50 percent of whom—by vote—are in the camp of the C.P.G. (see the communal elections of November 27, 1929). They rightly fear that the Fascist government policy as proposed for Saxony by Hitler and Goebbels and already applied in Thuringia, will drive away the proletarian masses.

Besides these tactical differences, which are of the greatest significance in the Fascist struggle for the workers, there are still others.

The orientation in foreign politics, for instance. While Hitler demands foreign political support of Italy and England, the Berlin Fascists stand on the line of Graf Reventlow of 1923, that is, support of Russia.

These differences have now led to a split of the National Socialists (Fascists); the relatively small Berlin group around Dr. Strasser has now formed the "Kampfgemeinschaft revolutionärer Nationalsozialisten" which sees its task in the absorption of the elements dissatisfied with the bourgeois bloc policy of Fascism, and in maintaining Fascism through more radical "socialist" and "anti-capitalist" phrases.

A «1923» Upside Down

Up to now the Fascists have timidly avoided placing themselves openly on the side of the employer in labor struggles. The sharpening of the class struggle in Germany will render this maneuvering of Fascism very difficult. Precisely now when it has become a mass movement, which also possesses positions in the factories, Fascism will have to take a concrete position in the labor struggles that are breaking out. The "creative" capital of the Rhine-Wesphalian industrial lords, which the Fascists even recognize in theory and contrast with bank capital, although the interweaving of industrial and bank capital into modern finance capital is well known to them—this "national" capital is now arming for decisive battles against the proletariat. Will the money-bags of Fascism, the lords of the Rhine and the Ruhr, the wealthy manufacturers and industrial kings, allow themselves the luxury of abandoning political support to their Fascist mercenaries? All signs indicate that the National Socialists will assume the role in these struggles of battering ram against the free trade unions. They will endeavor to transform the deep dissatisfaction of the workers with the bureaucracy into an assault upon the trade unions in general.

Should it come, however, to a conflict between the masses, who use and want to defend their trade unions as fighting organs and Fascism, then a revolutionary situation can arise rapidly and directly that requires all the maneuvering capacity and boldness of the revolutionary Party in order to drive this struggle forward to a decisive one between revolution and counter-revolution.

Such a perspective has nothing in common with the theory of the "revolutionary upsurge", which has been rising, as is known, "stormily and incessantly" since 1928, as the Manuilskys, Molotovs and Thaelmanns contend.

Such a perspective has nothing to do, either, with the superficial analogy with 1923, which is now the style of the Party, and which, as is known, led to regarding the Mueller government as the "Kerensky period".

If one wishes to compare the present development with 1923, then the present situation can be characterized as a 1923 upside down. If the determining feature of 1923 was the growth by leaps and bounds of the revolutionary forces if 1923 stood under the sign of an elementary upsurge of activity in the proletariat, of the assembling of the petty bourgeois masses for the day of the revolution—then 1930 is precisely the opposite. In 1923, Fascism collected behind the back of the mounting revolution; yet the tempo of its development stood no comparison with that of the revolution.

If in 1930, despite the catastrophic mistakes in recent years, our Party has remained a class Party, when it apparently grows—that is a sign that the proletariat hopes and endeavors with all its power to fashion an effective weapon out of its Party. Upon the road the Party trods in this serious situation will depend the fate of the German proletariat in the next years. Out of a 1923 upside down, situations may arise in which the question of power is posed more sharply, concretely and lively than ever since 1923.

Hitler stands before the gates of the proletarian fortresses. His shop nuclei raise their heads in the factories. His agitators rove through the registry offices, his hands penetrate into the proletarian poverty quarters. The decisive struggle between Communism and Fascism is maturing. The aim of the struggle is now the reformist worker. Either our Party will succeed, by a change of its policy up to now to tear down the walls between Communist and reformist masses, to draw into the struggles the masses that still follow reformism today, then, smashing the social democratic leadership, it will crush Fascism at the head of the working class. Or, the Party leadership will continue further with its policy of ultra-Leftist opportunism. Then Fascism will draw to itself large sections that still follow reformism today, neutralize and drive into passivity larger sections and bloodily crush the Communist vanguard in order, after this triumph, to forge the fetters around the whole working class.

Decisive struggles are approaching. The dangers with which the working class is confronted are enormous. But is far from too late. Everything now depends on whether our Party becomes conscious of its tasks. In the struggles of the next period it can become the real leader of the masses. To become leader of the masses means not increasing its vote, but to win such confidence among the masses that the word of the Party in the masses finds the mightiest echo, that its call to strike, to demonstration, to revolutionary mass struggle is heeded by the proletariat.

What is needed is a return from the flights into the realms of adventurism. The Party has for years been made drunk with phrases and deception. It is time it awakened and regarded the abyss before which it stands.

We of the Left wing, howled at by a blind and incapable leadership as "Party enemies" and "renegades", we are the ones who are now planfully counteracting the internal collapse of the Party, who spring into the breach wherever the Party breaks down, who serve the Party in the manner that the leadership should serve it.

Just as in the war the small revolutionary groups around Luxemburg, Liebknecht and Mehring, just as Spartakus remained true to the banner of the proletarian revolution—so does the Left Opposition in a period when the Party leadership vacillates and breaks down. Only one thing distinguishes our time fundamentally from that of the war: The old workers' party collapsed on August 4, 1914. Spartakus had to unfurl again the bedraggled banners of the revolution, had to assemble the masses of the betrayed proletariat on a new foundation—against the Party of treason, of social imperialism, of war.

The banners of our Party are not bedraggled, our Party, burdened with heavy mistakes, violated by an incapable and conscienceless bureaucracy, has remained the Party of the working class, the Communist Party. It is our duty to guard the Party from collapse, to burn the rottenness out of it, to make the Party capable of fighting, of conquering.

That we must fulfill this duty as persecuted and hounded ones in part as expelled, that is one of those contradictions in the development of our Party in which its history is not poor.

Inseparably bound up with the Party, from whose proletarian core the ruling apparatus cannot tear us away, the Left wing continues to fight unswervingly to fashion a Party of Lenin out of the Party of Thaelmann.

A Letter on Michael Gold

Dear Max:

The last issue, containing Trotsky's letter on the New Masses and Max Eastman's correspondence with its editors, created quite a stir. I've heard many of the boys condemn Gold's craven buckling to the Union Square priests; others stutter shame-faced apologies. As for Gold himself, I hope none of you fellows have any illusions about his position in the Party—if he is still a Party member. His mind is on higher things. He's the boy who wants to make good where, he imagines, it means something. He has his eye on Broadway, and he's working much harder on getting a play produced along the bright alley than he is even in slaughtering Trotskyism. You may have noticed the recurring motif in his work: He changed his name to GOLD. He wrote "120 MILLION". He wrote "Jews Without MONEY". It's one thing, apparently, to write about not having any; its another not to have much yourself. So when he gets through being a respectable and successful Broadway playwright under the benevolent aegis of the noble Kahn, he'll probably make his confused, liberal colleague, Barbusse look like a burnished Bolshevik. Speed the day!

Yours,

—R.

NOTES of a JOURNALIST (Who Is Responsible for the «Turns», Yakovlev's General Line) by ALFA

The Responsibility for the Turns Lies with... Trotskyism

It is known that the Opposition is pulling to the "Right", that it is against socialism and collectivization. It is no less known that the Opposition is for compulsory collectivization. And being that the selection and training of the apparatus, as is further well known, were in the past years in the hands of the Opposition, then with it, naturally, lies the responsibility for the turns. At any rate this is all they talk about in Pravda. If you do not like it, do not listen, but do not interfere with the "general line".

In the preceding issue we quoted the official Platform of the Opposition published in 1927 in regards to collectivization. But let us go way back of 1927, to the period of military Communism when civil war and famine necessitated a rigorous policy of bread requisitions. How did the Bolsheviks in those severe years paint the perspective of collectivization? In a speech devoted to the peasant uprisings on the ground of the requisitioning of bread, comrade Trotsky spoke on April 6, 1919:

"These uprisings gave us the possibility to realize our greatest ideological and organizational strength. But alongside of this, it is understood, the uprisings were also a sign of our weakness, because they drew into their wake not only the Kulaks but also—we must not deceive ourselves on this score—a certain part of the middle and intermediate peasantry. This can be explained by the general reasons which have been depicted by me—by the backwardness of the peasantry itself. We must not however, blame everything on the backwardness. Marx said on one occasion that a peasant not only has prejudice but also judgement, and one can appeal from the prejudice of the peasant to his judgement, to lead him towards a new order on the basis of experience. The peasantry should feel by deeds that in the working class, in its Party, in its Soviet apparatus, it has a leader, a defender; the peasant should understand the requisitions to which we were forced, should accept them as something unavoidable; he should know that we are entering into the internal life of the village, that we examine for whom it is easier, for whom it is more difficult, that we make an internal differentiation and seek the closest friendly bonds with the middle peasants.

"This we need first of all because as long as in Western Europe the working class has not gained power, as long as our Left flank cannot lean on the proletarian dictatorship of Germany, France and other countries, so long as we are compelled to lean our Right flank on the Russian middle peasant. But not only in this period, no, also after the decisive, inevitable and historically pre-determined victory of the working class throughout Europe, for us, in our country, there will remain the important enormous task of the socialization of our agricultural economy, transforming it from a scattered, backward, peasant economy into a new, collective group, Communist economy. Can this greatest transition in world history be in any way completed against the desires of the peasantry? In no way. Not measures of violence will be needed here, not measures of compulsion, but educational measures, measures of influencing, of support, of good example, of encouragement—these are the methods by which the organized and enlightened working class speaks to the middle peasant." (L. Trotsky, Vol. XVII, pages 119-120).

Yakovlev's «General Line»

Every self-respecting bureaucrat has his "general line", sometime full of the unexpected. The "general line" of Yakovlev has always consisted of serving the command but winking to the Opposition. He ceased his winking when he understood that it is a serious matter, and for a responsible post the command demands not only the hands but the heart as well. Yakovlev has become people's commissar of agriculture. In this capacity he presented the Sixteenth Congress with a thesis on the collectivization movement. One of the basic reasons for the rise of agricultural economy, the thesis declares, is the "crushing of counter-revolutionary Trotskyism". It will therefore not hurt to recall how the present leader of the collectivization put the question of agricultural economy in the very recent past, and in the struggle against that same Trotskyism.

Characterizing the dispersal and backwardness of peasant economy, Yakovlev wrote at the end of 1927: "These data are quite sufficient to characterize the drama of the small and tiniest economy. On the cultural and organizational level of peasant economy as inherited by us from czarism we will in no way succeed in advancing in the sphere of socialist development in our country with the necessary speed." (On the Question of Socialist Reconstruction of Agricultural Economy, edited by Yakovlev, page xxiv).

Two years ago when 75 percent of the collectives were as yet made up of the poor, the present commissar of agriculture, Yakovlev, evaluated their socialist character in the following manner:

"The question of the growth in the collectives of the communal and not individual elements of capital, even at the present time, perhaps particularly at the present time—is still a question of struggle; in many instances private individual accumulation hides under the communal form, etc." (Ibid, page xxxvii).

Defending against the Opposition the right of the Kulak to live and breath, Yakovlev wrote:

"The quintessence of the tasks is the socialist transformation of peasant economy into a cooperative socialist economy . . . precisely this small and tiny economy which middle peasant economy is at bottom. This is our basic and most difficult task. While solving this task we may in passing, by measures of economic and general policy, solve the task of limiting the growth of Kulak exploiting elements—the task of an offensive against the Kulak." (Ibid p.xlvi.)

Consequently, even the possibility of limiting the growth of the Kulak elements was made dependent by Yakovlev upon the solution "of the basic and most difficult task": the socialist transformation of peasant economy. As for the liquidation of the Kulak as a class. Yakovlev did not even raise the question. All this was two years ago.

Speaking of the necessity for the gradual transition from commercial cooperation to productive cooperation, that is, to collective farms, Yakovlev wrote: "This is the only road of cooperative development which really secures—naturally, not in one-two-three years, maybe not in one decade—the socialist reconstruction of all of peasant economy." (Ibid, page xii). Let us notice carefully: "not in one-two-three years, maybe not in one decade."

"Collective farms and communes," Yakovlev wrote in the same work, "are at the present time and will for a long time yet undoubtedly be only islets in the sea of peasant economy, since a pre-condition for their vitality is first of all a tremendous rise of culture." (Ibid, page xxxvii, our emphasis).

Finally, in order to present the basis for the perspective of decades, Yakovlev emphasized that:

"The creation of a mighty, rationally organized industry, capable of producing not only the means of consumption but also the means of production, which are imperative for national economy—this is the pre-condition for a real cooperative socialist plan." (Ibid, page xliii).

This is how matters appeared in recent times when Yakovlev, in the capacity of a member of the Central Control Commission, exiled the Opposition to the East for an assault upon the rights of the Kulak and the bureaucracy, and for the endeavor to accelerate collectivization. In the struggle for the official course of that time, the course towards the "strong peasant", against the conscienceless and spiteful criticism on the part of the Opposition—the actual words in the article mentioned—Yakovlev considered that the collective farms "will for a long time yet undoubtedly be only islets"—not even islands, but islets!—"in the sea of peasant economy", for the socialist reconstruction of which "more than once decade will be needed. If two years ago, Yakovlev proclaimed, in contrast to the Opposition, that even the simple limitation of the Kulak can only be a passing result of socialist reconstruction of all of peasant economy in the course of a series of decades—then today, in the capacity of people's commissar of agriculture, he undertakes "to liquidate the Kulak as a class" in the course of two or three sowing campaigns. By the way—this was yesterday: today Yakovlev expresses himself in theses much more enigmatically... and this sort of gentleman which is incapable of thinking anything through seriously, still less capable of foreseeing anything, accuses the Opposition of... "consciencelessness", and on the basis of this accusation arrest, exile and even shoot. Two years ago—because the Opposition pushed them on to the road of collectivization and industrialization; today—because it restrains the collectivizers from adventurism.

Here it is, the pure culture of bureaucratic adventurism.

The Right Wing Moves Closer to Social Democracy

Since the formation of organized Right wing groups in the Communist movement, we of the Left Opposition have contended that an independent existence for any length of time of a current in the labor movement that swings between Communism and social democracy is out of the question. We pointed out that the Right wing groups (Brandler, Lovestone, Sellier, Hais, etc.) were developing to a logical conclusion the theory of Stalin-Bucharin according to which a socialist society could be constructed on a national scale. We warned that all theoretical thought and historical experiences spoke for the idea that these Right wing groups must necessarily go the whole way to the organized social democracy, return to the Stalinist camp,—or so far as the workers in it are concerned—find in the program of the Left Opposition the only revolutionary solution of the crisis in our movement.

To dispute this at the present time is to turn one's back deliberately upon events and established facts. The recent period has produced a quantity of additional evidence to confirm our analysis.

A Heavy Defeat for Brandlerism

In Germany, the Right wing led by Brandler and Thalheimer has just suffered a crushing defeat in the Saxony elections. While the comrades of the Left Opposition—reserving their duty of criticism—carried on a campaign to have the Saxon workers vote for the Communist list, the Brandler group again sought to split the revolutionary ranks by setting up their own candidates. The result was that after weeks of boasting, the Brandlerites lost one-third of the votes cast for them at the 1928 Landtag elections. The demoralization subsequently created in the ranks of the Right wing is evident from a reading of the Brandler press itself. The Right wing workers, captivated by the fantastic ideas of Brandler and Thalheimer that the masses of Communist workers would swing along, were left speechless by the Saxony results.

The upshot is a thoroughgoing "revaluation of values" in the Brandler group. More outspoken voices are being heard for a second Party, or for unity with the Left social democratic splitters chipped off the parent body. The path adopted by the Brandlerites of moving away from the official Party—and from Communism—leads logically to the "advanced" step already taken by their French allies (Sellier, Dunois, Gelis & Co.), and further.

In France, as we have already reported, the Right wing has broken completely with Communism. The Sellier group has organized a purely parliamentary "Workers and Peasants Party", adopting "legitimately" the Stalinist theories of such parties for the Orient. The absence of the very word "Communist" in their name is simply symbolic of the whole character of this movement. The policy of vacillating between the Communists and socialists, however, is very short-lived in France. Already, one of the leading members of the W.P.P. in France, Amedee Dunois, has formally joined the Socialist Party. That this new draft of Frossards will yield up many more than one Dunois to the S.P. is manifest to anybody that reads its journal, Ca Ira.

The Czech Right Wing Travels Fast

But the most striking instance of the flight to social democracy by the international Right wing is furnished by its Czechoslovakian section, one flank of which has formally joined the socialist party bag and baggage. We refer to the so-called "Brunn Opposition" led by Dr. Ecer and Kovanda. These eminent companions of Lovestone and Brandler have now "gone to the masses" in precisely the manner we foretold some time ago.

That is not all. The second partner in the Czech Right wing the trade unions led by Josef Hais which split away from the R.I.L.U. have now been formally brought into the Czech national reformist trade union federation, i. e., the Amsterdam International. Lovestone is not a bit put out by this open capitulation; on the contrary, he greets it by writing (Revolutionary Age, No. 18):

"The campaign for trade union unity in Czechoslovakia has taken another step forward under the driving force of the Communist Opposition movement."

But why was this "unity" not realized with the Red trade unions, still containing some 50-60,000 members and affiliated with the R.I.L.U.? Since when must unity be achieved by capitulation to the yellow banner of Jouhaux and Co? No answer to this from Lovestone. The fact remains that confronted with the choice of unity with the revolutionary trade union center or with the Amsterdam center, Hais chose Amsterdam.

The international Right wing hails this as an achievement for their policy of trade union unity. And it is. Their policy of unity for its own sake results in practise in capitulation to reformism instead of the realization of the revolutionary united front. It is interesting to note, parenthetically, that Hais' treachery is too much for the stomach of at least one Right wing leader, Neurath, who does not deceive himself that the "unity" is a great step forward, but writes, in a bitter letter of reproach to Hais: "An unconditional amalgamation with the C.O.S. (reformist federation) would have the practical significance of the heaviest blow against the revolutionary proletariat of Czechoslovakia."

As for the third, "pure Opposition" group of the Right wing in Czechoslovakia, it has also contributed its quota to the social democratic party in the form of two of its leaders who, at the recent conference of the former, announced their formal retirement from Communism and return to the old, "solid", love-

Who Is Disintegrating and How?

Our reader will recall the announcement by Lovestone—made all the more vociferously because there were no facts to base it on—that "the Trotskyists are disintegrating". The events of recent months speak eloquently. They show who is really disintegrating, and where the particles are going. The Right wing is either capitulating to Stalin, as in Russia, or to the social democracy. The Left Opposition, denounced by Lovestone as "counter-revolutionaries"; "disintegrated Trotskyists" to which Lovestone now addresses hypocritical, humble and public appeals for a united front (and not-so-public appeals to and capitulatory negotiations with Musteite leaders), marches forward with renewed strength towards revolutionary unity.

A Saslavsky Doesn't Change

One of the most loyal pillars of the Stalinist regime is the feature writer of Pravda, Saslavsky. When one reads how and what Saslavsky writes about counter-revolutionary Trotskyism, memories of 1917 rise to confront one. In those days Saslavsky wrote articles too, in fact quite similar ones, almost with the same words. Only not in Pravda. "Against the German agent, Lenin" was Saslavsky's motto then. Lenin demanded at that time that the masses be told of the kind of "knaves" the "Milukovs and Hessens. Saslavskys and Dans" are! Yes, Saslavsky has remained his old self. But what a threatening symptom that the hounding of Bolshevism can now be carried on by the same Saslavsky in the columns of Pravda only because he now writes "Trotsky" instead of "Lenin" and instead of "Bolshevism"—"Trotskyism"!

Group vs. Branch Banking

A Struggle of Interests in the Ranks of the Capitalist Class

The capitalist class of the United States and its government are now debating branch and group banking while the consolidation and merger of bank capital is proceeding fast and already has the material base for executing the needs of the dominating group in law, etc. Financial capitalism dates back to the beginning of the century and this phase has been more marked since the world war.

The crisis of 1893 to 1900 and the Spanish-American War witnessed a new stage of the ushering in of financial capitalism with America playing an important role. The industrial consolidation most marked after the crisis of 1873 was at the beginning of the century transformed into a consolidation of a higher stage, of the fusion of bank capital and industry. The monopolies, trust and consolidations "organized" capitalism on a higher plane, intensifying and enlarging the basic contradictions of the capitalist mode of production.

The period following this, culminating in the crisis of 1914, followed by war and revolutions saw the process of consolidation in the world and especially in the United States move at an accelerated pace in all branches of industry toward the pivot point of financial capitalism. "Thus is competition transformed into monopolies. We see before us the giant process of socialization of production. Particularly is the process of technical inventions and improvements also being socialized." *

The controversy of the different groups of capitalists and their Washington office boys is hidden behind the discussion of branch vs. group banking. The Federal Reserve Act strengthening the financial control over the country but not an eliminator or remedy for economic cycles as claimed before the depression of 1921 and 1930, and the McFadden Bill of 1927 which sanctioned branch banking by Congress as the first step—is now being followed by more acts for the benefit of the financial groups.

The great number of bank failures in the last decade, over 5,000 mainly in the South and West, where the agrarian crisis reached its deepest points has accelerated the consolidation movement as the natural outgrowth in reorganization when the big fish eat the little. The chain bank has the outward appearance of the ordinary unit, the "independent" bank of the country, but one bank controls the major stock of the chain. The group bank is controlled by the owners of the majority stock who organize a corporation or holding company and control the resources of the group in a given area. The branch bank is the highest stage of the consolidation movement in the vertical extension.

The majority of leading banking authorities admits that the present stage of the consolidation movement in the country is only in a transition stage. Long ago a few leading banks, Chase, etc., already had control of the majority of the resources and are in a world commanding position. The branch banking system of other imperialist nations, due to their economic unit difference, developed at a faster rate than in America. Such countries as England, France and Germany with large colonial possessions before the war gave this movement impetus but the different form taken in different countries, adapted to local conditions does not alter in the least the content of the transformation to financial capitalism in these countries.

In this country with the Federal Reserve System, the higher development of the consolidation and the branch banking system will alter and create a new role for the system to cope with the changing forces. "Too many banks in the country," is the note of the financier, and "consolidate and survive" is the remedy advocated now for banks as it was the remedy after the crisis of 1873 for too many manufacturing establishments. The McFadden Bill of 1927 was to "protect" the unit bank just like the Anti-Trust Law of the '90's was to protect the lesser industrial units. Both laws proved to be stepping stones for further consolidation and now the financiers are ready for the next step.

The dominating financier and his office boys favor branch banking while the lesser financial groups of the agriculture and industrial areas favor group banking. Some of the large industrialists favor group banking while the small fry and the petty-bourgeois elements are fighting to prevent any kind of consolidation and retain the unit bank affiliated with the Federal Reserve System or with "safe" charters.

The Comptroller of Currency, Pole, who was the first to advocate branch banking is an outstanding advocate of all measures to hurry the process. Governor Young of the Federal Reserve Board also favors branch banking. The hearing in the House Banking and Currency Committee had the following representatives favoring branch banking: Luce of Mass., Stevens of S. C., Seiberling of Ohio, Dunbar of Indiana. Branch of Georgia and Beedy of Maine favor branch banking but want trade area limitations.

E.W.Decker, Pres. N.W.Bancorporation and L.T.Wakefield, Vice-Pres., First Bank and Stock Corp., both of Minneapolis, Minn., favor group banking and say they will fight branch banking in the Minnesota territory. Robert O. Lord, Pres., Guardian Detroit Union Group, Inc., and Geo. F. Rand, Marine Midland Corp. of Buffalo, also favor group banking in opposition to branch banking. These four leaders in their areas are head of group banks and fear the further logical step of financial capitalism in consolidations.

Several of the largest banks of the country, dealing in international loans, are reaping big profits in their present role in world exploitation and although not openly leading the movement are, nevertheless, playing their usual sly game. The Chase National Bank is the largest in the world. The December 31, 1929 report gives the following figures: Total Deposits, $2,673,645,000. Total resources, $2,814,536,000. Capital surplus and undivided profits, $368,000,000. Their control, industrially and politically in the deciding affairs, combined with the other financiers is being questioned less each day.

Lenin, in "Imperialism", says, "Monopoly is an outgrowth of banks. From modest intermediaries they have been transformed into monopolies of finance capital. Some three to five of the largest banks of any of the most developed capitalist nations have realized a 'personal union' between industrial and banking capital; they have concentrated into their hands the control of many billions, which make up the greatest part of capital and money of the whole nation. A financial oligarchy spreads a thick network of dependencies over the economic and political institutions of modern capitalist society without exception—this is the most glaring consequence of monopoly."

Branch or group banking gives the financier greater industrial and political control in the areas. These sectional groups will have their inner-class struggle for the spoils but unity on all issues against the industrialists, the farmers and petty-bourgeoisie is assured when determining factors are at stake. And unity against the proletariat cannot be questioned.

The number of banks in the United States have diminished with consolidation but we still have 24,695 banks. 21,824 are unit banks and 6,353 are branch or group banks. According to these figures the unit bank is still far in the lead but according to control of the resources the unit bank is already a back number. Gov. Young of the Federal Reserve Board informs us, "that all the banks had total loans and investments of $58,500,000,000, of which the group and branch system held $30,000,000,000 or more than half." This small group controlling over half of the resources is further narrowed when we consider that 269 groups with 1,922 banks have $15,285,100,000 resources considering the period of October 1929 to June 1930 and this is further narrowed when we consider the several large banks of the nation showing concentration of the majority of wealth in the hands of a few.

The process is at work in all nations and especially since the beginning of the century. Lenin, in Imperialism giving Shilder's figures, says, "In 1904 England had 50 colonial banks with 2,279 branches (in 1910—72 colonial banks with 5,449 branches); France had 20 colonial banks with 136 branches; Holland 16, with 68 branches; Germany 'only' 13 with 70 branches."

Today, the "Big Five" in England, Midland Bank, Lloyds Bank, Barclay Bank, Westminster Bank and National Provincial Bank control almost 10 billions in assets and have over 8,000 branches. Prof.F.E.Lee of the University of Illinois says,  "Between 1880-1924 the Midland Bank absorbed 31 other banks many of which were virtually banking systems in themselves with numerous branches." Between 1900 and 1922, moreover, many additional absorptions took place which have raised this bank (Barclay—Ed.) with more than 2,000 branches in England and Wales to the position in point of view of resources among the "Big Five". Each of these banks (Big Five—Ed.) for the last four years have maintained profits well exceeding £2,000,000 (appr. $10,000,000) per year, which serves to furnish conclusive evidence of their importance in the banking world."

The strong position the United States financier holds on the international market will enable him to organize his home base as fast as the changes seem necessary. No matter how capable they are in organizing their financial structure, the bourgeois theory, that it will eliminate the economic cycles has already been disproven by life itself. These theories will take new form with the ebb and flows but the transformation of these conjunctural crises to revolutionary crises will sweep the material foundation away, and consequently the stack of cards built upon it. —H.

Where Does the Italian Opposition Stand?

Writing about the crisis in the Italian Communist Party, the last issue of Revolutionary Age declares: "Not only has comrade Amadeo Bordiga been expelled as a Trotskyite but there is a new wave of the so-called 'right opposition' which was supposed to have been destroyed with the expulsion of comrade Serra (Tasca). The emergence of this Communist Opposition is one of the most hopeful signs in the Italian Communist movement." The rest of the article continues in the same vein, that is, it deliberately attempts to create the impression that the new Opposition in the Italian C.P. is of a piece with the international Right wing of Brandler, Lovestone, Hais and Co.

Nothing could be further from the truth, as is quite well known to the editors of Revolutionary Age! The comrades of the new Italian Opposition, as Lovestone is well aware from the foreign press, have constantly fought against the opportunist policies of the expelled head (and body, one might add) of the Italian Right wing, Tasca. In an Open Letter to the members of the Italian Party recently issued for the Opposition by comrades Santini, Elasco and Feroci expelled from the Political Bureau and the Party, and Teresa R. of the Central Committee, we read:

"Our Opposition, developing to its consequences the criticism it had undertaken under the pressure of events in Italy and internationally, when we wanted to trace the complex international questions, as is the task of every proletarian current, was bound to orientate itself towards the international Left Opposition which has for many years been conducting a campaign of clarification and orientation with which our Opposition emphasizes its accord... All the facts that have been proved within the International and Soviet Russia have confirmed that the international Left Opposition is the only one that saw correctly, that posed and solved in a Bolshevik manner the problems of the revolution in the course of these last years, and struggled with great energy against the errors of the International, on the theory of socialism in one country, and the industrialization plan of Soviet Russia as well as on the Communist policy towards the peasants, or the questions of the revolution in Orient, and all the fundamental questions of the international movement."

This hardly looks like accord with Lovestone and his international allies! It seems that the latter, who so systematically lose their troops to the social democracy, are continuing desperately to show a good front of strength, even if it has to be manufactured out of the growing ranks of the international Left Opposition! But though Lovestone is an old hand at fabrications against "Trotskyism", his game is becoming ever more transparent.

Stalinists Lose Their Heads in Boston

The Party is breaking up the New International Hall; it is hard to say whether they are doing it consciously or unconsciously. The N.I.H. is one of the finest institutions in the country. It belonged to the Left wing movement. The building was bought when the Left wing movement began to develop in this country. The two branches, the John Reed Branch, 718, Workmen's Circle, and Branch 18, Independent Workmen's Circle were the two largest branches in Boston, and also the stronghold of the Left wing movement. These two branches with a membership of 400 bought many shares and certificates, and practically all the income for the New International Hall came from them. The New International Hall was not only the center of the Left wing, but it was also considered more as a home for the working class.

New Crimes on Stalinism's Law Books

The first crime of the John Reed branch, 718, Workmen's Circle, was that with a majority of the branch membership they decided to invite comrade Cannon to speak at their meeting, and then the branch did not obey the orders of the Party to leave the Workmen's Circle. (Seems that the branch did not believe in the 3rd period.) For their crimes they were thrown out of their own building and became, by the new vocabulary, counter-revolutionists, Trotskyites, enemies of the Soviet Union, etc.

Now comes Branch 18, Independent Workmen's Circle which committed similar "crimes": 1. Branch 18, I.W.C., did not obey the splitting policy of the Stalinists and remained in the I.W.C. 2. The branch invited the following "counter-revolutionists" to speak at their meetings: A.F. Konikov, one of the founders of the C.P. and well known as an active member of the Communist League of Boston. Also the Party feels especially rotten because comrade Shachtman was invited to speak at the branch while he was in Boston.

The handful of Stalinists decided to throw out Branch 18, I.W.C., also. They first tried the diplomatic way of raising their rent; but when they found that this maneuver would not work, they called a meeting of their own boys and "unanimously" voted that Branch 18, I.W.C. also be expelled as a member of the Institute. Accordingly notice was sent to Branch 18, I.W.C. to move from the N.I.H. not later than August 1, 1930 (The registered letter was received, Monday, July 7, 1930). It should be especially interesting to read the following paragraph of the letter which shows how low the Stalinist sank:

"Also Branch 18, I.W.C. invites speakers that are openly against the policy of the Workingmen's Educational Institute and against the Left wing labor movement in general to speak, lecture and slander the principles that this institute stands for; speakers like Dr. A. F. Konikov, and M. Shachtman, etc., whose policy is to attack the Soviet and to disrupt the activity of the workingclass movement."

Splitters of the Left wing movement, you are not ashamed to state that the policies of comrades Shachtman and Konikov, etc., are to attack the Soviet Union and to disrupt the activity of the workingclass movement! The workers in Boston do not believe you any more!

The Party's Progress...

Yes, the Party in Boston is making progress.... Let us state the last victory, which concerns the Chelsea Labor Lyceum. The Labor Lyceum was in the hands of the Left wing movement, but since the Party began the discrimination of the Left wingers to their rotten policies, the Right wing controls the Labor Lyceum. Now the New International Hall is in a deficit of $3,000. If the Party will continue its rotten policy the N.I.H. will swing over to the mortgagers.

We are calling upon the Left wingers not to let the Stalinists break up the New of Boston, Roxbury and Dorchester, etc., International Hall as they have done with the Chelsea Labor Lyceum. These two institutions have a Communist history. For the consequences they will afterwards blame the Trotskyites, renegades, counter-revolutionists, etc....

This is the 3rd period! Long live Stalin! We are progressing! We gain one victory after another.

But a few more victories like these will be more than even the Party can stand.

The Communists in the South

By HUGO OEHLER

(9) By the time the new forces had arrived, July 12th, Dunne, Wagenknecht, Drew, Martin and others had started the work of reorganizing and preparing the ground for the defense of our leaders in jail. The worst of the reaction had subsided and the new cycle was well on its way. This followed the indictments and called for organization around this issue. Our main office had been moved to Charlotte, a larger town some thirty miles from Gastonia. We collected the scattered forces, issued dues cards to new members and started collecting initiation from new members and dues from old ones. The Bessemer City and Gastonia meetings were enlarged and spread over the entire area to every mill town, step by step in an organized fashion. Organizational work of establishing mill locals was started. Our first objective was a conference at Bessemer City July 28, a day before the opening of the trial.

(j) We readily realized that the technical situation of the N.T.W.U. was a handicap, that our National Office was in a bad shape—a reflection already of the new line of mechanical swing from the reactionary unions to new unions. According to our constitution all applications must be sent to N.Y. from the South and they made out dues cards and mailed them back. In stable, well-functioning locals this may work—but not in company mill towns where all mail is the first pick of the bosses and, more important, when we were in the middle of a drive, recruiting new members by the hundreds, who prized the dues book more than anything and a drive among new recruits to union organization of any kind. Why the force before us allowed this method to continue and hamper their work I do not understand. We found over 500 dues books piled up at our Charlotte office and hundreds of disgusted workers because they waited so long for a book and did not get any. In normal times the delay would be too much for such drives. We soon put an end to this method. The Bessemer City Conference rolled around and showed:

1. We had the textile workers of the whole area behind us with a couple of hundred delegates, mainly from the Gastonia area and over 1,500 workers attending.

2. The delegation, all American born workers accepted our program unanimously through policy and not mechanical control.

(k) The Southern fraction failed to obtain any Negro delegates to the convention, even after some were elected.

The parade in Gastonia that the center informed us to call off for fear of a riot was agreed to by us, but I had been the last one to accept it and as far as my knowledge goes the prisoners were the first to protest the idea of the parade.

Following the Bessemer City successful conference came a change of venue to Charlotte for August 26th. The Bessemer conference had instructed all members to be present in court Monday morning and the hot day found our forces well represented in Gastonia that whole day and a packed courtroom mostly of textile workers in their working clothes.

The unions and other organizations cooperating intensified our work in the coming weeks and the union picnic of August 25th at Mt. Holly was jointly with the preliminary I.L.D. conference a day before the second trial. We progressed in the following activity. Plans were well under way for the Charlotte October 12-13 convention of the newly organized district as the outgrowth of the Bessemer conference. Our literature covered the whole field and the South. The Labor Defender and the Daily Worker played an invaluable role. The youth organizers from the North were pressed into union work to such a degree that their own field was neglected. They made excellent fighters. Mass union meeting and local union meetings, closed and open were held in all mill towns, we had three to four in progress each night. The number of mill locals increased with our work.

(l) By this time the slogan of frame-up was changed to self-defense and I supported Dunne on this. In the field, covering meetings every day, meetings of determined workers who were only able to hold these meetings each time we first organized a force strong enough to let the boss know he had better not attack us; and with defense committees organized around each meeting I was carried away with the concrete situation as others of the Southern fraction were.

The right of self-defense was a living reality with us and without it our organizers were the dead force. However, the situation in the field and the slogan as a national one to rally broad masses of all shades of political beliefs in the workers' camp for the one big issue was against this frame up and the self-defense issue should have nationally been a secondary issue regardless of what the reality of our concrete meetings were. This is not an excuse for me—just facts—but does not justify the position. More harmful than this was the I.L.D. "united front" campaign we will deal with later.

The Mt. Holly picnic was a huge success and the second trial ended with a mistrial. A retrospection will show we followed up the attacks of the bosses' first degree charge with not one victory but a series of victories and consolidated our forces in this area and extended agitationally in many other centers of the South.

(10) By the end of August the leading field fraction committee could feel increased action and plans against us, a preparation of the bosses for a drive on us. Our feeling was based on daily observation and reports from the field. The full fraction was put on a military base to the dislike and protest of several of the fraction members who joked about it. We prepared according to conditions and on September 9th, Saturday afternoon a mob of several hundred, overseers, bosses and part of the committee of 100 included with the "law's" protection, with rifles, clubs and blackjacks assembled at a meeting place in South Gastonia, chased all comers away and attacked a speaker's car and beat up the occupants. It was the beginning of the open drive on us. The speakers were lucky to get out with such little damage.

This brought home a warning and the reality of the situation to the rest of the comrades. We prepared to answer this with a mass meeting there, our regular Saturday one the next week and with a week's mobilization for it. Monday the mistrial brought the second trial to an end and that night the black hundreds rode led by Bulwinkle and Solicitor Carpenter, swept three counties, raided three offices, looked everywhere for all organizers they could lay hand on, destroyed records they could find and kidnapped Wells, Saylor and Lell and were not fortunate in obtaining the others or our main records due mainly to our early preparations and possibly to luck.

Our mass meetings were stopped except in Charlotte where the first one held after the raids shows the workers 100 per cent behind us and a good defense corps ready for anything. While the black hundreds had free reign for the following period we were daily going to mill locals in the area and setting up an underground apparatus. The fact that we had over two dozen mill locals, functioning well for such workers new at organization saved the day and laid the basis for our comeback and also prevented the black hundreds from driving us out of the whole area. The secret mill local meetings were the reasons for the mob follow up in small bands. They aimed to stop them, to get the speakers and organizers, break up the work for October 12-13 and defeat our work for the next trial. They succeeded in taking Cleo Tessener, our King Mt. organizer out on the night of September 18.

Fair progress under these difficult conditions was being made for the Saturday counter-attack of our forces. Each night textile workers from locals in the area took turns and sacrificed the night as guards near the jail in Charlotte where our comrades were prisoners to prevent another attempt to lynch them. The action of the police in the immediate preceding period proved not to us, who were already convinced) but to the textile workers, that they could not be depended upon and this law was the bosses' law and not our law.

Our progress for Saturday received a big set back on September 12 when the Charlotte police raided our organizers' house one block from the jail, took our weapons and ammunition of defense, arrested comrade Saul, Martin and five others and charged them with "attempt to overthrow the government of N.C." This charge did not get to first base but it had its desired effect of disorganizing our force and taking our defense weapons while the black hundreds were arming everyday for Saturday.

From the governor to the policeman the "law and order" program was a policy of hands off the bosses' black hundreds and search and seizure of the textile workers old rusty hunting guns. The policy was in well oiled shape Saturday when the bands of the bosses black hundreds of overseers, foremen, hired gunmen and reactionary organization forces rode every road in and around Gastonia in high powered cars with guns held high. In every mill town they dispersed the textile workers headed for So. Gastonia when possible. This culminated in the murder of Ella May, a murder committed by the mill owners, their police, the Governor's force and their thugs to carry out the work. The other organizers who took part in the Saturday attempt to get to So. Gastonia ended with their narrow escape.

conditions in China cried out for independent Communist leadership, for the arming of the workers and peasants, for the unleashing the forces of revolt in the cities and the countryside against both the Chinese and the foreign bourgeoisie. In the name of the "democratic dictatorship" which "could not be skipped" and the bloc of all classes, the Stalin-Bucharin regime worked hand in hand with the Chiang Kai-Sheks and Wang Chin Weis to stifle the mass movement. To the extent that the Stalin regime is responsible for the leadership of the present "Communist armies" ("Communist" today and with Feng or Chiang tomorrow) it is guilty of hindering the real mobilization of the masses for the class struggle.

The Correctness of the Opposition

There is deep discontent and acute suffering in the country. How great the revolutionary tidal wave was when the Russian Opposition wrote its platform, and how correct was its prognosis is evidenced by the fact that three years after the crushing of the Canton insurrection and the industrial proletariat, the movement of 1925-6-7 still finds a belated echo on the countryside. But the peasantry is no independent social force. Its liberation from landlordism and feudal elements, the nationalization of the land and its redistribution can be achieved as the Russian revolution demonstrated, neither in alliance with the bourgeoisie nor by its own independent action, but in alliance with and under the leadership of the industrial proletariat. The democratic revolution, the essence of which is the agrarian revolution, can, in other words, be realized only by the socialist dictatorship, which nationalizes the basic industries and establishes worker's control. The agrarian revolution by itself cannot solve the problems of the Chinese revolution. It can only be one phase of the struggle against world imperialism. The national unification of China and its customs independence—that it the monopoly of foreign trade, will be ushered in under the dynamic action of the proletariat.

There is no "short cut" to the revolution. The "easy" ways of opportunism and putschism prove in the end the longest ways. The need of the hour in China is to rally the masses against the counter-revolutionary ruling bourgeois cliques. The Communist Party must root itself again in the industrial proletariat, cement its alliance with the poor peasantry, and organize the great masses around a program of partial demands with the Constituent Assembly as the focal point. And the struggle against foreign imperialist intervention, a hindrance to any revolutionary progress, must be taken up in earnest.

25 Third Avenue

New York, N. Y.

Strong-Arm Stalinism Defeated in N. Y.

The corner of 125th Street and 5th Ave., a working class section, has been occupied every Saturday night by speakers of the Communist League of America (Opposition), New York branch, for two summers. Every week, from two to four hundred workers have gathered regularly to hear our point of view on current questions. The neighborhood being well populated by Russian White emigres also, our speakers have constantly been confronted with their hecklers who attempt to influence the workers against Communism and the Russian workers' republic. Their attacks were always easily met by our comrades, although the White guards persist, and recently have begun to throw water-bags and tomatoes from the roofs and windows.

At the last few meetings, however, the White guard scum has found an unexpected ally in the attempt to break up our meetings. That ally consists of a couple of hooligans, parading under the name of the official Comfunist party, who try to break up the meetings by violence. On July 26th, when only four of our comrades were present at the meeting a gang of 30-40 Stalinist hoodlums commenced a concentrated fire of shouting, booing, heckling and disturbance while comrades Jane and Max Rose were speaking in defense of the Soviets which were being calumniated by the Whites. Towards the end of the meeting, they made a rush for the platform, one or two of them mounted it to shout a few of the stock "slogans against Trotskyism" they learned from Browder, and then disappeared into the night.

The following week, August 2, another group of Party members, accompanied by the same drunken individual who had led the assault the week before, appeared at the meeting while comrade Max Shachtman was speaking to some 400 workers. For over an hour, this young bully carried on a disgraceful shouting down of the speaker, who was explaining the reasons for the Fish Committee "investigation" of Communism. He was evidently trying to whip the Party members present into a frenzy, preparatory to rushing the platform again, but his conduct was so scandalous that when Shachtman asked the other Party members if they agreed with his actions, they answered publicly in the negative!

The White Guards assisted the Stalinist hooligan by continuing to throw water-bags and vegetables from concealed spots, until the workers in the audience, outraged by the arrogance of the disrupter, helped our comrades remove him from the scene.

Other Party members remained, and together with non-Party workers, asked numerous questions in a comradely manner. They realized that the conduct of the disrupter only discredited Communism and the C. P. in the eyes of the workers. The tactics of some Stalinists, inspired by their leaders, of roving the streets in search of workers' meetings to break up only ends, as it must, in alienating every honest worker from the Party.

The Opposition, of course, will continue to hold its meetings in public, to defend them against White Guard Russians' and even against Stalinists when that is necessary.

A CORRECTION ON CHINA

The Militant is glad to correct a false impression it left in a previous issue concerning the groupings within the Chinese Communist movement. Our attention was called to it by comrade Niel-Sih who wrote us from Shanghai: "By the way, a mistake is made by you in saying that the Chinese Left Opposition published the organ The Proletarian. In fact, it is the Right Opposition group, led by Chen Du-Siu (former secretary of the C.P.) who publishes The Proletarian. The Our Word group which wrote to you that they would publish the Proletarian never realized its plan until this name was adopted by the Right Opposition group which is now masking itself in Left Opposition phrases. The three chief currents in the Opposition movement in China are the ultra-Left Our Word, the Left October group, and the Right Proletarian."

Stalin and his Agabekov

The White Guard emigration is celebrating a new victory of which we have already spoken in the Militant. A new Soviet agent, Agabekov, has just passed into its camp; he is under the special protection of the agents of Tardieu. The triumph of the Whites is not without grounds: a responsible collaborator of the G.P.U. has passed over to their camp. He is preparing or has already prepared a book in which he reveals the activity of the G.P.U. in the East. The model for this type of book has been furnished by Bessedovsky: the secrets and the clandestine affairs which are inevitably bound up with the class struggle of the workers' government against the imperialist foes are intermingled by these gentlemen of invention and calumny, according to the taste of their masters.

Who Agabekov Is

The White press has already given a lively account of the great services rendered by yesterday's Stalinist, Bessedovsky, to the Rumanian Siguranza by his revelations on the Soviet government. Agabekov begins by giving directly the address of the secret agency abroad. At his work of denunciation, he passed the last few months in Constantinople where he arrived directly from Moscow. So it is not a matter of an official who passed a few years abroad without leaving and who "broke away" from his country. No, it is a matter of a man tested in a long-lasting work at Moscow itself, named quite recently to a new post. He is a man doubly tested, that is, from the point of view of his work and from the point of view of the Party line. Had he not been, Agabekov would not have been named for a post still fresh from the death of Blumkin. For such is the irony of the fate of Stalin: having killed Blumkin he found nobody to replace him with than Agabekov.

Now we receive first-hand confirmation: Agabekov has stated to journalists that Blumkin was shot for his "Trotskyism", and that he, Agabekov, was called to Moscow as an unbending supporter of the general line. He was initiated into the whole situation, from the angle of his special work as well as of "Trotskyism". Experts of Stalinism like Menzhinsky, Iagoda, Trilisser (didn't they take Yaroslavsky into this thing as a partner?) did not find the slightest blemish on the political face of Agabekov.

After an examination, and an authorized instruction, he was sent to Constantinople to replace Blumkin, shot a while before by Stalin. And immediately after his arrival, Agabekov began to write a book, or rather a report to the agents of world imperialism on the secret work of the G.P.U. and the Comintern in the East. The book finished, he went with it to Paris and immediately placed himself under the protections of Tardieu's agents.

The trustworthy diplomat of Stalin, Bessedovsky, before leaping over the Embassy wall to render his services to the Rumanian Siguranza, disposed of all the affairs and the documents belonging to Rakovsky. That is not all. Bessedovsky participated directly in the expulsion of Rakovsky from the Party. Christian Georgevitch Rakovsky was not "trustworthy" enough: in the first place, he did not admit that a genuine Russian socialism could be constructed with the Kulak, and then he denied that the Kulak could be suppressed in two years by means of the G.P.U. And, "untrustworthy" and "inconsistent" element that he was, Rakovsky was placed under conditions that prevent him from continuing his revolutionary work, uninterrupted for forty years, and which expose him to physical ruin. Death for Rakovsky! The open road for the Bessedovskys!

The Breach in Stalin's Monolithism

Beginning with 1924, a rule was established in the G.P.U., then in the army, by virtue of which Communists not only have to fulfill their duty towards the Party, but they must also think every minute like the Central Committee. Subsequently, the rule was extended to the whole Party and rounded out with another: the Central Committee must think like Stalin. After this, Stalinist monolithism seemed to be 100 percent guaranteed. But now a breach is opened; not having the right to think, to doubt, or to reason, the monolithic Stalinists have begun to jump directly from the heights of their responsible posts to the French, British and Rumanian Secret Service. In full battle array of Stalin-Eucharin against the Trotskyists, the Centrists drag behind them an immense reactionary tail which beats them over the head. The Bessedovskys, the Agabekovs are a part of this heavy tail. Debauched Thermidorians have completely revealed themselves abroad, for there there is only a wall to separate them from their real master. And in the U.S.S.R.? How many are there like Bessedovsky and Agabekov in every institution, in every region, in every district? Who could count them, when they are themselves to be counted? Who will purge the Party of them, when it is they who purge it of others? Who will perceive their "hesitations", when they ne-

A Slanderer Answered

Who and Where Are the Real Deserters?

The most revolting collection of slanders yet produced in the "struggle against Trotskyism" appeared in the Daily Worker on July 29, 1930. The individual best fitted by nature for this scavenger's job is, of course, Earl Browder. In this article, Browder sinks to a depth we had previously imagined nobody in the Communist movement could reach.

The "Final" Merger

That he repeats for the hundredth time, like a creature whose mind is wandering, that we have "finally" merged with the Lovestone group is of little consequence, for the workers in the movement know he is lying as he lied on previous occasions. Party comrades now know that this Stalinist floor-walker speaks so incessantly about the Trotsky-Lovestone "unity" in order to make them forget the real Browder-Lovestone united front which expelled the Left Opposition from the Party, burglarized us, and used gangsters to break up our meetings.

Nor will any serious person be impressed when Browder writes: "They act as stool-pigeons and provocateurs in the class struggle in the United States". For does not every Communist know that it is Browder's international faction—not ours—which has produced Chiang Kai-Shek, Purcells, Bessedovskys and Agabekovs without number?

It is when this paid employee of the Stalin clique speaks of "desertions" that he deserves his proper reply. This person who hides away comfortably in an obscure office writes of the two noted fighters who have recently adhered to our platform: ..

"Hugo Oehler deserted his post in the South at a difficult moment, without notice, and simply disappeared. When discovered later in Chicago, he was found in a pathological condition suffering from hallucinations, which was the only factor saving him then from expulsion from the Party. He is suffering from a serious case of paranoia. His 'conversion' to Trotskyism is a by-product of his mental breakdown. The case of George Saul differs somewhat; he ran away from a six months' sentence on the chain-gang in Carolina, covering up his desertion by leaving the Party and announcing himself as a Trotskyite."

Repelling as it is even to write about this garbage a few facts as well known to Browder as they are to us, must nevertheless be established. The unblemished records of comrades Oehler and Saul need no defense. It is sufficient to remind our readers that they fought for Communism and the textile workers in the South, under the daily threat of lynchings while their present detractors directed them from the safe vantage point of New York. That the "paranoid" Oehler (Phillip Scheidemann used to say exactly that about Karl Liebknecht!) after his "desertion" from the South was offered the post of national secretary of the National Textile Workers Union and other responsible Party posts in New York and Chicago. That comrade Saul, after his "desertion", was made organizer for the International Labor Defense. That James Allander Party trade union director in Denver, wrote comrade Saul, under date of July 4, 1930, (after the "desertion"): "I was instructed by the Central Committee to take up with you, your coming into Denver to take the position of district organizer for our new district", etc., etc. That comrade Saul, now working in the Western wheat fields, has repeatedly written to the I.L.D. about get-

ver hesitate until they have completely betrayed?

The International Opposition would not be worthy of its name if it were not capable of drawing all the necessary conclusions from the Agabekov affair and of explaining them to the Communist workers. Every member of the C.I. must be obliged to examine fundamentally the fact that Blumkin, the irreproachable soldier of the revolution, was shot by Stalin for "Trotskyism". In place of Blumkin was put the loyal Stalinist, Agabekov who passed over immediately to the service of the imperialist police.

The Agabekovs constitute an enormous layer of the Stalinist bureaucracy: they are a legitimate product of the Stalinist regime. Functionaries can close their eyes to these facts. The revolutionary worker must discern the grave peril from these symptoms.

But since Browder has spoken about "desertions", let us ask a few really pertinent questions:

Karl Reeve put on his hat and coat in Charlotte when the Party fraudster decided to go into Gastonia, and said, before he left to catch the train to New York: "You people can go down there and get lynched But I'm going home!" Is this not the same Reeve who was rewarded for his courage by being made Party district organizer in Minnesota by this same Browder?

Where is John Owen who left the South without permission? Where is Otto Hall who refused to go to Gastonia or any other part of the strike area? Where is J. W. Johnstone who refused to participate in the strike, saying: "I am not going to be made a fool of." Where is the president of the N.T.W., Jim Reid, who always refused to go to the South, was finally taken there almost by force, and then disappeared from Charlotte, turning up in New York and explaining his presence by the need to pay taxes on his Rhode Island properties!?

Where is George Pershing, who left the Bessemer City strike at the most critical moment without permission or notice and skipped North?

Is the Sroka who is still organizer for the N.T.W. the same Sroka who left the Pinevill strike without permission, so that the picket line collapsed and the strike was lost?

Is the Murdoch whom Browder just made secretary of the N.T.W. the same Murdoch who refused to heed the instructions to go to Elizabethton?

We could speak about more notorious cases, some of which will yet be heard from. But not being stool-pigeons, we do not furnish the state prosecutors with information as to who skips bail or who runs away from sentences—even when there are such cases. This contemptible work we leave to the Browders who are so skilful at it

Why is Browder so recklessly venomous against the Opposition and its supporters? For two reasons. The first is a quite personal one. The Militant has already exposed this "revolutionist" as the banqueting campaigner in China of the butcher of Canton's Communists, General Li Ti Sin. Browder dared not and could not deny this, and it sticks in his craw.

The second reason for his bile is the growth of the Opposition in the face of all his attacks, both "literary" and gangsterist. The step taken by comrades Saul, Oehler and others recently has been additional proof that the truth of the Opposition continues to penetrate into the ranks of the Party, convincing its best workers. Naturally this enrages the Browders who have no ideological weapons with which to combat the Opposition, but only falsehood, calumny and thuggery. Their rage conceals their fear. The victory of the Marxist Opposition means an end to the Browders. Their spirit is incompatible with revolutionary movement.

As long as we still have capitalism and socialism, we cannot live peacefully—either one or the other will be the victor in the end. The obituary will have to be sung either over the death of world capitalism or the death of the Soviet Republic.—LENIN

Comrade A. C. Miller Suspended

At its recent meeting, the national committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) adopted a decision to suspend comrade A.C. Miller, of Williston, No. Dakota, from the organization for a period of three months. The decision was caused by the failure of comrade Miller to acknowledge the correctness of the League's position in condemning the action he took in the recent North Dakota primaries. It was his position that since there was no Communist Party organization in the field, nor even a farmer-labor party or non-partisan league, he was justified in running for the nomination to office on the primaries of the Republican Party so long as he announced himself as a Communist and advocated a Communist policy.

The national committee of the League took a categorically opposite stand to this action, which flies in the face of all the teachings of the leaders of the revolutionary movement, of decades of experience, and more directly, of the platform of the Opposition. To run, even as a Communist, on a Republican primary or list is to sow illusion and confusion in the minds of the workers and poor farmers. To take such an action is to create the illusion in their minds that the machinery of the bourgeois parties can be utilized to any extent by the toilers. In this particular instance, it was a repetition on a small scale of Townleyism (Non-Partisan League), against which revolutionists must conduct the most merciless struggle. The aim of the Communists is to separate the masses from the bourgeois parties, not to attach them.

Comrade Miller's position in the movement, and his years of devotion to the cause, convinced the national committee that the error arose out of an unclear understanding of the principles involved rather than a conscious departure from Communism. The three-months' suspension was therefore decided upon, as well as an attempt by correspondence to change the opinion of comrade Miller. In addition, it was decided, that should comrade Miller fail to acknowledge the complete incorrectness of his position at the end of the suspension period, his expulsion will follow automatically. It is the desire and hope of the national committee that this step can be avoided and comrade Miller return to his active functioning in the organization.

The Epoch of Stalin

Three years ago a certain Xenophon discovered that besides the epochs of Marx and Lenin there was still another: the epoch of Stalin.

At the 13th Convention of the Communist Party of White Russia that just took place it remained for Manuilsky to prove that this epoch puts that of Lenin in the shade. Manuilsky stated:

"Comrades, I ask you: when was the Party, even in the period when it stood under the gifted leadership of Ilitch, so consolidated, iron a power as today?"

From this deification of the Stalinist regime, which throttles every opinion in the Party, to a disguised accusation against Lenin, who, as is known, "undermined the iron power" of the present Party by the methods of inner-Party democracy—is only a short step.

At about the same time, Pravda publishes in a leader a brief outline of the history of the Moscow Party generation. Main content: The struggle against "Trotskyism".

And most remarkable: the history of the Moscow organization is begun with the year 1923! What was there up to 1923? What was there under Lenin? Why does the history of the Moscow Party begin only with the date of Lenin's illness?

The answer is clear. It is with 1923 that the new epoch of the Stalin regime begins, the "highest perfection of Party development" —VALENTIN OLBERG

If it is at all possible, to realize socialism in one country then one can believe in that theory not only after the conquest of power but also "prior" to it. If socialism can be realized within the national boundaries of backward Russia then there is the more reason to believe that it can be realized in advanced Germany. Tomorrow the leaders of the C.P. of Germany will surely bring forward this theory. The Draft Program empowers them to do so.

The Military Revolt in Peru

The constant struggle between British and North American financial interests, is clearly discernable in the present military revolt in Peru. Following close on the heels of the fall of the Siles dictatorship in Bolivia, Augusto B. Leguia, director Peru, has been forced to resign the government of that country into the hands of a military committee.

For eleven years, Leguia has served Wall Street well as its Peruvian "viceroy", being ever ready to support the American imperialist interests against their British rivals as well as against the masses of native peons and workers. The various movements which have attempted to struggle in one form or another against the existing regime have been suppressed arbitrarily and in the most ruthless fashion. Consequently the prisons are filled with political prisoners ranging from the liberal bourgeois elements around Haya de la Torre in the A.P.R.A., which under the veil of the anti-imperialist struggle covers up its services to British capitalism, to the workers' and peasants' leaders who have dared to organize the masses against the imperialist exploitation.

A few years ago considerable attention was called in the revolutionary and even in the bourgeois press to the system of forced labor existing in the mines and highways of Peru, the peasants and Indians of certain regions being forced to work for a nominal wage and at times for nothing at all for a certain number of days yearly as a sort of "patriotic contribution" to the country's progress.

Peru is one of Wall Street's most productive colonies, being especially rich in oil, copper, vanadium and molybdenum. The interests of British imperialism are also large, amounting to $140,897,897 on January 1, 1929 as against $150,889,000 for the United States at the same date. Prior to Leguia's administration British investments greatly exceeded those of the United States bankers, but the war, together with the control by Wall Street of the political machine headed by Leguia, gave American interests the opportunity to expand and to outstrip the British interests. So far as can be judged by the information available up to now Leguia's downfall, while heralded throughout the world and especially throughout Latin America as a blow to "absolutism" is recognized on the New York stock exchange as a blow to the American investors. This is seen by the sudden drop taken by stocks of the Vanadium Corporation, the Cerro de Pasco Copper Corporation, and by the government bonds and sharp fall of the Peruvian currency. Calvin Coolidge expressed the feelings of his master when he stated in his daily gangle that "the reports of a revolution making headway in Peru are disquieting and discouraging."

On the other hand we cannot refrain from cautioning the editors of the Daily Worker against going into ecstasies over the "attempt of the Peruvian masses to seize power". They made the mistake of so analyzing the Bolivian military coup d'Etat of a few weeks ago. Unfortunately the organization and fighting abilities of the Peruvian proletariat, as well as of the Bolivian, are at too low an ebb to make possible at the present moment an effective utilization of these family quarrels among the imperialists and their lackeys.

Vote Communist!

Against the Parties of Unemployment and Wage-Cuts, and the «Socialist» Reformers

The election campaign is well under way. The capitalist class has put up dummies who execute its orders in the city, state and national legislatures, and the sham battles between the two openly capitalist parties have begun with the usual attacks—entirely correct—upon each other's integrity, malfeasance and corruption in office, dishonesty and graft. The bankruptcy of the Republican and Democratic parties has rarely been brought out in such bold relief.

Capitalist Bankruptcy

The apostle of "permanent prosperity", Hoover, has been neither desirous nor capable of stemming the tide of misery and suffering that has inundated millions of unemployed workers and those at work whose standards are being brutally lowered. Hoover's Democratic critics, who are making the most of the political capital with which his incapacity serves them, shout all the more loudly against their Republican brothers-under-the-skin because they must themselves conceal their total failure to alleviate the indescribable conditions of the workers in those localities where there are Democratic administrations (New York City New York state, throughout the South, etc., etc.).

The truth is that the capitalist politicians, who represent the system which produces unemployment, child labor, prostitution, wars and misery, are cynically unconcerned about the sufferings of the workers except insofar as it gives them arguments against those in office and for those who want to get at the trough.

The third party of the bourgeoisie, the so-called Socialist Party, is still in the field with its petty shop-keeper's reforms. It has become a pure and simple election apparatus, with no more fixed membership than Tammany Hall, with candidates whose chief aim is to attract votes and not to advance the class interests of the workers. The party of Debs has become the party of Norman Thomas, with his quack reforms, and Heywood Brown, the idol of the liberal intellectuals.

The "Bulwark against Bolshevism"

The American Socialist party is the spiritual and material brother of the British Labor Party, under whose administration unemployment in England has grown and flourished like the green bay tree, under whose knout, saber and machine gun the Indian workers and peasants are being massacred. The Socialist Party is the political machine of the corrupt labor bureaucracy in the needle trades and elsewhere, the parasites who work hand in hand with the bosses against the cruelly exploited workers. The Socialist Party is a vote catching machine that constitutes a safe deposit for the discontentment of the workers. It is a "bulwark against Bolshevism"—as the more enlightened capitalist papers perceive—that is, a bulwark against the advance of the working class in struggle against their oppressors.

The workers are confronted—not only on election day but all through the year—by a dictatorship of the capitalist class, by that group of James W. Gerard's multimillionaires who REALLY run the country, a dictatorship that can be abolished only by a dictatorship of the workers, that is, of the overwhelming majority of the people, a dictatorship that would be a thousand times more democratic than any capitalist "democracy". The whole election system is a monstrous fraud of capitalism, a fraud which creates the illusion that the workers can seriously improve their lot or take control of industry by throwing enough bits of paper into the ballot box to "elect the right men"

The control of government, of industry, of power are never decided on the floors of congress, but on the battlefield of the class struggle. The elections give the workers the opportunity of testing their strength, their mood for struggle. The elections give the workers the opportunity of transforming the fraudulent paper battle around the ballot box into a genuine struggle for their demands: a struggle in the form of demonstrations and strikes that break through the hypocritical veil of spurious "democratic" elections.

The Main Issue

The principal issue of the day is unemployment, and the wage cuts, evictions, and starvation that accompany it. The Communist Party has properly focused the attention of the working class on this point. This party is the only one in the field that represents not only the immediate but also the final aim of the proletariat.

The Communist League of America (Opposition) has many disagreements with the policy of the Communist Party. We warn against the Party's tendency to make the social insurance bill the focal point in the election campaign. It is not through bills in Congress that the unemployed will obtain relief, the evicted a rent moratorium, the workers an end to wage cuts. To cause the workers to believe otherwise would be to sow the most destructive illusions among them. It is not Congress that can and will aid the unemployed by adopting a social insurance plan; it is not a bill that will aid the jobless in some dim, distant future (if ever under capitalism). It is the living, genuine struggle of the unemployed and the starving for food—of which there is plenty; of the homeless and evicted for roofs over their heads and against the grasping landlords—and homes there are enough—in short, it is only by their own struggles every day (and not around a ballot box) that workers can obtain relief.

The Communist League is also opposed to the appeal the Communist Party is making to the farmers—an appeal that does not unite the interests of the workers of the city with the workers in the fields and the poorest section of the farmers, but sets the interests of the farmers in general against those of the city working class.

Where We Stand

But the Communist Party nevertheless remains OUR PARTY. Its errors and shortcomings are the errors and shortcomings of a temporary leadership violently imposed upon it. The Communist League has appealed to the Party for united action in support of the Communist campaign. The faction agents who run the Party by grace of appointment have rejected this appeal. We will continue in spite of that to support the Communist Party campaign with all our strength.

The Communist Party is the only Party of the working class. It embraces the main elements in the revolutionary movement. Despite its incompetent leadership and their destructive policies, the Party remains the only one that workers conscious of their class interests can support. A vote to the Democratic, Republican or Socialist parties is a vote thrown away to the class enemies of the workers and their loyal assistants and moderators. A vote for the Communist Party is a vote for working class power.

VOTE COMMUNIST!

Blumkin Dead-Is Rakovsky Next?

Every day brings news of intensified measures of repression against the Left Opposition in the Soviet Union. Stalin is taking new steps forward. In order to apply the "law" with even greater cynicism, he constantly extends the meaning of the accusations against our comrades. "Counter-revolutionist" addressed to them is not an insulting and lying epithet, it is an accusation involving five and ten years in prison. Comrade Trotsky has been expelled from the U.S.S.R. with the accusation of organizing "counter-revolutionary" movements—that is of organizing the Bolshevik, proletarian resistance to the pressure of class enemies whom the Stalinist apparatus fights in words.

At one time Yaroslavsky invented the police conspiracy of the "Wrangel officer"—of a so-called collusion with an agent provocateur, former Wrangel officer sent into the Opposition's ranks by the G.P.U.—in order to compromise our comrades in some infamous plot. Stalin continues to create "amalgams" of this kind at every occasion. But he no longer needs such complicated fables. He directly "amalgamates" the Oppositionists with the laws that punish counter-revolutionary activity of White Guards, capitalists and speculators. Hundreds of militants, revolutionary workers, have been sent into places of deportation, then into prisons and solitary confinement under the lying accusation of "counter-revolutionary" activity.

Now we learn that a new system of accusations has been set going by the Stalinist apparatus. Our comrades are accused of espionage in the interests of the counter-revolution when their relations with Opposition Communists outside the U.S.S.R. are discovered. This monstrosity was disclosed by an accusation of espionage brought against a comrade imprisoned at Chimkent under the pretext that he was corresponding with comrade Trotsky. This is no isolated fact but a system. We learn that comrade Pestov, at Slavianskoye Selo, was accused in the same sense at the moment of his arrest "of entertaining relations with the counter-revolution abroad". Similar accusations are brought against other comrades.

The aim of this new and abominable invention is clear. The accusation of belonging to the counter-revolution "in general" is not sufficient to attain the aim sought, which is the physical extermination of the Left Opposition! To be able to lock up revolutionists for ten years in solitary confinement prison, to exterminate the best groups of the Opposition by shooting them at will, they have invented "espionage" and "relations with the counter-revolution abroad". The mechanics of Stalin are obvious. It is this blind and murderous mechanics that had Blumkin shot, who followed Eutov and others to their death. Stalin is trying to generalize his activities—which are genuinely counter-revolutionary.

Stalin is persecuting the very best.

Carolina Demands Its Pound of Flesh

The hue and cry has been raised. The posses are out for their victims. The North Carolina supreme court has upheld the decision of the lower court in the case of the seven militants convicted for their activities in the recent Gastonia strike, and the authorities are demanding the surrender of the defendants out on bail. But the defendants are not surrendering and they are not to be found. It is even said that some are on their way to the Soviet Union or have already arrived there. And the chivalrous southern lynchers of Negroes and women are in an uncontrollable rage. Their victims are beyond their grasp. They have no intention of serving twenty of their best years in the murder holes that serve as Carolina's prisons.

The fury of the textile kings' legal footmen is boundless. Here they went to the expense of staging an elaborate frame-up in court, of producing their prejudiced witnesses, of paying god-fearing jurors, in order to send the active Gastonia Reds to prison for terms that mean life. And after the trial, and after the appeal, the cells prepared for the workers are just as empty as when it all began, and they promise to remain empty.

The hyenas have been cheated of their prey; the courts of their victims; the bloated textile manufacturers of their vengeance. And the people who murdered Ella May in cold blood are shouting about "honor", the people who raided and smashed tent colonies and relief stores, who kidnapped and tortured union organizers, who brutally assaulted picket lines, who organized hooded terror bands, are shouting about "the processes of law". The bullies who attack women and children, who lynch Negroes when they outnumber them a hundred to one, who are immune from reprisals by the mighty powers of the state and its courts and police forces, are shouting about "cowards who run away"!

The respectable and "impartial" capitalist press of the North has joined in the hue and cry for surrendering the seven. The New York Telegraph, with its pseudo-liberalism that melts away at every touch of the class struggle, also presumes to speak of the missing defendants as "cowards". Its editors probably got the tip from the miserable article in the Daily Worker recently by Earl Browder, who accused comrade George Saul of cowardice for having "run away from a six-month chain gang sentence". This creature of Stalin, without convictions of his own or the courage of the convictions allotted to him by his employer, maintains a deep lence on the Gastonia defendants now, not having the courage to defend their refusal to walk into the life-long dungeons the Southern Bourbons have prepared for them.

For our part, the prison cells of Southern reaction may continue to be empty. The executioners of capitalist class justice have already taken more than enough toll in the wracked and tortured bodies of thousands of labor's best sons. Let the assassins of Haymarket, of Little and Hill, of Sacco and Vanzetti, cynical jailors of Mooney and Billings, the Centralia men, the Communists throughout the country—let these Shylocks demand their pound of flesh of the Gastonia militants. Their howls leave the class conscious working class cold . . . and firmer in its determination to release the class war prisoners who are still inside.

'Third Period' Bluff

Bessemer City Strikes Again

On May 18, over 800 workers of the American Mills, No. 1 and 2 of Bessemer City, N.C., went out on strike against a 20 to 30 percent wage cut and the ruinous pace at which they are driven by the mill bosses. In flaming headlines, the Daily Worker immediately announced this defensive struggle as being "under the leadership of the National Textile Workers Union". The next issue of the Worker however, meekly and obscurely informed us that "there is a danger of a repetition of the form of betrayal made famous in the Flint automobile strike, with misleaders seeking to betray the strike by waging an attack on the T.U.U.L. organization which has outlined a policy of struggle and spreading the strike." On the third day, the Daily Worker declared even more humbly and more obscurely, that "it is not true, as previously stated that the N.T.W.U. is leading the strike."

Leadership of strikes and other struggles is not won overnight, nor do betrayals take place with such startling and mechanical suddenness. Betrayals come "like lightning" only as culminating points of actions and tactics over a period of time, prepared in advance in a manner obvious to the militant elements (at least they should be obvious), and this is precisely what the Worker tries to cover up. To make it clear would be to expose the results of the official Party's policy.

A Year Ago and Now

One year ago, we led the strike in Bessemer City at the same time that we led the Gastonia strike, and although the strike committee had misleaders and stool pigeons on it, our forces with correct tactics, were able to isolate them and gain the leadership of the strike. The Bessemer City strike, it is true, had largely been foreshadowed by the Gastonia strike but it was our tactics that carried us forward, and the July 28 Bessemer City conference, with a couple of hundred delegates and over 1,500 workers present demonstrated our progress. We had a union hall in Bessemer, held regular meetings, had two mill locals and two other groups in the first stages of mill locals. Bessemer City supported us through the overwhelming majority of the textile workers and the police were friendly just to the degree that they were former textile workers themselves and felt our strength and the solidarity of the workers. (Bessemer City, by the way, was the home town of the martyred Ella May.)

From a condition of hegemony and undisputed leadership and with the possibilities greater and favorable objective factors, only one year passes for us to reach a point where our leadership is not only rejected, but organizers sent into the town are beaten up and almost lynched by hostile elements, who, consciously or not, play the game of the bosses and the Black Hundreds. Last year, when the Black Hundreds rode Gaston County we were able to hold our own in Bessemer City (which is six miles from Gastonia); today the tables are turned.

Not all of the bombastic phrase-mongering, and the self-praise so disgraceful in a revolutionist, not all the cheap journalistic talk about "Our Party being the only revolutionary leader of the mass struggles of the American workers", can successfully conceal the lamentable failure of the Party bureaucrats and their policies. The Bessemer City strike, like the Flint, Michigan and Pittston strikes before it reveal the fact that the Party leadership, substituting phrases and ever-changing theses for solid, every day preparatory work, is usually caught entirely unawares by struggles in precisely those localities and industries where it should have been decisively in the forefront and leadership.

Instead of this "difficult" work of persistent (and sometimes slow) foundation laying, the Party leaders follow the policy of making the membership drunk with intoxicating phrases about the "masses following our leadership by the million", about "the crisis in American capitalism is finally breaking it down", and similar blubber.

Result of Phrase Mongering

The result is that when a struggle does break out, the Party and the Left wing are frequently on the outside, estranged from the workers. This was true in the anthracite movement; and to cover up its own bankruptcy, the leadership followed its usual course of monstrous bluff to the effect that the "N. M. U. was leading thousands of miners in a strike against unemployment". The same thing held true in Flint. No preparations of a substantial, solid nature. The strike broke out. The customary concealment of impotence by loud shouting and bluff to the effect that the "Auto Workers Industrial Union is leading the Flint stikers"—until the ease with which the bosses' agent, Comstock, sold out the workers put an end to the pitiful fairy tales of the Daily Worker. And now the Bessemer City strike in the heart of the Party's former strength in the South, without the slightest Communist or Left wing influence on it. Here the attempt to bluff about "N.T.W.U. leadership" collapsed in two days, and the shamefaced denial had to be recorded quietly in the Party press.

The Party is entirely correct in pointing out that a leadership which rejects class struggle unionism and direction, and Communist participation will run the strike to ground. The Party is similarly correct in fighting against the element in control of the strike and attempting to win the strikers to the National Textile Workers Union. But the Party methods are wrong and it is these that have given birth to the very forces they are fighting. To miss opportunities and fight with false exaggerated policies, is to play into the hands of the reactionary element who can then demagogically influence the workers against a proletarian outlook and method of struggle.

It must be repeated that Bessemer City is in the very heart of the Party's most sensational struggle, of its fortresses in the South. That it is now entirely out of the N.T.W.U.'s hand is an alarm signal for the Communist workers. The "third period" and its philosophy have already witnessed several strikes in this country: Illinois, Flint, Imperial Valley, Pittston, and now Bessemer City. They were indications of the better objective situation for the movement, and the incapacity of the Party leadership. The dumping of the "third period" and its philosophers is the preliminary condition to the progress of the revolutionary movement. Bessemer City shows us why.

LOS ANGELES—

Trials! Every week another one! With the exception of March 6, the demonstrations of February 26, March 20 (Paris Commune), May 1 and August 1, were only attempts at demonstrations but in this reactionary town of L.A. comrades are being arrested for "attempting" as well as for holding a meeting.

At the head of the Red Squad is, none other than Wm. F. Hynes, who boasts of having belonged to the Workers' Party for nine months. At its organization, who boasts of leading a strike in San Pedro—this working class traitor and boiler of little children (for he actually punished children that way) arrests 28 at one meeting, 16 at another, 10 at a third, puts them behind bars, beats them, and then sentences them to long months of imprisonment. There is not a Communist in Los Angeles Party member or not, Y.C.L. member or Pioneer, who hasn't got a jail sentence waiting for him.

Of all the demonstrations, March 6 was the exception, due to the newspaper publicity that the "Communists are going to capture the City Hall". The streets were packed with great crowds who came to see the big show. Where were the masses on May 1 and August 1? They were not to be seen in spite of the fact that 100,000 leaflets were mimeographed and distributed for May 1 and 35,000 for August 1. The "Red" Plaza was empty on both occasions. The Communists were not allowed to enter the Plaza on May 1", and so a few hundred comrades who gathered "demonstrated" on the sidewalks near the Plaza, led by the Pioneers. On August 1, the 50 comrades present witnessed the following demonstration": the Y.C.L. members and Pioneers hired a truck with high sides, hid within it, and entered the Plaza in the truck from which the singing of the "International" aroused the police and 28 were arrested. Of course the papers played it up. "Reds Riot on the Plaza" is their favorite headline.

For the first time in L.A. the jury disagreed in the last two trials. Frank Specator and Carl Sklar, sentenced to 42 years in Folsom and San Quentin were brought handcuffed from the California Bastilles to these trials. Of course, dates for the new trials have already been set. California justice cannot afford to let its victims loose. One woman juror was reprimanded by the judge for reading the Daily Worker while on the jury. She replied that the other jurors read the labor-hating Los Angeles Times.

Organizers in the Party in L.A. change like hot cakes on a Childs' frying pan. Bureaucrat Begler is gone, charged with "criminal neglect of duty". Mobil suddenly disappeared. Clark is in jail. So a 20-year old girl, hardly capable of holding a position, was appointed, for the job.

The Friends of the Soviet Union held an enthusiastic meeting with Dan Donovan of the American Labor delegation to the Soviet Union. The hall was crowded with a thousand people who listened attentively and applauded heartily, for the story of the Soviet Union is the only one that can fill a hall for the C.P. in Los Angeles. Of course, Donovan did not mention the persecutions undergone by Oppositionists. No questions were asked due to the lateness of the hour, and the pictures shown did not show the prisons and places of exile where Rakovsky and his comrades are suffering under the Stalinist regime.

To defeat the great, centralized bourgeoisie is a thousand times easier than to "defeat" millions and millions of small owners (bosses) who in their daily, imperceptible intangible but demoralizing activities achieve the very results desired by the bourgeoisie, which restore the bourgeoisie. Whoever in the least weakens the iron discipline of the party of the proletariat (especially during its dictatorship), aid in fact the bourgeoisie against the proletariat.

After the A. C. W. Convention

It is three months since the convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers was held in Toronto. Are the clothing workers better off today than before the convention? The answer of the workers will be, No! The conditions of the workers are becoming worse day after day.

Let us analyze for a moment what happened at the convention. The writer, in a series of articles in the Militant last May, foretold not to expect anything from the convention, because the rank and file were not represented there.

Convention Accomplishment

What did the convention accomplish except banqueting and boozing? The convention was opened with "God Save the King" and the "Star Spangled Banner." Then came greetings and praise from the chiefs of the organization for not having a militant Left wing opposition present. There was not a single delegate at this convention who had the guts to take the floor and challenge the present administration for the deplorable conditions of the workers. Everything at this convention was decided unanimously.

There were two cliques at the convention, which fought for control of the New York organization: the Forward Beckerman clique and the Hillman clique. Both fought to keep the workers in submission. When the question of the New York organization came before the convention, Beckerman took the floor and made a speech. He showed how the workers in N.Y. suffer, and that the organization is in a critical condition. There was no one to laugh at him, and it would be proper were not the conditions of the tailors so tragic. This is the man responsible for most of the evils in the N.Y. organization, such as the introduction of piece work systems, reductions in wages every season, throwing workers off the job, blackjacking them, etc., and he was the one to oppose the administration. This was merely a political maneuver. Beckerman's speech proved one thing; he was compelled to admit that the workers in New York suffer and work under the most inhuman conditions.

It did not take the shrewd politician, Hillman, long to patch things up and make peace between the two cliques and divide the spoils among them. With this the opposition came to an end.

The convention went on record for life insurance, which means the protection of the workers when they are dead, not when they are alive. The convention also went on record for the 40-hour week, an organizational campaign in every center, and the strengthening of the New York organization. Has Hillman made any attempt to carry through these decisions? No!

The New York Lock-out

In the New York organization, a serious situation developed. Three branches of the industry were locked-out: canvas makers, kneepants makers and children's jacket makers. The employers asked a reduction in wages from the already meager earnings of the workers. Hillman, instead of mobilizing the workers for a strike and demanding the 40-hour week, the abolition of piece work, production standards and reduction of wages, is doing everything in his power with the aid of his paid agents to send the workers back to work with reductions in wages.

Who is responsible for the lock-out of the jacket makers? Max Kaplan, the manager of the contractors' association. This man was expelled years ago from local 12 for being a scab agent and breaking a strike of the Journeymen's Tailors' Union. He was exposed in Hillman's office and Hillman has been dealing with him for the past few years (see Fortschritt, official A.C.W. organ of August 11, 1916, page 3.) The Amalgamated fought a lockout for 26 weeks in 1920-21 and Hillman refused to negotiate with the manufacturers' association until lawyer Gordon was withdrawn. For the past few years now Hillman has been dealing with a scab agent.

Is it to be wondered at that the workers have to yield reductions and production and starve under such a bunch of parasites that call themselves union officers? What have the pen-slaves and professional boosters to say about this?

Were Hillman sincere and interested in the suffering of the workers he would declare a general strike and help improve the workers' conditions. But Hillman's union is kept up with the aid of the employers. How can he proceed against the interests of the employers? Although the last three conventions have gone on record for the 40-hour week, Hillman has never made any effort to carry the decision through.

Hillman, you know, is a democrat, a wise statesman, an intelligent leader, a respectable banker. He doesn't believe in calling strikes. We in the Amalgamated are better off than the workers in the other needle trades. We only work 20 and 30 hours a week due to Hillman's efficiency and speed-up system. In reality, the workers in the contracting shops work 46 and 47 hours a week, and the officers of the Joint Board know about it.

The "Organizational Campaign"

What about the organizational campaign? Hillman will surely show wonders, just as he did in Philadelphia where the workers were forced to give a reduction of from 20 to 40 percent under the union agreement. We reproduce here a letter from the Toronto firm of Wm. H. Leishman and Co., signed by president John I. Mills, and dated May 6:

"From investigation, it appears that quite a number of our group are desirous that our shop be a Preferential Union Shop. We have given a good deal of thought to this proposition and have come to the conclusion that to avoid serious disturbance, it is advisable that we carry out your suggestion by entering into an agreement with the Union and subscribe to the Market Agreement now in force with the greater majority of the Toronto manufacturers....

"We have arranged with the Union that the reduced rates offered our Group will be available to any or all of our employees who wish to join them at this time. You will realize that in order to be employed be a member.

"If there is any information that you require, Mr. Black (the vice-president of the firm) will be glad to have any of you come to his office and discuss any matter that you are not clear on."

Years ago the workers were fired for joining a union; today, the employers urge their workers to join the Amalgamated. Isn't this in the nature of a miracle? I am sure "comrade" J. B. S. Hardman-Salutsky will write an editorial for his boss to prove that the Amalgamated is still a militant union, as he has done on many occasions when the union officialdom forced reductions in wages upon the workers and introduced the piece work system.

Who is to be blamed, essentially, for not having a strong Left wing militant group in the Amalgamated? The peanut politicians of the "third period" who, instead of mobilizing the workers and preparing them for a fight inside the union, are calling upon the workers to join the Industrial Union—which simply doesn't work under the present relationship of forces. This policy will only cause a few more victims to lose their jobs and that is the end again. The next day they tell the workers to participate in elections which is advocated by the "counter-revolutionary Trotskyists".

The Left wing must mobilize the workers inside the Amalgamated and fight for policies of the class struggle, as we have pointed out in the Militant a number of times. The Left wing's zig-zag policy of praising Hillman to the skies one day and pulling isolated members out of the union the next day—that is what Hillman and his machine want. This will keep the machine in power and the workers will be left the prey of Hillman, Salutsky and Beckerman. Let us unite our forces inside the organization and do away with the Hillman machine as we once did away with Tom Rickert of the United Garment Workers.

(This article was written during the recent lockout of a few branches of the New York men's clothing workers.—Ed.)

Maurice Malkin Stands with the Opposition!

Maurice Malkin, now serving a sentence in Comstock prison for his activities in the furriers' strike of a few years ago, was the first rank and file worker to rally to the banner of the Left Opposition upon its expulsion from the Party. His incessant agitation and general activity for our movement was a source of permanent irritation to the Party bureaucrats. They tried to end his activities by gangster methods, but without success. It was only after comrade Malkin was sentenced and had already begun to serve his term that the Stalinist clique began to exert a different kind of pressure upon him.

In October, 1929, the Daily Worker triumphantly published a statement allegedly written in prison by comrade Malkin, in which he was to have repudiated the Opposition and returned to the Stalinist camp. We wrote at that time, in the face of this "repudiation" that Malkin had been an Opposition fighter and would remain one; that when the whole story of this "statement" was made known it would expose the Party and I.L.D. bureaucracy in a disgraceful light. We are now in a position to make the truth known, and that on the basis of comrade Malkin's own letter to us.

The statement printed in the Daily Worker last year was obtained in a manner which set a precedent—and a despicable one—in the labor and revolutionary movement.

"That statement was not made by me," writes comrade Malkin, "but by some of Lovestone's agents in the D.W. office or one of the Stalinist leaders in the national office of the Party. I challenge the Party officials to publish the original statement with the one printed in October which was extorted from me and then falsified so that as soon as I read it in the Worker I immediately wrote Wm. Z. Foster demanding that the original be printed. It had been squeezed out of me under threats and pressure from the I.L.D. and Party leadership to the effect that they would stop my defense and economic support of my parents unless I made a statement."

Comrade Malkin's parents are of course so advanced in years that they are totally incapable of fending for themselves, and relied upon their son. The threat to withdraw the financial aid of the I.L.D. would have condemned them to virtual starvation. Never in the history of our movement, so far as we are aware, was financial pressure exerted upon a class war prisoner by a defense organization to compel him to change his political opinions. It remained for the cynical hacks appointed to run and ruin the I.L.D. and the Party to use this monstrous method of "ideological enlightenment".

Understanding as we do the circumstances under which comrade Malkin was compelled to make his statement, we do not make an apology for it here. But there are no words too sharp to condemn the criminal procedure of the Stalinists in this case. Their boasts of Malkin's "capitulation" are groundless. He remains with the Opposition. In his letter to us, he says:

"I deem it necessary to make this statement to clarify my position. I was one of the first in the C.P. of A. to align myself with the Leninist Opposition, the group that defends the teachings of Lenin and Marx, and I will remain with this group which is led by Lenin's co-worker and collaborator, L. D. Trotsky, until the day the Russian and the international working class has removed the leadership of Stalin, Molotov and Co., and the International Opposition is returned from prison and exile to their rightful posts.

"Only then will we be able to realize, not the building of socialism in one country—according to the reactionary theory of Stalin and Co.—but a real Leninist International and a world Communist society.

"Long live the Leninist Opposition!" "Long live Leninism and its leading defender, Trotsky!"

"Long live Rakovsky and the other Oppositionists exiled and imprisoned by the present anti-Leninist regime led by Stalin!"

—MAURICE L. MALKIN

Comrade Malkin's re-adherence to the ranks of the Opposition is an index, added to the many that have appeared recently, of the growing strength and vitality of our movement. We welcome him again into our ranks.

James McInerney

The news of the death in Walla Walla, Wash. penitentiary of James McInerney has come as a shock to every class conscious worker in the country. McInerney was one of the famous Centralia I.W.W. defendants sentenced by a bosses' court to from 20 years to life imprisonment for having defended their hall and lives, weapons in hand, against a mob of uniformed American Legion gunmen who raided it on Armistice day, 1919, with murder in their eyes. Wesley Everest, one of the I.W.W. members, was lynched by the mob after having been unspeakably tortured and finally castrated by the masked cowards.

McInerney, one of the finest types of revolutionary workers in the country, was himself tortured bestially. With the bullet wound received in the famous Verona battle, the tortures in Centralia, and the destructive regime in prison the last ten years, even his usually robust health was undermined. He died of tuberculosis and spinal meningitis—his blood on the hands and head of the lumber barons, their Legionaries and their corrupted courts.

Upon receipt of the tragic news, the I.W.W. throughout the country organized memorial demonstrations. In New York over a thousand workers gathered on two days notice at 14th Street and University. Speakers representing the Lovestone group, the Lore organization, the Socialist party, the Proletarian party, the anarchists, spoke from the platform. Max Shachtman spoke for the Communist League (Opposition) and Herbert Mahler, the chairman, and W.I. Fisher spoke for the I.W.W. The leaders of the Communist Party and the "non-partisan" I.L.D. refused to participate or send a speaker on the grounds that they would not occupy the same platform "with Trotskyists and Lovestoneites"! This act of spiteful and criminal sabotage did not raise the prestige of the Party among the sympathetic workers; it was only greeted with bitter indignation.

In the meantime the balance of the Centralia men are still imprisoned, all of them under the threat of McInerney's martyr death. They are among the men that have created one of the sturdiest traditions of the American labor and revolutionary movement. Their continued imprisonment remains a rebuke to the workers—particularly the militants among them. The untimely death of McInerney is a startling reminder of the obligations the working class, for whom these fighters worked so loyally, has toward them.

Are our prisoners to die in their cells, like trapped rats? Shall the hand of death alone release them from imprisonment, or shall it be the linked arms of labor battering down the steel and stone that holds them?

CASE OF COLD FEET

KANSAS CITY—

N. Sorenson, D.O. of K.C. was advertised to speak August 1st at 15th and The Paseo. When time came to call the meeting N. Sorenson, the D.O. fails to appear.

Comrade Jenne Rovinsky, who remains a loyal (but honest) Stalinite, gets up on the box and addresses the 40 or more workers who turned out to hear the D.O. of Kansas City.

How Jennie Rovinsky who is a sincere and courageous fighter can have any confidence in these bluffers like N. Sorenson and the Browders is a mystery.

N. Sorenson shows up August 2nd and says he was held by the police. Fear of exposure made him change to county officials. We have found on investigation that no N. Sorenson (or alias) was held by city police or county officials on August 1st. Sorenson will have a hard time to explain his actions to the comrades here in K.C.

"N. Sorenson, D.O. of K.C. has left the city and put E. Peterson in charge as acting D. O."

E. Peterson two years ago defied the D.O. and District Committee—when asked to make a financial report as District Literature Agent. When pressed later on he admitted he was short over $100.00 in his account. He has been looking for a Party job for over four years now. At last temporarily he is a big job holder.

Faking, bluffing and misappropriating Party funds is not going to build a Communist Party in the U.S.A.

—A. A. BUEHLER

WHO WILL PREVAIL?

The provisional character of the Congress is displayed more crudely than the most imaginative Oppositionist might have conceived it. What is the single episode of Uglanov worth? This bully, audacious when he is the apparatus, but a rag when he is outside of it, repented for the second time by unreservedly recognizing all the "rhythms" and all the "periods". Does that look as it were enough? They laughed at him. Is that what he was asked? Are you a little child? Then acknowledge that Stalin is a born leader and countersign it.

Evidently, Uglanov acknowledged it and, of course, he countersigned it. Everything is now reduced to that. The five year plans may vary; yesterday the growth was still 9 percent; today it is 30 percent. The five year plans may become four or three year plans and, for collectivization, even two year plans. But that is not the question. Acknowledge Stalin. The assembling does not take place on a program, nor on ideas, nor on methods, but on a person. Stalin surrounds himself with a Central Committee, the Central Committee with District Committees, and the District Committees select a Party. The Congress assembles only for the purpose of demonstrating for things settled in advance. Taken as a whole, it is a preparation for Bonapartism within the framework of the Party. It takes a pitiful blind man or a tired official not to see it and not to understand it. But to see and understand it, and to keep still, is possible only for scoundrels. There are not a few of them among the capitulators.

The ten hours Stalin—what emptiness of bureaucratic thought!

Stalin's Figures

The figures of success are not presented to instruct, but to dazzle and deceive the Party. The successes are incontestable—it is not we who deny it; we foresaw them and we fought for them at a time when the motto of the Party was to be satisfied with the "slow growth", at a time when all the Kaganovitches shrieked at us while defending the five year plan at 9 percent: "Where will you get the means, demagogues?" At a time when all the Yaroslavskys, in reply to criticism of the shameful minimalism of the original five year plan, threw volumes of control figures at the heads of the speakers; at a time when the Molotovs jeered at the very idea of the possibility of a 20 percent increase after the end of the reconstruction period. The successes are undeniable. We foresaw and fought for them a long time.

Already in the first control figures of the state plan of 1925, very imperfect and very timid, we discerned "the music of socialism in construction". What sarcasm this expression aroused among the philistines, the ignoramuses, the dunces, the talentless geniuses of the all-powerful apparatus. Now that all the immense possibilities contained in the October revolution have blazed a way through the most stubborn difficulty—the narrow conservative spirit of the bureaucracy—the latter parades in its Congress:

"The October revolution: that is us! Socialism: that is us! And everything else: that is us also! For the State, is us!" After which Stalin appears and explains: "The workers' State, that is I; and all of them, they are still I." And since they have destroyed and trampled down the control of the masses, they need an arbitrary power, a chief, the coronation of the hierarchy, the first among all: Stalin. That is why they rise and proclaim in chorus: "Yes. We are he." That is the music of the Sixteenth Congress.

The economic successes are considerable. But the difficulties and the contradictions are still greater. On that point Stalin said nothing. Or rather, he merely said just what was needed to conceal the difficulties and attenuate the contradictions.

Nothing but figures to characterize the rhythm of growth! Not a figure to characterize the quality of production! It is as though to describe the constitution of a man, one gave his height without giving his breadth. This also applies to the question of net costs. The whole economic system, and above all, its management, is tested by the output of labor and the tributary economic forms of the market, the output of labor is measured by the production costs or the net costs. To avoid this question is to declare a man healthy by looking at his face without either listening to him or taking his pulse.

The inter-dependence of the city and the country is regulated among us by the exchange: money is not yet a thing of the past. Stalin said nothing about the dangers of inflation.

The problem of the relation of taxed prices of agricultural products and retail prices of manufactured commodities is one of the central problems not only of economy but of the whole social and political system based on the October revolution. Are the "scissors" of the price of manufactured objects and agricultural products closing or widening, the "scissors" of which one blade represents the worker and the other the peasant. Not a word about that in the report.

On the contrary, one finds there the affirmation of the dilemma: "Who will prevail?", is now settled and conclusively. This conclusion is drawn from the incontestable weakening of capitalist forces in the internal market. But this weakening does not decide the question. The village has not yet said its final word. The contradictions of the country are being brought into the frame-work of the collective farms, but they have not yet disappeared. They will reveal themselves. A good harvest will revive their acuteness. The drivers and numskulls will surely say that we are against a good harvest. All the Rudzutaks have Mikoyaned, all the Mikoyans have Rudzutaked on this theme for many years until, in their ardor, they ran their heads against the Kulaks' barns. That is when they proclaimed in Pravda that, as a result of two good harvests, the Kulak had attracted the middle peasant and taught him to conduct the grain strike against the Workers' State. The less the leadership is capable of foresight, the more the process of differentiation pursues its fatal course. It will pass through all the collective farms and develop the differentiation between the various farms and within them. And that is when the leadership, which is strong for forecast after the event, will convince itself that the framework of the collective farms, lacking solid material and cultural foundations are exposed to all the contradictions of merchant economy. The majority of the bureaucratically created collective farms will become the arena of the class struggle. That means that the dilemma: "Who will prevail?" will arise anew in all its amplitude, raised to a higher degree.

The World Market

But the struggle will not stop there. The internal forces of capitalism in the U.S.S.R. draw their importance and significance from the forces of world capitalism. But Mikoyan—this infant prodigy—will probably have to convince himself that there really is "this world market to which we are subordinate, to which we are bound, from which we cannot escape," (Lenin at the 11th Congress.) The dilemma: "Who will prevail?" is in the last analysis the question of the mutual relations between the U.S.S.R. and world capitalism. This problem is not solved but only posed by history. The internal successes are of great importance because they give the possibility of consolidation, of progress, and when it is necessary to wait, of holding on. But no more. The internal economic struggles are vanguard battles with an enemy the bulk of whose forces is beyond the border. The dilemma: "Who will prevail?", not only on the military field, not only on the political field, but primarily on the economic field, is posed before us on a world scale—or more precisely, it circumscribes us.

Military intervention is dangerous. Economic intervention by low-priced products is incomparably more dangerous. The question of economic power and of political stability leads in the last analysis to the question of labor productivity. In merchant economy, labor productivity is expressed by the net cost and sales price. The "scissors" between home prices and the prices of the world market constitute the most important measure of the relation of forces between growing socialism and its capitalist encirclement. What has become of these "scissors" in the course of the last two and a half years? On this essential question, no reply. Stalin gives no seriously studied comparative coefficient, no Marxist formula to define the dynamic interdependence of home and world economy. The engineer who runs an electric station must have before him a chart of the control apparatus by means of which he ceaselessly follows all the fundamental processes of production and the distribution of energy. In the same way, the economic direction of the Soviet State must have on its "chart" the constant system of coefficients which characterize—not only the absolute growth of industry—but also the curve of net costs, the purchasing power of the tchervonetz, the home and foreign "scissors". If not, the leadership is compelled to react blindly to economic disorder, until the safety apparatus explode one after the other, fire breaks out, and the consumers lose themselves in the night.

The emptiness of ten hours of bureaucratic thought will teach the Party nothing and prepare it for nothing. Quite the contrary it can only lull it with the disgraceful melody of "national socialism".

The Party Regime

At all events, the most threatening danger is not constituted today by the "scissors" between home and foreign prices. The most threatening danger is the "scissors" between the Party bureaucracy and the working class, with the complete impotence and the decomposition of the Party. The monstrous parade of "monolithism" is crowned by a small, a very small circumstance; but a very menacing one: this "monolithism" of two millions cannot tolerate the slightest criticism of the leadership. In the thirteenth anniversary of the dictatorship, after all the economic and cultural successes, after the question "Who will prevail?" is pronounced finally settled and when, consequently, the Party regime should become incomparably freer than at the time of the civil war—the ruling Party, that is, the bureaucracy, does not tolerate a single critical remark by a worker, a single timid question by the student: "Is not the Central Committee responsible for the deviations?" The whole press, unleashing its standardized rage, denounces the remark of the worker or the question of the student as the most direct and most threatening danger to the dictatorship of the proletariat.

The bureaucracy of the G.P.U. does not let itself be surpassed by the Party bureaucracy, with its Yagodas and under-Yagodas grown ripe under the Stalinist sun. The Agabekovs watch vigilantly over the monolithism up to the moment when they pass over to the class enemy.

One of the deported Oppositionists is hunted down by virtue of the statute on espionage for having corresponded with Trotsky. This idea undoubtedly comes from the Master himself. For his whole mastery consists only of such ideas. In his speech to the Congress, Stalin said that the Left Opposition serves information to the press of the world bourgeoisie. What information? The verbose speaker said nothing about that. However, from the information that the bourgeoisie gets from our publications it can draw but one conclusion: that in spite of the Thermidorian lies of Stalin's agents, we, Bolshevik-Leninists, constitute an inseparable part of the Soviet Republic, its devoted soldiers, ready to defend it to the very end and at the same time, the Left wing of the international proletarian vanguard. The world bourgeoisie and the social democracy understand this very well. That is why they enclose us in a hostile blockade, for which the Dovgalevskys, the Bessedovskys, and the Cachins join with Tardieu, the Krestinskys come to understandings with the ministers of Hindenburg, and the Sokolnikovs conspire with the Hendersons. There is the real distribution of men on the great chess-board.

As for ourselves, we ask what information is needed by the world bourgeoisie, after what is furnished it by the official Stalinist press agency, and primarily by Stalin himself. The president of the Soviet of Commissars is spoken of as a saboteur Yesterday's leaders of the Comintern are branded as the "agents of the bourgeoisie". For the amusement of children, they exhibit yesterday's guides of the trade unions and of the Moscow organization who purged it of "Trotskyism" for many years. On top of this, the official press publishes information on the passage of "Trotskyists" from the ranks of the Red Army into the ranks of Chiang Kai-Shek. Is all this a joke? The world bourgeoisie knows the history of the Red Army well enough to ask itself: "If this is true, then what does it mean?" At the same time, irreproachable Bolsheviks, unshakable revolutionists are persecuted for having corresponded with Trotsky. Do not these facts, furnished every day and every hour by the Stalinist apparatus—which tramples under foot and drags into the mud the whole past of the Party and the revolution solely for the purpose of forging a falsified biography for the provisional chief—do not these facts suffice for the world bourgeoisie?

And if that is not enough, the Stalinist informers appear in their second edition: Bessedovsky, Krukov, Agabekov who have ceaselessly combatted Trotskyism for seven years, who yesterday—literally yesterday—directed the purging of the nuclei, and who pass directly into the camp of the class enemy furnishing the Secret Services of imperialism with all the secrets of the Soviet government which were confided to them or which they were aware of. What information does the bourgeoisie still need after what they are constantly furnished with by the Stalinists of today and the Stalinists of yesterday, who supplement one another?

Stalin's Repressions

After the shooting of Blumkin, Stalin replaced him with Agabekov. There is a fact which sums up the policy that Stalin carries out in the Party. At the same time, the Agabekovs persecute the revolutionists who correspond with Trotsky by virtue of the statute which is supposed to permit Stalin to perpetrate new assassinations. He who does not understand the symptomatic and threatening import of this fact is a miserable idiot. He who understands and keeps quiet is a scoundrel.

Neither the repression nor the threats will silence us. The stake of this struggle is too grave: it is the fate of the Party of Lenin and the October revolution. Not only of the C.P. of the S.U. but of the international Party of Lenin, which has adjutant fallen under the direction of the adjutant Flick under the pseudonym of Molotov. It is a question of the preservation of world Communism. The struggle between Leninism and Stalinism is still open. And here the question "Who will prevail?" assumes its full amplitude.

Repression will not cause us to deviate from our path. The bloodiest and most envenomed violence of Stalin will not separate us from the Party and will not oppose us to the Party that Stalin holds at the throat. But we will redouble, and treble and multiply tenfold the energy of our struggle. Today we continue to serve the aims that we served in the 1905 revolution, during the imperialist slaughter, in the 1917 revolution, the civil war, the first period of economic construction, the foundation of the Comintern, the struggles against the cowardice of the philistine epigones, for a bold rhythm of socialist construction, against national socialism, for the international revolution!

—THE BULLETIN OF THE OPPOSITION (BOLSHEVIK-LENINISTS)

Where Is the British Party?

Nine years ago the Communist Party of Great Britain was formed. The delegates at that unity convention in 1921, representing over 5,000 members, had visions that at last a united revolutionary party had become a reality.

It would be quite true to state that every delegate present honestly believed that with the elimination of sectional differences, which would from then onwards be settled within the party, a rapid advance would be made.

A Nine Years' Balance

Nine years have passed and what are the results? Have we built up that strong revolutionary party rooted in the masses? Has our membership gone up in leaps and bounds? Has our influence spread into every section of working class life? The answer to these questions is unfortunately, No. In fact, we haven't even held our own. The reverse is the case.

Our membership has decreased by fifty percent. Our influence is of a negligible quality and as for being rooted in the masses, we are scarcely in touch.

Many reasons can be given and many excuses made. The writer puts forward his reasons as to why.

A revolutionary party in an industrial country like Britain must have leaders that continue to be in close touch with industry. Our leaders, with few exceptions, have never been industrial workers or else they left industry with the formation of the party. If a mass meeting is to be held with three or four of our leading executive members as speakers, we can advertise and boost it as we like but the net result would be at the outside perhaps two or three hundred people and two-thirds would be our own members. This refers to a London meeting.

The experiences of our Russian comrades have been accepted and applied too literally. To transplant into Britain tactics, methods and so on, just because they happened elsewhere, is the height of folly, and to insist that this is the only correct line in spite of adverse experiences is suicidal.

Robotizing the Party

Whilst recognizing that discipline within a revolutionary party is a necessity, to instill fear into every member that a thought, word or deed which wobbles a hair's breadth of the straight and narrow path, means expulsion—makes it not a party of intelligent working class fighters that is being built, but a party of robots. Our party might well shrink by half.

Can a party really have a healthy growth when the financial responsibilities are matters considered outside the jurisdiction of the membership? The experience of the British party is emphatically, No. A subsidized party sows the seeds of its own destruction.

Thousands of members have left the British party in disgust. Where we had locals of fifty to a hundred strong, we have small groups and in many places only contacts. There are industrial cities by the score without a single party member.

This weakness reflects itself in other directions. The Y.C.L. is practically defunct. To state that they have a hundred and fifty members would be putting it high. A hundred would be nearer the mark.

The Minority Movement is in a similar position. Following any strikes where their members have taken a leading part, the Worker (organ of the M.M.) devotes pages for weeks afterwards to our mistakes. Always mistakes and defeats, never victories or good generalship.

The Minority Movement

A recent issue of the Worker devotes more than half a page to a meeting of the executive committee and if the brief and incomplete statements of the E.C. members are anything to go by, it appears fairly obvious that a general state of dissatisfaction exists.

In view of the fact that the army of unemployed has reached the two million mark, and the workers have thrown off the apathy that followed the general strike of 1926, and are now fighting every inch against all schemes of capitalist rationalization, a continual decline of a revolutionary party shows something must be wrong. The above is not a pleasant picture to paint, and it certainly would not be correct to state that all hope has been abandoned. Recently there have been signs of an awakening. The mesmeric influence is weakening.

Just what will happen when certain of the sleepers awake is hard to state, but it sure will be interesting. Future developments within the British party are worth watching.

Rakovsky in Danger!

A third raid and search has just been made at Rakovsky's. The ring draws more tightly around him. Rakovsky is in danger.

The Left Opposition calls to every Party comrade, to every member of the Left wing and its unions, of the I.L.D. and the Friends of the Soviet Union: Comrades, it is the best Bolsheviks that are being exterminated. The bourgeoisie is following this work of extermination with a silent joy. It is pursuing the overthrow of the dictatorship of the proletariat by every means, including the external and internal corruption of the Stalinist bureaucracy.

Remember this: Stalin replaces the Rakovskys with Bessedovskys. He unites with Purcell and Chiang Kai-Shek but has only the most brutal methods against Trotsky. He assassinates Blumkin and puts Agabekov in his place. These changes are an inexorable law of Stalinism.

To defend the U.S.S.R., the dictatorship of the proletariat means primarily to save the Left wing of the Bolshevik party, the Oppositionists. You must act with energy in the revolutionary organizations. In the Party, in the T.U.U.L., in the I.L.D.—raise these questions to the irresponsible bureaucrats: What are you doing with the deportees? What is the situation in the solitary confinement prisons? Why was Blumkin killed?

To Browder, Bedacht, Hathaway and Co., the triumphant leaders of every defeat and setback to our Party, we ask:

What are you doing to our deported comrades? What are you doing now with Rakovsky?

The Fight of the New York Plumbers Helpers

“Every trade man a union man is a slogan never omitted from the journals of the A. F. of L., but there is an abyss between their words and their deeds. One of the strongholds of the A. F. of L. is the building trades, but the industry is far from being organized. “Patronize the union labor,” “do not work with a scab” and other slogans like it are the favorites of unionism as proclaimed by various A. F. of L. organizations, but after these many years the potential scab on the building construction job remains ignored.

The plumber's helper is a building trades worker who is not only exploited by the boss but also the goat of the industry. In all the days of “prosperity”, when wages ranged from $12.00 to $15.00 a day and $8.00 to $11.00 for apprentices, the plumber's helper received a meager $4.00 a day. The cost of living rose with the wage increases, but the helpers wage remained the same.

Many attempts have been made by the workers in the trade to organize into a union to better their working conditions and in general, to gain the benefits of organized labor. Many were the lessons taught these young workers that the officialdom of the A. F. of L. would not organize them. They not only discourage organization, but continue to hinder its slightest progress.

The year 1927 was rich with such experiences. The American Association of Plumbers' Helpers, with more than 3,500 members, was welded together in greater New York, fighting for recognition from the United Association of Plumbers, Steam-

Self-Determination

The Problem of Mobilizing the Negroes in the Class Struggle

The Communist International has issued the slogan of Self-Determination for the American Negro. The 7th Convention Thesis of the American Party says, “The Party must organize the most intense struggle around the demand of social and political equality for Negroes, which is still the main demand of our party in its work among Negroes. At the same time the Party openly and unreservedly fights for the right of the Negroes for national self-determination in the South, where the Negroes comprise a majority of the population. Self-determination for the Negro masses is the logical continuation and highest expression of the struggle for equal rights (social equality).”

Is Slogan Correct?

There can be no argument among Communists regarding social and political equality for the Negro masses. The question is, does the slogan of self-determination mean “the logical continuation and highest expression of the struggle for equal rights” for the Negro of the United States?

Either class, capitalist or proletariat, can use the slogan of self-determination to their advantage in concrete situations. The proletarian vanguard uses it against the imperialist in the colonial struggle for freedom. The capitalists use the slogan too, and a good example is its use against the defeated nations and the Soviet Union as a two-edged sword in the Balkans and Central Europe at the close of the last world war. Self-determination under a Soviet power is a concession and transitory measure in our development toward Communism. Such a concession in the south may be necessary but the conditions of the Negroes, interwoven in the whole economic structure with decisive sections in the industrial centers indicates that such will not be needed.

Self-determination for a colonial people or subjected national unit with cultural and language differences is a blow against the enemy forces and a step toward our hegemony. But self-determination for the American Negro can only be accomplished by the establishment of a Soviet power and such a measure then would not be a stepping stone.

Self-determination at that stage instead of a Soviet class emphasis means subordinating the class issue to the race issue because all indications are that such a stepping stone or concession is not necessary. Cuba, India, Manchuria or Ireland constitute economic units with language and cultural differences, etc., and such slogans at certain stages can be used by the proletariat against the imperialists but this slogan for the American Negro who does not constitute such a unit only blurs the class issue of the struggle in America.

The Garvey Movement

The Garvey movement rallied a considerable mass for the slogan of self-determination as a petty-bourgeois movement directing their energies away from the class struggle. The Party says we are turning this right side up. In the case of Garveyism the slogan was right reformism and in our case it is only shifted to left reformism. The change from Garveyism to the Party is a change in form but not in content. The change from Africa (Garveyism) to the South (Stalinism) may be far in miles but it is quite close in content. The Negro business man who is a watchdog for imperialism must not be confused with the petty-bourgeois element and ideology of the Negro, just like the A.F.L. leaders as imperialist watchdogs must not be confused with the liberals and petty-bourgeoisie even though all these unite on many issues. The petty bourgeois section will join our bandwagon, not as a back seat driver but as the real driver because the slogan takes the class content out of the struggle for the United States.

Self-determination within a national unit must imply more than double exploitation, racial difference or a majority in a backward section, to be used as a slogan. The Negro race has the same language, are part of the same economic unit and do not have marked cultural differences. The Mexican in the southwest faces the same conditions the Negro does and in addition has language and cultural differences. If the slogan means anything it must include him where he is the majority.

The Party says self-determination in the south where the Negro comprises the majority of the population but the Party uses the slogan mainly in the north and in the industrial centers.

The distinction drawn between the north and the south as to where the condition of self-determination is to be carried out leaves the impression on many Negro workers that we want them to leave the north and the industrial centers and go back south. On the other hand it implies that the southern agrarian Negro is the decisive section of our ally. We know that the industrial Negro (including such centres as Birmingham) are the decisive section of the Negro race. The industrial and urban Negro and the Negro in the north does not want self-determination if he must move south. What the Negroes want is social and political equality where they are. The white worker must put the main emphasis on this side of the question.

Racial and Economic Oppression

Racial oppression is economic oppression and the class struggle in this case takes on racial forms. But as Marxists our aim is not to enlarge the racial form or any other distorted form but on the contrary, to direct our slogans, tactics and strategy to transform this racial form toward the real content of the class struggle. The class issue must dominate and especially the proletarian Negro where we are using this slogan the most.

The slogan also shows confusion of the problem of imperialism and the colonial oppressed. The Negro of the United States cannot be classified as an oppressed national group as was the case of peoples under Czarism with national cultural and language differences. The decisive section of the American Negro is interwoven through the whole economic unit, just like the oppressed Jewish people are interwoven through the whole capitalist system. The Negro of the United States demands social and political equality where he is. The decisive section of the Negro race is scattered through the whole economic unit and the Soviet power with proletarian democracy can easily remedy the situation in the south. “Against white chauvinism and for social and political equality for the Negro masses!” —H.

Too much confidence was placed in the A. F. of L. local leadership in applying for recognition. Jobs that it was possible to strike and hold until recognition from the boss plumber, were left alone. The failure to strike the job for job control was one of the prime causes for the dwindling of the organization. And an additional factor hindering the work in the organization was the reflection of the factional strife among the executive board members imputed into it by the ruling Party clique which was more interested in factional advantage than in advancing the cause of the workers.

A Statement of Views on Some Disputed Questions

By ALBERT WEISBORD

... 4. With the world war and the revolutionary wave that followed its wake, the epoch of imperialism entered a new stage qualitatively different from the one existing before (from 1900 to 1914). Distinctive of this new stage are the following: (a) the proletarian revolution is victorious in the U.S.S.R. (b) Post-war capitalism, with all its force, cannot get back to pre-war stability. The decline of capitalism cannot be stopped. All the attempts at "stabilization" become desperate efforts merely to slacken the tempo of the international revolution. This can be seen by the fact that, during this time, while some revolutionary situations are liquidated by the forces of international capitalism, yet some revolutionary situations cannot be liquidated and new ones constantly and repeatedly arise; concurrently a whole host of other situations begin to take on a revolutionary character. (Germany 1923, Bulgaria 1924, Estonia 1924, China 1925-27, England 1926, Austria 1928, India, China, Indo-China, besides Mexico, Nicaragua, Haiti, Porto Rico, Finland, etc.).

Situation Before and After War

Before the war, neither revolutionary situations nor actual revolutions could have been created by the activity of the socialist, revolutionary parties throughout the world. No matter how well or tirelessly these parties worked the bourgeoisie was too strong, the level of activity of the masses, generally speaking, too low, to cause a given situation to become a revolutionary one. Basically, these revolutionary situations had to develop by themselves from the objective contradictions arising in capitalist society. When, during and after the war, these objective contradictions did cause revolutionary situations to arise, by that time the subjective factor had become so powerful as to be able to mature such revolutionary situations in a number of countries, into actual revolutions. Today imperialism has become so much weaker, today, so close is the situation in a number of countries to a revolutionary one, that it is possible for an international Communist movement, PROVIDED IT HAS A LENINIST POLICY, and especially now when it controls a state backed by 150,000,000 workers and peasants, to develop situations otherwise still non-revolutionary into revolutionary situations, in DIFFERENT countries at DIFFERENT times. (This does not mean that a C.I. can "order" a revolutionary situation in ANY country at ANY time). It is a fact that today, with the correct policy, it is far easier in many countries to disintegrate the capitalist armies, to ruin the prestige of the ruling classes, to expose the petty bourgeoisie, and to activate the masses to an extraordinary degree than before.

Every worker knows that, under some conditions, the activity of a Communist group can "develop" a strike situation, where without this Communist group, no such situation would have been "developed". Today the Communist Party (under some circumstances and with a Leninist policy) can be the decisive force both in stimulating the exploited and oppressed masses with the understanding of the impossibility of living in the old way and in helping to make the ruling class unable to govern as of old. Since the war the old power and might of the ruling classes have been irretrievably broken. Further, the experiences of 1918-23 weigh mightily on the memory of the masses—the ruling classes in many countries were unable to govern once before. Finally, the Soviet Union with its tremendous economic and political weight will be able to throw this weight at times so as to help break the economic and political power of different sections of the international bourgeoisie at critical moments.

5. What must be the cornerstone of Communist international strategy is the recognition of this qualitative change in imperialism. Today it is possible to have "sudden" changes to revolutionary situations, "sudden" revolutions. Today there has been raised to hitherto unheard of degree the decisive importance of revolutionary organizations, first as factors maturing ("creating") revolutionary situations and second, as factors changing revolutionary situations to actual revolutions (insurrections).

The fatal error in the Communist "Majority Group" (Lovestone) is that it fails to see this fundamental feature of the present stage, and to make this feature an integral part of any American analysis.

Errors of Party Leadership

The fatal error of the C.I. and its U.S. "leadership", is that it caricatures and distorts this basic conception, not understanding it and indeed transforming it into a theory justifying putchism, making of the party a sect more and more isolated from the masses, more and more stifled by an absolutely sterile bureaucratic machine. The official C.P. "leaders" in the United States fail to see that an insurrection can come only after the development of a revolutionary situation and fail to understand that to develop this revolutionary situation

(NOTE: We print here the essential sections of a speech delivered by comrade Albert Weisbord at the recent plenum of the Lovestone group. The National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) has decided to publish the speech in the Militant. The second and last part of it will appear in the next issue of the paper, at which time the National Committee will append a statement of its views on the document of comrade Weisbord. The latter, as most readers are aware, was expelled from the Party a while ago for divergent views, and joined neither the Left nor the Right Opposition. The document below represents his views on the problems of the movement arrived at after a period of study and consideration.—Ed.)

one must follow a Leninist line of mass work, united front, work in reactionary unions, profound economic analysis, the understanding of the true relationship of American to international capitalist society, and the peculiarities of capitalist America; and that an end must be put to guesswork, phrase-mongering, to the fakery and lying in the leadership, to the theory of "fascism" and "social-fascism" to the bureaucracy and violence, to the Trotsky deportations and Blumkin murders, an end to the theory of socialism in one country, to Anglo-Russian Trade Union Committee affairs, and Chiang Kai Shek mergers, etc.

7. Secondly, an analysis of the present situation shows that the contradictions are sharpening and the tempo of international revolution is rising (that is, the "partial and temporary stabilization" of capitalism is becoming weaker than before). The original position of the Communist "Majority" Group is here too unsound; while on the other hand, the very putchist distortion of this by the official Party leadership tends to hinder the process of the cracking of "stabilization" now taking place and to weaken the revolutionary forces. Far from stimulating the masses, the false policy of the C.I. actually acts as a brake on the masses.

Section B. 8. The situation in America exposes in even clearer light the errors of the different Communist groups. The American section of Lozovsky-Stalin apparatus-men has never yet given up its "apex theory" and all that follows logically from it—namely, that American capitalism is on the decline, has reached its basic crisis with a general deep-going and widespread radicalization of the masses. To this has now been added the special twist that all members of the A.F. of L. are now full blown fascists and that all those expelled by the Stalin machine at once become secret police agents for the boss. To some extent the "Communist League (Opposition)" in America has limped uncritically after the Party (without, however, the added special twists). Though this opposition group gave up the "apex theory" yet it did so without having thoroughly exposed the errors inherent in it. And even today it still talks of "growing radicalization", "deep-going process of radicalization" quite uncritically.

On the other hand, the "Majority" Group merely sees in fact "deep discontent". With this group the present economic crisis is IN ESSENCE a mere cyclical one, (it seems as if latterly a section of the Party too is violently swinging to the point of view) and the dogmatic statement is made, with no appreciation of its rashness, that not only will American capitalism weather the present economic storm, but that it will rise to new peaks only to fall to new lows.

The true situation is that with the qualitative changes of post war imperialism, with the weakening of world "stabilization", with the sharpening of the inner and outer contradictions of American capitalism, there can be no "mere cyclical crisis", no "mere discontent" but what we have to reckon with is a tenseness of relations, a restiveness of the masses which can enable a Communist Party WITH THE CORRECT POLICY to lead masses into such activity as to radicalize the masses. There is great POTENTIALITY NOT ACTUALITY of masses becoming radicalized generally and relatively quickly. But the foolish policy of the party only drives the masses further away from radicalization.

The American Crisis

9. The dogmatic statements—1. That American capitalism will weather the present economic crisis and 2. That it will rise to new peaks, utterly fails to take into account the international situation. It may be that due above all to the criminal policies of the C.I., this eventuality MAY OCCUR, but it is impossible to state so now as the sole solution. The "Majority" group fails IN REALITY to see that the economic crisis in the United States means economic crisis in many countries (for this group does not make such a view a VITAL part of its living work in America); that in some of these countries such a crisis if prolonged will lead to a real revolutionary situation, that a revolution breaking out in Europe may not only deepen the American crisis but will usher in a new and higher stage of the world revolution. Is such an alternative (or a number of similar alternatives which result in the ushering of a world crisis) impossible? Quite the contrary! For Communists, the whole perspective for the United States must constantly and intimately be permeated with this view.

11. Only by a Leninist policy are the Communists enabled to radicalize the masses in the United States. This policy means "To the Masses", mass work in all its forms, formation of independent mass organizations where possible and necessary, the united front, work in reactionary trade unions and similar bodies, Labor Party, etc. To accomplish such mass work it is necessary to Leninize the Party, namely to base the Party on the most exploited sections of the masses, to wipe out the bureaucracy (the liars and fakers) in the Party, to demand as an absolute condition and prerequisite to leadership 1. The tested ability to carry out mass work in a Communist manner. 2. The liquidation of the mountain of vulgar Marxism and syndicalist-liberal conceptions and a real study of the basic works of the founders of Communism. 3. Profound honesty, integrity and courage.

To all this the present "theories" of "Fascism" and "Social-Fascism" give a death blow. These "theories" wiping out as they do all the Marxian-Leninist distinctions between fascism and regular bourgeois democracy mean 1. The reactionary unions are to be destroyed from now on, the workers in the A.F. of L. being hopeless fascists, enemies of the working class. 2. The socialist and progressive workers being "social-fascists" are only secret agents of the fascists. These two must be destroyed. 3. The Communist opposition groups become not only full grown Mensheviks but worse, police agents, having no place in unions or other working class organizations. Any action against them up to complete physical extermination is justified. 4. The line between Communism and fascism theoretically becomes very thin for overnight; no matter how tested and loyal before, any Communist can become a police-agent Menshevik or fascist. Therefore the greatest violence and terror is theoretically justified not only against the "open police-agent Mensheviks" but against the members of the party, the possible police-agent Mensheviks of the future. 5. Since every tested member tomorrow can be a police-agent Menshevik, revolutionary behaviour in mass work is no longer a test for leadership. Any faker or apparatus follower can be a leader. Leaders are cheap and easily made. Distrust for the leadership follows. Cynicism not revolutionary idealism pervades the party. Double-book-keeping (see the hypocrisy of those who put forth the C.I. Address of 1929) becomes the rule. Correspondingly a contempt for the membership grows. Political sterility increases. No policies except those printed in Moscow with a militarization and robotization (Stalinization) of the Party. In this connection the quotation from the recently adopted "C.P. Thesis" which declares "The need of the hour is clarity of instructions and promptness of executions" is illuminating of the process now going on within the party.

There can be no doubt but that the conscious holders of these theories, (Erowder, Johnstone, Dunne and the rest of the Company) if they carry these theories to the logical conclusions and practices inevitably flowing from them, must degenerate to become the real renegades from Communism, indeed the real fascists of tomorrow!

Slander Won't Win

BOSTON—

At an outing of the Needle Trades Industrial Union that was held the week-end of July 4 at Boston Camp Nitgedaiget, we had a mass meeting with Ben Gold. We all expected to hear him speak on trade union problems which are so vital to us, but instead he took up a discussion on the Trotskyists. He tried to prove that the Trotskyists bring poison and splits into the union and naturally this hinders the good work.

Let us see who does more damage. All the comrades in the union in Boston (and Gold, too), know that comrade Eva Weiner and myself were among the first to build the N.T.W.I.U. The workers trust us, know that we are always on the job to carry out all decisions which are passed by the members. Gold knows that the Communist League (Opposition) is for a Left wing policy. We never brought in any other kind of policies and always demanded from our leaders that they carry out a real Left wing fight.

So what is Gold's motive in bringing this question up and saying that we don't build the Left wing union? To discredit us among the workers. Everyone knows that this is false and that it will not do any good for the union. We must draw in all active workers who are honestly carrying out our policy and helping to build the Industrial Union.

No one can split the union more than tactics like Gold's. If he wants to prove that we did any harm to the union, let him call an open forum and invite the Trotskyists. Let him prove that we are doing harm because we are Trotskyists. He said that we were dead. Then how can we do any harm? Dead ones do not do anything. If the Trotskyists are dead everywhere why do the Stalinists come and break up their meetings like they did in Cleveland? What are they afraid of?

You will not be able, comrade Gold, to kill our prestige among the Boston workers because they know we always work for a good Left wing policy and will do everything to build the N.T.W.I.U. as we have in the past.

A Revolutionary «Social Fascist»

A few days ago, the Daily Worker went into positively frantic ecstasies over an anti-Heywood Brown-S.P. cartoon by Ryan Walker. It hailed Walker as a noble revolutionist who was revolted by the scoundrelism of the Socialist Party. The Daily became so maudlin in its enthusiasm that toward the end of the article it was literally slobbering over Walker. It appears however, that Walker is the staff cartoonist of the Illinois Miner, official organ of the Howat-Fishwick-Germer miners' union, which as even a casual reader of the Daily Worker knows is a pure and simple "social fascist" organization, covered with a Left phrase or two, but "social fascist" nevertheless. Walker, according to the third period jargon, is therefore a paid agent of "social fascism". Or rather he was, for after the praise with which the Worker greeted him he most probably falls into a new category, the "Revolutionary Social Fascist". Personally, we advise the Worker to stick to Jake Burck.

The Communists in the South

By HUGO OEHLER

(11) With the black hundreds in the saddle and our activity shifted to holding and reorganizing our forces for a comeback we started our new work. Secret work in the Gastonia area through mill locals and increased open work all over the South to hem in Gastonia and to narrow the circle and close in. All that was needed in the outer area was organization, for the sentiment for us was there in masses and our organizers and colonizers from the outer area all sent letters telling us they are behind us and to keep up the good work. Many new contacts were gained and work toward October 13 went ahead.

The newspapers predicted that our convention would now be a failure and the bosses openly declared that it would not be held. We decided it had to be held even if we had to move out of this area but a survey of our forces convinced us we could hold it in Charlotte as originally planned. The third trial was on and while the legal end was taking care of the trial the organizers were as busy as hell with the union work in the two Carolinas, Virginia, Tennessee and Georgia. Campaign after campaign was launched against us, one on the heel of the other so fast that it seemed like one continuation: red scare, Negro issue, revolution, etc., but this did not stop the work from progressing toward October 13.

(m) Now to consider a few of the other issues for a while. As far as the national I.L.D. campaign by this time was concerned it was a flop. We had a direct issue, more important to the American workers than the Sacco-Vanzetti issue (as far as they were concerned). Such favorable situations no organization had faced for years and naturally half an effort would show some results but on the whole we saw failure. Why? This failure can be traced to the "third period" tactics and the "third period" tactics can be traced to Stalin revisionism of Marxism, of the most fundamental international issues and the elimination of the Opposition.

In correcting the Party policy of the Right wing Lovestone leadership of "marrying" all possible fakers in the A.F.L. and other working class organizations we "corrected" this by dumping overboard with the fakers all progressives and Left wingers and Leninist united front tactics and replaced them with "pure" united front tactics with ourselves. Paper conferences were held everywhere.

(n) And the masses of other blunders and mistakes, a volume in itself, of all types of mistakes from important ones to little ones that amounted to setbacks were made by the incompetent leaders, Engdahl, Poyntz and Jakira. The field fraction pounded away at these errors, constantly, night and day, in every manner and form and found the leading committee at the center wanting because they were a hindrance instead of a help. I realize this now: That a Marxian Central Committee can correct this but a Central Committee made by a mechanical shift at the top replacing one variety of bureaucrats with another variety can only lead to further negative results.

In words the center accepted our program but in deeds—what follows shows the contradiction between the two. At this point serious minded comrades at the center (who were not decisive in determining actions instead of words from the center) laughed at my enthusiasm and told me that now since the spectacular, emotional part was over the bureaucrats would forget the south in deeds if not in words, and I would receive less support from now on than I had. This was my first trip to N.Y. with several more to follow on the same argument and I did not fully realize the truth of this statement until my last trip in December.

Yes, the spectacular end was over and the W.I.R. (Landy's incompetence) "pulling stakes" with the Leaksville strike on was followed by other departments in deeds (but not in words) and a decline set in after the end of the trial. The objective factor was more favorable but our force was not taking advantage of this situation. Reports from our field organizers and especially comrade Amy Schechter proved the favorable situation our work had given us this far.

The October optimism of our many southern organizers and mill local officials with months of this inactivity was transformed into pessimism and our fraction of northern comrades was in a similar condition. The postponed national textile convention held in December in Paterson did not solve one of the basic problems of the south. In the meantime the A.F.L. was increasing its work and with the liberals and a section of the bosses was being used as a dam against our advance.

Another blunder following from the "Third Period" is the lumping of all outside the official Communist Party as Fascist or Social Fascist while life was proving the class struggle is not so mechanical and simple.

In the Atlanta case the Daily Worker had a scare headline telling how the A.F.L. official on the jury helped indict our comrades calling for the death penalty. But facts prove that Steve Nance, President of the Atlanta Federation of Trades, member of the Grand Jury that brought in the indictment was the only one who voted against the indictment. Later the Trades Assembly passed a resolution with only Secretary Marquardt of the State Federation and one other voting against the resolution calling for free speech for the Communists. This "third period" tactic and misstatement played into the hands of these A.F.L. fakers as similar tactics play into the hands of Muste, Thomas, Howat, etc. Our plan is to defeat these labor lieutenants and not to strengthen them.

The "Party Task in the South" resolution to the 7th Convention of the C.P. says, "Our perspective must be for the defeat of the A.F.L. and its Muste wing in the mass industries of the south." We must by all means defeat these fakers in the ranks of labor but to say this in harsh terms, that may denote our feelings, and to accomplish the task are two different things. The present tactics of the official party is strengthening the position of these fakers instead of weakening their control over the masses.

Not even a half-baked revolutionist will argue that the struggle is simply one of the capitalist against the workers. The problem in the concrete is more complicated in the divisions and the many antagonisms within the classes and between the classes. Success or failure in advancing our position in winning a strike or revolution depends upon how many of the antagonisms and divisions in the workers ranks can be eliminated for united action against the enemy in a favorable objective situation and how wide a breach we can make in the class enemies ranks, the unity of the first and the division of the second spell success for us. But without a favorable objective situation we cannot speak of success.

away the base from the social reformists.... It is precisely in the period of radicalization that social reformism has all the opportunities of growth among the working class. The period likewise makes for greater opportunities for Communism..." (The Militant, March 8, 1930.) Now the Y.C.I. letter in its criticism of the N.E.C. estimation says: "It is obvious that the economic crisis narrows the basis for the influence of Social Reformism, you have also made a reservation as to the role of the League. But even these reservations cannot erase the fact that such a formulation shows an absolute underestimation of the influence of reformism and its possibilities for growth in such a country as America." Here is indeed confusion. One blind man cannot lead another. The Y.C.I. letter recognizes that there can be growth of reformism. But it is incapable of showing what is the basis for it. If the economic crisis narrows the basis for the influence of social reformism in the United States, then why speak of possibilities of its growth. The Stalinist bureaucrats of the E.C.Y.C.I. involve themselves in a maze of contradictions, and muddle the minds of the young Communists.

No Solution of the Problem

What does the letter propose as a remedy for the declining condition of the Y.C.L? Does it explain the cause for the situation? It can only exhaust itself in futile denunciations. It recommends a so-called "Plan of Action", which is thoroughly ultra-Left and adventurist. The main points of these recommendations have been incorporated by the N.E.C. in its "Shock Plan", which we have already criticized in the last issue of the Young Vanguard. It can speak of shock troops, fronts and "storming" and all the other terms in the dictionary of military warfare. It even recommends red lists for those who do good work and black for those who don't. We suggest that the N.E.C. institutes a system of dunce caps and high stools, and spank all the naughty culprits whose names appear twice in the black list. These childish schemes do not at all relieve the acute crisis the Y.C.L. is in.

In Marion for example, the Musteite wing of the A.F.L. first sent the striking workers back to work with a promise of a settlement that we know never did come, second, they did not force the mill owners to live up to the preliminary conditions pending settlement, third, sold these workers out after they were back to work, and fourth, betrayed these workers in the strike against the sellout contract. Such action DeLeon and others pointed out before and it is not a new and exclusive development of the "Third Period".

After all this and after the Marion massacre the Musteites still retained leadership and gained influence throughout the country. The southern fraction tried four times to break into Marion, but I realize now that each time our advance and attempt at united action against these fakers was shackled and we failed to gain our objective because this shackling from the top by "Third Period" tactics predetermined our united action from below. We were criticized four times by the center for these failures that can be traced back to them. Why not ask ourselves this: How can such brazen betrayals be rewarded by greater influence of the Muste wing while our class struggle of Gastonia, which even our enemies admit was led by forces that cannot be bought out or run out (as is the case with the A.F.L.) have not been able to organize our influence from this struggle which was on a much higher class plane?

You cannot answer this on the basis of capitalist reaction and the necessary "smallness" of the revolutionary forces until we are at a higher stage of the class struggle or in power, because the question is not the organization of the majority of workers under reactionary leadership or revolutionary leadership but the organization of a goodly section of the forces either reactionary or revolutionary in the struggles and strikes. We must also not forget we are in the "Third Period" with "revolutionary upsurge". Facts prove that with proper tactics the revolutionary movement can consolidate its influence organizationally, as it has done in the past. In other words, our tactics have not only weakened our own forces but at our expense have rendered aid to these very enemies we talk so much about. We do not expect to build POWERFUL REVOLUTIONARY INDUSTRIAL unions in a few weeks' work, overshadowing the few million membership of the A.F.L. but we can expect to build a substantial influence and organization in the labor movement under our leadership with correct tactics.

From a political viewpoint, although its only merit lies in calling attention to a critical situation, the Y.C.I. letter is a puerile document. It explains nothing and it solves nothing. It may result in the changing or removal of individuals, in demotions and promotions. But that is to no avail. It will hasten the process of fundamental re-evaluation in the minds of the Y.C.L. members, which will constitute an important step in the direction of the Left Opposition.

Blackmailers Cloaked in Red Mantles

CLEVELAND—

The Czecho-Slovakian Stalinists of Rovnost Ludu continue to make bitter attacks upon me because I exposed them in the press. They call me "ex-detective", and according to them, I was supposed to have clubbed workers' heads in Youngstown during the steel strike. This is one of the most criminal calumnies. Having no ground to stand on, they invent the vilest and most vulgar stories. As a matter of fact, I was shot by a scab since I was the one that grabbed him and prevented him from sneaking in through the gate. I was also on the strikers' committee, representing a crew of 25. I know the methods of the Stalinists pretty well, yet I am astonished at such cheap and disgraceful methods against an Oppositionist in the ranks of Communism.

The pen-slaves of Rovnost Ludu, an official Party paper, are the kind of "Communists" who accept money from Czecho-Slovak multi-millionaires like Bata, the world's richest shoe manufacturer who exploits his slaves in the most inhuman manner. In Rovnost Ludu, you can find big advertisements from railroad companies, or Camel cigarettes, not to mention various ads from bankers. This paper has degraded itself to such a degree that even Mr. Browder and his cohorts have protested against these advertisements. But then, who is really to blame for these anti-Communist ways of the Rovnost Ludu management if not the Party's chiefs?

While Lovestone reigned in the Party I warned him in letters that if he and the rest of the committee would continue to neglect their duty to discipline the editors and managers of this paper, one of the Party's organs would soon disappear or would end in a pit of mire. Ever since then, things have gone from bad to worse so that in Foster-Browders "Third Period", workers are obliged to read the announcement in that paper that asks them to attend the funeral of a fat business man in the Holy Trinity Church.

It would be well to mention that the proceeds from such ads are privately pocketed by a most unscrupulous individual named John Zuskas, who is supposed to act as secretary of the non-existent Czecho-Slovak Communist fraction. Under his influence, Communist morale and influence has dropped among the Czech workers.

Before I was expelled from the Party this scoundrel never dared make insinuations against me for fear of having to answer before the Party. Now that Stalin has opened his murderous drive against the Left Opposition, the ardent Zuskas never misses an opportunity to duplicate his master's methods. (By the way, it was due to him that the Party's criticism of Rovnost Ludu failed to appear there, until it was finally published in such a thoroughly distorted form that the Fosterites would be satisfied!)

Since this individual has continually impugned my revolutionary integrity and record, without replying to my demands for proof, I now openly challenge him and the Party to establish a public workers' court, composed of an equal number of representatives of the Party and the Communist League (Opposition) who will jointly choose one or more non-partisan members. Failure to concur in this proposal will brand Zuskas and those who maintain him in office as unscrupulous liars and blackmailers. We await a reply.

The Y. C. I. Letter Is Brought to Light!

Now as a sort of climax to culminate the whole wretched ultra-Left course and expose the bankruptcy of the Centrist bureaucracy in sharp relief there appears the latest letter from the Executive Committee of the Young Communist International to the Young Communist League of the U.S.A. The letter is of deep import to every young Communist. There will be more than one member of the Y.C.L. who after its perusal will be jolted into seeing matters in a new light. The letter, intended to placate the dissatisfaction of the membership the failures and steady decline of the Y.C.L. and to make of the N.E.C. a scape goat for the opportunist line that emanates from the Y.C.I. will act as a double edged blade to the more serious and thoughtful member of the Y.C.L. cutting into the very roots of the situation.

Amateur and Skilled Suppressors

The letter was sent by the E.C.Y.C.I. on April 13, 1930, but the membership has become aware of its existence only now—four months later. The Harveys, the Steubens, the Greens and the other marionettes who so slavishly endeavored to impose the Stalinist line on the League, have kept it hidden from the eyes of the League. No doubt they felt the letter to be a piece of the basest ingratitude for their obedient services to Stalinism. To gain a proper appraisal of these people, one need only read sentences like "the information which we have at our disposal concerning the present situation in the American League and the recent plenum results are very scant..." and "we have not received a copy of the Young Worker for months".

The Lovestone Group, which of course has always been famed for upright and open dealings with the E.C.Y.C.I. is triumphantly circulating the letter wholesale among the members of the League. The League leadership has suppressed the letter, they cry with righteous indignation. But in truth, the Harveys and Steubens are only the clumsy pupils of the Herbergs and Zams, who were much more refined, proficient and adept at this particular kind of manipulation. These present crude imitators can never hope to attain the high degree of skill and the fine and intricate methods of their predecessors. The present bunglers merely suppress the document. But their teachers when they received an embarrassing Y.C.I. letter, first withheld it from the membership for a certain amount of time, as long as this was feasible—but no more. Then they proclaimed their heartfelt conviction of the correctness of the letter, meanwhile conspiring with Lovestone and Pepper for the Polcom to appeal against it. Oh, it was really most complicated, but it was a genuine piece of Machiavellian machination.

The Y.C.I. Estimate of the Y.C.L.

The Y.C.I. letter chastises the League leadership severely. In particular it criticizes the Y.C.L. Plenum held last January. The resolution adopted is condemned in no uncertain terms. "We must frankly tell you," the letter states, "that of all the resolutions of League Plenums yours is one of the worst." This is said despite the fact that the resolution was patterned almost entirely on the thesis of the last Y.C.I. plenum. (See the Militant, Feb. 1, 1930).

Our own estimation of the resolution has been strikingly confirmed. "The resolution adopted reveals the miserable situation in which the Y.C.L. finds itself—but explains nothing, and lays the basis for further decline." (The Militant, March 8, 1930.) The responsibility lies with the Stalinist regime.

The letter criticizes a false estimate of social reformism contained in the resolution. This erroneous conception was formulated in the N.E.C. resolution as follows: "The radicalization of the young workers takes away the base of the social reformists among the young workers and while social reformism remains the chief ideological barrier, which we have to overcome amongst the young worker, there can be no real growth of reformist youth organizations—but only disintegration, providing the Young Communist League plays its role." In criticism of this we said: "It is false to say that radicalization takes

International Youth Day

As it Should Be

Tremendous demonstrations of youth, streaming out of factories and mines, off the fields, out of the ranks of the armies to show their spirited, active hatred of the capitalist system and all it means to the wage slaves of capitalism.

Mighty assemblages to signify their desire to struggle against the slave system, against long hours of automaton motions, low wages, prostitution, child labor, hovels, the dope dispensed by the dopsters of capitalism—church, school and press; against the mental and physical degradation forced upon the workers by the hunger system.

Particularly, to fight against the bosses war, the struggle against which the First Sunday in September, sixteen years ago was dedicated by the small band of loyal, revolutionary, young "Left" socialists as the Day of International Youth; to fight for the revolutionary fraternization of the young masses in different uniforms.

LENIN AND THE YOUTH

TRAINING THE YOUTH

The Tasks of the Young Communist League

(A speech delivered at the Third All-Russian Congress of the Russian Young Communist League, October 4, 1920.)

Comrades, I would like today to talk on the subject of the fundamental tasks of the Young Communist League, and in connection with this, the form the youth organizations should take in a socialist republic.

The New Generation Will Build Communism

This question should be dealt with particularly for the reason that, in a certain sense, one may say that it is the youth particularly which is confronted with the present task of constructing Communist society. It is clear that the generation of workers brought up in capitalist society, at best can fulfil the task of destroying the foundations of old capitalist conditions built up on exploitation. At best this generation can fulfil the task of creating such social conditions as would help the proletariat and the working classes to maintain power and lay a firm foundation upon which only the generation commencing the work under new conditions, in circumstances where there are no relations of exploitation between men, can build.

The Task of the Youth Is to Acquire Knowledge

Hence, approaching the question of the tasks of the youth from this point of view, I must say that the tasks of the youth generally and of the Young Communist Leagues and all other organizations particularly, may be expressed in one sentence: the task is to acquire knowledge.

Of course, this is just "one sentence". It does not reply to the principal and most essential question—what knowledge to acquire and how to acquire it? And here the whole thing is that with the transformation of the old capitalist society, we cannot adopt the old forms of teaching, training and educating the new generation which will establish Communist society. Nevertheless, the teaching, training and educating of the youth must start with the material left us by the old society.

We can build Communism only with the aid of that sum of knowledge, the organizations and the institutions, with the aid of the stock of human forces and resources which has been left us by the old society. Only by radically reforming the methods of teaching, organizing and training the youth shall we be able to guarantee that the efforts of the young generation will result in the construction of a society unlike the old society, i. e., a Communist society.

What to Learn and How to Learn It

Consequently, we must deal with the question as to how we should teach and what we should teach the youth, in order that they may justify their title of Communist youth; we must deal with the

The slightest scratching of the surface of the powerful potential force of young toilers by a weak isolated, poorly educated, divided, misled Young Communist League and International; passing unheard and unheeded by the millions of young workers, who do not, and can not, understand the slogans and demands that should inspire and electrify the youth into determined action; because of the methods used by the Y.C.L.

What is to be Done

Correct Leninist policy—aimed at world Communism: leadership in the everyday struggles of the young workers, Marxist education, vigorous anti-war action; abandoning the inane phrase-flinging that marches cheek-by-jowl with opportunism; the acceptance into the full comradeship of struggle of the Left Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition within the Party and the Y.C.L.—these will make future International Youth Days what they should be.

question as to how we may train the youth in order that they may be able to complete and perfect what we have commenced.

I should say that the first and what would seem to be the most natural reply would be that the Young Communist League and the youth as a whole who desire to go over to Communism, should learn Communism.

But to reply "learn Communism" is too general. What then do we need in order to learn Communism? What must we select out of the sum of total knowledge in order to acquire the knowledge of Communism? Here a number of dangers rise up which appear every time the task of learning Communism is presented incorrectly or when it is understood too one-sidedly.

Naturally, the first thing that enters one's mind is that learning Communism means to master the sum of knowledge that it contained in Communist text-books, pamphlets and larger works. But such a definition of the study of Communism should be too crude and insufficient.

Theory and Practice; Knowledge and Struggle

If studying Communism merely meant the mastery of what is elucidated in Communist books and pamphlets, we could very easily get a number of Communists who could glibly roll off Communist text by heart. This would cause a considerable amount of harm, for these people, having learned by rote what is written in Communist books and pamphlets would be totally incapable of combining all this knowledge and would not be able to act as Communism really demands.

One of the greatest evils and misfortunes left us by the old capitalist society, is the complete isolation of books from practical life. We had some books in which everything was presented in the best form, but in the majority of cases, these books represented a repulsive hypocritical lie which falsely described Communist society. Therefore, the mere learning by rote of what is written in books about Communism would be quite wrong.

In our speeches and writings of the present time, we no longer repeat what was said formerly about Communism, because our speeches and writings are connected with everyday work in all its aspects. Without work, without struggle, a book knowledge of Communism gained from Communist pamphlets and books is worth nothing, for it would merely continue the former gap between theory and practice, the former gap which represented the most repulsive features of the old bourgeois society.

It would be still more dangerous, if we commenced to acquire only Communist slogans. If we did not realize this danger in time, and if we did not direct all our efforts to remove it, the half million or million boys and girls who after such a study of Communism would call themselves Communists would only bring considerable harm to the cause of Communism.

The Youth and the Elections

The elections this year give the Communists an exceptionally good opportunity for rallying the working youth under their banner. The growing willingness of the young workers to struggle, their greater participation in the struggles of the working class, the increased economic pressure on the young workers in the present economic crisis (unemployment, further lowering of wages, worsening of conditions of labor) serve as a substantial base for the growth of influence of the Communist Youth.

In participating in capitalist parliamentary elections, Communists aim to educate the broad mass of workers, rally them around the vital questions that affect them, organize them for the struggle against the boss class and its state power, and for the establishment of a revolutionary workers government, the young Communists must make special efforts to attract the young workers.

Winning the Young Workers

The task of winning the young workers is organically connected with the problem of winning the entire working class. The problems of the general working class are the problems of the young workers—since the latter are a section of the former. However, the young workers as such have certain different characteristics and therefore certain particular problems. Because of its physical and intellectual immaturity, the youth has special so-called social needs and requirements—educational, cultural etc. These must be dealt with in the attempt to win over the youth for Communism.

In the United States, as in all capitalist democracies, although the youth are drawn into industry at a low age, compelled by economic necessity (and at periods by law) to join the military forces, in a word are forced to take upon themselves the "social responsibilities" of an adult, they are deprived of the right of franchise. The millions of youth in this country between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one who are barred from voting can be rallied around the slogan of: A vote for every youth eighteen or more years of age! The pretensions of bourgeois democracy can thereby more easily be exposed. Even the socialists, the arch-defenders of capitalist democracy, have given support to this disenfranchisement of millions of young workers and students.

Youth Omitted in C.P. Platform

The Communist Party in its current platform does not even mention the position of the working youth; it raises not even a single demand for the young workers! The so-called leadership of the official Y.C.L. is too taken up with its "Plan of Action" (!) to occupy itself with such "trifles". Nevertheless, youth demands must be issued; a special effort must be made to reach the millions of toiling youth. The pivot point must be a contrast of the conditions of the youth under wage slavery and those under a workers' Soviet government.

The Left Opposition Youth, as part of the Communist League of America (Opposition) will participate in the ensuing election campaign, and support the Communist Party. Members of the Communist Party and Young Communist League should demand that those organizations accept our offers of cooperation in the elections. Young Communists should insist on definite youth election demands. Young workers, young students and young Communists should rally around the demands of the Left Opposition Youth:

The right to vote for all youth 18 years or over.

6-hour day, 5-day week for all young workers.

The abolition of child labor under the age of 16 with state maintenance for those at present employed.

The establishment of work-schools for young workers between the ages of 16 and up—modelled on the present system in the Soviet Union.

Two weeks vacation with pay for all young workers. —JOSEPH FRIEDMAN

In Stalin's Exile

RAKOVSKY IN DANGER!

The silence of the leadership of our Party and the International continues to be profound. We will continue without cease our appeal to the workers for the Bolshevik Oppositionists deported by Stalin.

Above all, comrade Christian Rakovsky must be saved!

The workers must be informed, and to those responsible for the Party's policy, we must constantly raise the question: What are you doing to the Left Opposition in the U.S.S.R.? Why do you persecute it? Justify your repressive measures if you can!

On Rakovsky

(Extract from a Letter)

... Rakovsky is writing an enormous amount. Whatever reaches us is read by all; in this sense Christian Georgevitch is doing a great work. His position does not differ one whit from our own (that of Trotsky); like ourselves, he is resisting the Party regime. Here are some extracts from one of his last cards:

"All our warnings have been verified much more rapidly and fully than we might have imagined. Right now a retreat is being beaten, and the positions are being abandoned, evidently by the usual zig-zags. The slogan of 'generalized collectivization in three years' still continues only for the purpose of frightening the middle peasant and increasing the retail price by its pressure. The middle peasant will be the axis around which the turn of 180 degrees in Centrist policy will revolve.

"After Centrism, without resistance, ruined the economy of the middle peasant, it will again begin to make a fetish of him, with the ritual sacrifices, not on the backs of the bureaucracy—which everybody would have to approve—but at the expense of the poor peasants and the proletariat" . . .

Letter from Russia

... By chance I received some information on the solitary prison of N. One of our comrades confined there previously developed the theory of the "ferment" that is, that we are ferment of the next revolutionary rise, but today, in his letter, a change is to be felt. Everybody works to deepen and increase his theoretical knowledge, they study and strengthen their knowledge of foreign languages, with a marked preference for German. The discussions go on without cease. The subjects: knowledge of the world, space, time, mechanics, the sorties of the Right wing, the "third period", etc., etc. Nothing more can be learned of the essence of the discussions, since all abstract considerations are censored or held back by the censor; even the situation with regard to food is part of the mystery of the solitary prisons. Hunger strikes are frequently carried on. The causes are the regime, and apparently, the food; after the first hunger strike, they forced the permission to receive twelve letters instead of four letters a month. The strike was long, there were many seriously ill. The second hunger strike was a protest against the bastonnades (beating with sticks). As a result, the prisoners were refused all communication with the outer world. The old social democracy left the prisons and places of exile much more healthy than the Bolsheviks will leave the solitary prisons of Stalinism . . .

Issues in the Elections

Capitalist Parties Put Up Fake Issues to Conceal Jobless Sufferings

Sufficient has occurred in the last few weeks to show on what basis the twin capitalist parties intend to conduct the election campaign: Prohibition—for and against! The faithful servant of Tammany Hall, Governor Roosevelt, has issued a "courageous" statement for the repeal of the 18th Amendment. The "wet" Republicans of New York are warning the Party high priests that unless they do the same, the parched Party sheep will flock to the flowing brooks of the "Democracy". In Illinois, the Democratic senatorial nominee, J. Hamilton Lewis, has declared the great issue to be bringing the government back to "the principle of the fathers", which, if he refers to the George Washingtons, means cheap booze. Michigan has already defeated two prominent dry Republican Congressmen in the primaries. Vermont has given an unknown "wet" a nomination over a prominent "dry". The same comedy is being enacted everywhere.

The so-called prohibition issue is the best one that could be chosen—for the capitalist class. It conveniently cuts across party lines so that neither singly nor together can they be made responsible for anything. It is an expedient gas gun for shooting clouds around fundamental and really burning issues.

Is there mass unemployment, misery, starvation, suicide in the country? Booze will solve that! Are wages being cut to the very marrow? Booze will make the workers forget that! Is a form of social insurance needed by the workers? No, it's beer and light wines they need! Are the workers clubbed during strikes, bludgeoned at demonstrations of the jobless, evicted from their homes? Prohibition caused it all! Do the workers want bread? Give them beer and they won't need bread! Is there a bleak winter ahead, a winter of deepened crisis of horrible suffering, of food riots perhaps and certainly of bitter struggles to resist the offensive of the capitalist class? Give them a prohibition prize-fight to distract their minds from woe and struggle!

The dislike and total incapacity of the capitalist parties to face the real problems the masses are confronted with, are quite understandable. Republican or Democrat—they are the ramparts of the system that produces wars, unemployment, crises, misery, child labor, exploitation, inequality and oppression with an ever-increasing frequency and permanency. Their crimes and festering corruption are the crimes and corruption of capitalism, with which the whole country is reeking like a pestilence. For a worker to support them is to kiss the chains that enslave him and with gratitude the blows he receives.

Reformist Aides to Capitalism

Then should he support the Socialist party? No. If the Republican and Democratic parties are the ramparts of capitalism, the Socialist party is the ditch around the fortress that traps those who seek to storm it. The socialist party has removed every mention of the class struggle from its program, constitution and works. But it has not left the class struggle; it has only become an assistant to capitalism. It is the party of the petty bourgeoisie. It is the party of the respectable business men who faithfully manage the municipal affairs of Reading and Milwaukee for the capitalist class. It is the devoted workman who goes about his master's house, with plaster and trowel, begging for permission to cover up the more unsightly holes in the decaying structure.

Does it offer promises to the workers? Certainly! More even than its masters offer. It offers a MacDonald regime in the United States, a regime which has so effectively "solved" unemployment in England that millions are still on a miserable dole; it has "solved" the oppression of imperialism in India by massacring the Indian people. Haven't Hillquit and Co. endorsed the British "Labor" government? Aren't they in one and the same "socialist" international? Are they not "comrades" of Zoergiebel, the butcher of Berlin's proletariat, and Boncour, the agent of the French war mongers? Are they not in the party of the "socialist" trade union racketeers who practise for power by beating up and expelling Left wing workers? They are the gay deceivers of the working class, typified by Mr. Heywood Brown and Mr. Norman Thomas, who keep the workers from fighting their class enemy by telling them that their lot can be improved by voting against capitalist politicians.

Vote Communist

The worker's vote should go to the worker's party—the Communist Party. All our differences with it, our criticisms of its internal regime and its ruinous policies, does not change the fact that it is the only political party of the working class in the field which stands for a revolutionary struggle against capitalism and all power to the proletariat. The casting of a paper ballot does not and cannot decide the burning problems of the workers. But support for the Communist campaign draws the workers more closely together, and enables them to transform the electoral farce into a genuine fight for the demands of the workers—not in futile polling booths, but in serious class struggle.

Vote Communist!

A Yankee Revolution in the Argentine

Militarist "revolutions" in South America are occurring with bewildering frequency and abruptness. First Bolivia, then Peru, now Argentina, and tomorrow, perhaps, Brazil. In virtually every one of these countries, the boiling over of conflicting elements results from the volcanic heat generated by the world capitalist crisis. Even more precisely, the "revolutions" in question mirror the unconcealed rivalry between Britain and the United States. In both these imperialist powers, their anarchistically organized industries and means of distribution are paralyzed, their home markets sluggish and contracted, their financial systems in disorder. Primarily for these two, it has become a matter of economic existence to fight tooth and nail for a larger share of the world market, limited as it is. This struggle for markets, raw material, spheres of influence and the like, produces the most violent eruptions in every corner of the world, of which the recent events in South America are only characteristic.

The overthrow of the tyrannical butcher of the Peruvian toiling masses, Leguia, the Wall Street adjutant who was surrounded by American financial and naval "advisors", marked an offensive of Britain against the Yankee dollar—never very popular with the Latin American masses—which has yet to say its final word.

With almost the precision of a military counter-offensive comes the engineered uprising in Argentina with its removal of the notoriously pro-British Irigoyen administration and the establishment of the pro-American Uriburu dictatorship. Both the American and British imperialist press treat the event with a frankness for which we can only be thankful: the former greets it with unfeigned glee, the latter with apprehension. The United States, with its hypocritical "policy" of not recognizing Latin-American governments that have succeeded to power by "violence", is quite prepared to make an exception in the Argentine case.

In all these "revolutions", the native bourgeois demagogues have skillfully utilized the dissatisfaction of the masses with the economic crisis and tyrannical dictatorship. They have used the workers and peasants for "troops of the popular revolution" and coolly driven them back to a position of quiescence and subjugation as soon as they have seized power. For the masses, in a word these "revolutions" have no progressive significance, and often a more reactionary one.

What is even more disturbing is the complete absence of the Communist movement in these affairs. They appear nowhere as a political factor. They do not even appear to attempt to turn the guns of the masses against the militarist puppets of the native bourgeoisie and imperialism. The truth is: They have been crushed and rendered impotent by the ravages of Stalinism, which has virtually dissolved the once promising Communist movement in the Latin-American countries.

The German Elections

We go to press too soon to report the outcome of the elections in Germany, and must therefore leave it to the next issue to contain a detailed analysis of the results. In this case, however, as in all capitalist elections, the casting of ballots is far from the decisive question. The fate of Germany and its working class will be decided in the open field of the class struggle. The problem for the bourgeoisie is its ability to unload the burden of the risks upon technico-industrially weaker countries and by intensified exploitation of the working class, in order to carry out the Young Plan. The answer depends largely upon the Communist Party and its ability to mobilize for struggle the workers still in retreat. The failure of the Communist Party can bring the same ruinous consequences to the proletariat as did the failure of the Brandler leadership of the C.P.G. in 1923. On the temper and mood of the proletariat, which will be partially gauged by the elections this week, depends the question—in a political sense—of whether the bourgeoisie will go forward with its "democratic" dictatorship supported by the servile collaboration of the social democrats, or prepare for an open Fascist dictatorship. Unfortunately, the Communist Party under the misleadership of its Thaelmanns, Remmeles and Neumanns offer too insufficient guarantee or hope of an intelligently revolutionary leadership of the masses for today and the coming day.

George Saul Tours for Opposition

Comrade George J. Saul has begun a national speaking tour for the Communist League of America (Opposition) opening up in Denver, Colorado, with a number of street meetings. From Denver, he will proceed to Kansas City, with a possible meeting in Sterling en route. In Kansas City, two or three meetings are scheduled for him. One of them is a meeting of the Communist League branch, another is a public meeting in Forum Hall, 1218 East 12th Street, September 16th, 8 p.m., on "Boss Persecutions in the South", and a street meeting may also be arranged. St. Louis is also arranging a branch and public meeting for comrade Saul in the Public Library. From St. Louis, it is expected to continue the tour through Springfield, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Youngstown, Pittsburgh and points in the vicinity.

Comrade Saul was one of the active figures in the Colorado coal strike of a few years ago, and recently one of the leaders of the textile struggles in the South. He was sentenced to six months on the chain gang in the Carolinas for his activities. His recent agreement with the standpoint of the Communist League brought about his expulsion from the official Communist Party. On this tour, comrade Saul is speaking on "Boss Persecutions in the South", "Problems of the American Working Class", and the "Program of the Communist League". Further details on the tour will be published in forthcoming issues of the Militant.

Comrade Andres Nin Expelled from Russia

Comrade Andres Nin, former member of the Profintern secretariat and leader of the Spanish Communist movement, was deprived of all work and removed from his post in 1928 after his courageous speech at the fourth Congress of the R.I.L.U.

Nin had definitely sided with the Left Opposition; he had excoriated the opportunist trade union policy of the Anglo-Russian Committee, he had developed the international perspectives of the Opposition, and our point of view on the Chinese question.

Since then, Nin was held a prisoner in Moscow. But his presence irritated the Stalinists and they have just accomplished their base aims by expelling him under scandalous conditions.

Since hypocrisy and "high politics" are a part of such a game, the French and Chinese delegates to the recently concluded fifth congress were made to propose a resolution endorsing the expulsion.

Comrade Nin was expelled on August 21 under shameful conditions. Arrested by agents of the G.P.U. he was seized as being guilty of "counter-revolutionary actions" by virtue of article 58 of the Soviet code, like comrade Trotsky, and conducted to the Two declarations of the Left Opposition, intimately related to each other, are being confirmed with greater rapidity than many expected. The first is that Centrism has no independent or consistent political line of its own. The second, that the stormy ultra-Left zigzag of Centrism is only a prelude to a new rampage in the direction of crass opportunism. The contentions are already being confirmed in all the important parties of the Comintern, including the Russian. In the United States, it is most crudely manifested in the present election campaign of the Party.

Conditions for Election Work

Why and under what conditions do Communists participate in parliamentary activities? Among the many conditions, these stand out: To utilize the interest aroused among the workers during election times for revolutionary agitation and organization of the workers. To point out that the Communists do not seek seats in order to use the bourgeois state apparatus as an instrument of the workers, but to use it as a forum where the decadent bourgeois parliamentarism is exposed and the illusions of the workers in it shattered. To utilize election periods in particular to mobilize the workers against the stifling farce of the polling booths and for transferring their demands and attention outside parliamentary boundaries and into the open field of struggles, (demonstrations, strikes, etc., etc.) To advocate such minimum (immediate) demands as do not reform capitalism (that is the job of the social democrats) but as entrain masses in struggle outside the ballot box deception, and incessantly to combine the minimum and maximum programs of the revolutionary proletariat, the immediate demands with the final aim of the seizure of power. To point out to the workers that parliament and elections are a sham and a deception practised upon them by the bourgeoisie and their reformist lieutenants, that reforms cannot improve their wretched lot which is produced by the system as a whole.

In the United States, where so many millions of workers participate in elections, where parliamentary illusions are deep and strong, where reformist quackery has been so prevalent and nefarious, and socialist reformism has assumed (for decades) such a crude bourgeois character, the observance of the above-mentioned conditions are imperatively needed guarantees for a Communist movement against a degeneration into opportunism. In the present elections frontier, without a cent, without a document, without his family!

He was still held a few days by Stalin's guards, and his wife, together with two children—one 7 years old and the other 2 years old—held with him.

The bureaucracy of Stalin knows no limits. The revolutionary workers must ask the leaders of the T.U.U.L. for an explanation of the case of Nin.

Upon their return, the American delegates to the R.I.L.U. congress must be asked for details on the case of Nin.

Nin is a tested revolutionist. With him, as with our non-Russian comrades, as with comrade Santini who is now in Moscow, Stalin and his valet Losovsky, do not dare to employ the solitary prison, exile, or the rifle squad—they must limit themselves with expulsions. But these methods dishonor the revolutionary trade union movement.

The Left wing militants in this country must conduct a persevering struggle against these methods which not only play into the hands of the Right wing and reaction, but destroy the prestige and effectiveness of the Communist movement.

An Opportunist Campaign

The Communist Party in the Elections

campaign, however, they have been honored more in the breach than in the observance and that with calamitous results.

Our Proposals

A few months ago, the Left Opposition, through the Militant, proposed a number of concrete issues as a program of action for the Communist movement. Leading them was the need of a campaign for social insurance that would set a broad class movement going and involve masses in struggle. At that time the proposal was not only strictly taboo in the columns of the official Party press and all Party documents, but it was looked at with a glaringly suspicious eye by the Stalinist mannikins as something akin to if not worse than "social fascism".

We never conceived such a campaign in the sense of a vulgar parliamentary comedy—that goes without saying. We urged it upon the Party, which finally accepted it when word had come from Moscow that even in the "third period" such a proposal was not entirely a bad one. It was from then on that we were presented with an almost incredible performance which reaches new depths with the passage of every day. From yesterday's hardly concealed contempt for "social fascist insurance", the Party leaders swung around their customary 180 degrees, and turned the issue—which can have a serious significance only as a demand for which workers actually fight—into a cheap electoral game.

To begin with, a "social insurance bill" was formally drafted by the Party, in the best manner of skilled parliamentarians. We are even ready to acknowledge that the bill is perfectly legal and its language irreproachable. Too legal and irreproachable, in fact. It tells us that "a national public (!) emergency now exists in the United States of America". A leaflet of the New York Party District informs us that the "Communists offer a remedy" (!); and the Daily Worker adds: Society owes these categories of workers a living." In fact, the only essential difference between the "Communist Bill" and the Socialist party's panacea is that the C.P. demands $25 a week per unemployed worker, to be paid by the government, while the S.P. does not demand so much. A very cheaply purchased "radicalism", indeed!

How the Opportunists Write of Their Bill

This very parliamentary "bill" has become the very acme of the struggle for social insurance conducted by the Party, the "center of the election campaign" as the Daily Worker says. We refrain from quoting much from the Daily Worker, but a few sentences must be cited here. They are breath-taking.

"A vote for the candidate of the Communist Party is a vote for the enactment of the Unemployment Insurance Bill" (8-29-1930).

The Party called together a "mass unemployment united front" for the purpose of discussing . . . "the enactment of the Workers' Social Insurance Bill as proposed by the Communist Party" (9-10-1930).

"This bill must not only be brought to the workers in the shops, trade unions, for their endorsement, but the Party must also consider the utilization of the initiative and referendum laws as a means of struggle for this bill." (8-2-1930).

In what way does this destroy the parliamentary illusions of the workers, or direct their attention and efforts to the extra-parliamentary field? The answer is: In no way! Instead of telling the workers bluntly and honestly that even their simplest and most elementary demands can be attained—not by "bills" and ballot boxes—but by genuine mass demonstrations and strikes (we do not mean the kind the Daily Worker organizes at its headline desks), by arousing the mass organizations of the workers to fight for these demands, the Party glues the eyes of its followers to a . . . bill. What has suddenly happened to the "third period", to the "revolutionary upsurge", to the "crisis worse than 1914", to the "possession of the streets"? They have been dissolved into a legally perfect, irreproachably worded "bill" to be presented for "enactment" to Congress.

That is not all. Combined with this miserable campaign of opportunism, is similar reformist nonsense, subsidiary in form but no less harmful.

"The funds necessary for such insurance," writes the Daily Worker, "can be provided by 1. Stopping armaments and other war preparations and assigning the funds hitherto spent for these purposes to a social insurance fund." (8-29-1930). No "genuine" pacifist could fail to be delighted with such a proposal, which is also advanced in the form of a slogan: "Not a cent for war."

Petty Bourgeois Pacifism

Not once but a hundred times did Lenin excoriate the petty bourgeois pacifists in the ranks of the socialist movement who advanced these and similar proposals and slogans. His strictures remain just as correct today, even when they must be directed against the chameleons of the "third period". Not so very long ago, the whole Party was stirred up against Bittelman for his petty bourgeois slogan: "No more cruises!" Does the new pacifist slogan of armaments and war differ in any essential from Bittelman's? It does not. Like its predecessor, it has no place in a Communist movement.

It may be objected that these are "isolated quotations". This objection is not valid. The quotations are only typical of what can be read every day in the Daily Worker and the rest of the Party press. The "bill" itself was drafted by the Party leadership—evidently with the practised aid of some of the present "leaders" who not so long ago studied how to be good parliamentarians under Victor Berger, Algernon Lee, Louis Waldman, Meyer London and Morris Hillquit. The editorials cited are written by no less a figure than C.A. Hathaway, graduate cum laude of the "Lenin" school, and now member of the almighty Party secretariat. The turn from ultra-Leftism is quite official.

This is not the first time this has happened. After the Fifth Congress of the Comintern, which followed the collapse of the Right wing leadership in Germany (1923) and Czechoslovakia, the International Centrist regime also embarked on a short-lived "Leftist" zig-zag. It was the period of Ruth Fischer and Treint leaderships and policies, of "playing at soldiers" as it was later termed. But this ultra-Leftist jag was only the prelude to the worst period of opportunism in Comintern history: the adventure with Chiang Kai-Shek, with La Follette, with Raditch and other "peasant" leaders, with Messrs. Purcell and Co. The indications are that such a catastrophic swing is to be repeated now.

Centrism has no consistent policy of its own. It is a parasite which lives on the pieces it bites off from the Left and Right alternately, but it always ends by sinking a foot deeper into the swamp of opportunism. As in 1925-1927, it is carrying through a turn to the Right with an accompaniment of ultra-Left trumpets.

A turn from the prevailing ultra-Leftist course, embodied in the spurious philosophy of the "third period" is essential for the Party. But Centrism cannot execute such a turn without springing back to its old Right wing positions. The vigilance and comradely criticism of the Left Opposition must assist the Communist workers in the ranks of the Party to make the turn from the present line to the positions of Marxism.

Lovestone's «United Front» Maneuver

(At a recent meeting, the national committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) considered the "open letter" sent by the Lovestone group to our organization and to the official Communist Party. The letter, calling for a "United Front", is published in full in the current issue of Revolutionary Age, organ of the Right wing, to which interested readers can refer for the full text from which quotations contained in the following document are taken. The letter which follows is the reply addressed publicly to the Right wing by the national committee of the League.)

* * *

We have received your letter of July 26, 1930 appealing for our "cooperation in setting up a united revolutionary front" as well as a copy of the resolution on "Trotskyism" adopted at the Plenum of your group. Both of these documents are of great significance for us. The resolution is the result of our incessant demand that the Lovestone group take a definite and formal position on the principle questions raised by the Left Opposition. This it failed to do ever since its removal from the leadership of the Party, a policy of evasion which evidently could no longer be maintained even in the ranks of that group itself. Furthermore, the resolution marks a retreat to a certain extent from the position maintained by the Lovestone group while it controlled the Party—a position now untenable for the Lovestone leadership after the Left Opposition has had the opportunity of breaking through the conspiracy of lies and misrepresentations with which the official Communist apparatus, Foster and Lovestone, surrounded the disputed points. That the resolution is permeated with opportunism and continued falsification is not the subject of this letter, which is primarily concerned with the appeal for a united front.

The United Front

The tactic of the united front is neither a maneuver nor a trick for us. We regard it as a serious means of mobilizing the masses of the workers not yet Communists for a struggle, on the basis of a minimum program, against the attacks of capitalism and its agents in the working class. Such a united front we cannot reject, all the more so since it is we who have constantly urged it on the labor movement in general and its revolutionary section in particular.

But a united front or bloc with the Lovestone group is not the same to us as a united front with a trade union or other labor organizations containing workers of varying shades of opinion without a definite political program and theoretical conception. Precisely because the Lovestone group calls itself Communist, the question of a bloc with it must be examined most closely and pre-conditions of a much higher order must be required. Before establishing these pre-conditions, a few preliminary observations must be made.

The appeal reads: "The revolutionary movement in this country finds itself weak, demoralized and divided . . . the capitalists and their agents are exploiting this division . . . at no time would refusal to cooperate in uniting the revolutionary forces be more criminal."

But it is precisely the Lovestone group which is chiefly responsible for this division, for its leadership initiated the campaign of expulsions of so-called "Trotskyists"; it is precisely this leadership which by its expulsion and assaults upon our group, its "refusal to cooperate in uniting the revolutionary forces" rendered itself criminally responsible. It was this leadership that failed "to consider the broad interests of the revolutionary and labor movement" by expelling our comrades, not only from the Party but from every auxiliary organization under its control—including trade unions. The failure to acknowledge honestly and openly the source and responsibility for the movement's division and demoralization in the past and present, makes any improvement in the future impossible. One cannot wash one's hands of the past by a dishonestly naive silence.

The appeal proposes the setting up of a joint committee of the three groups in the movement "to present the point of view of Communism, the point of view of those who stand by and defend the Soviet Union".

Unity with "Counter-Revolutionists"?

But it is the Lovestone group, together with the Stalinist apparatus, which has for years assailed us as "counter-revolutionists and the worst enemies of the Soviet Union", as the "agents of Chamberlain and Chiang Kai-Shek". We have not yet seen an acknowledgement that these declarations were infamous slanders which constituted the regular payment made by the Lovestone leadership to the Stalin-Bucharin regime for allowing it to run the American Party. One may therefore assume that the Lovestone leaders still retain these "convictions" concerning us. How then is it possible to appeal to counter-revolutionists and enemies of the Soviet Union to "present the point of view of those who stand by and defend the Soviet Union"? Or are we to believe that the Lovestone leaders are not and have not been serious in denouncing us as counter-revolutionists. In that case, it is necessary for them to admit plainly that they have for years been practising a disgraceful deception upon the workers' movement.

It is further necessary for us to point out that the principal cause of the present crisis in the Communist movement, manifested by division and demoralization is, the theoretical standpoint and practical activities of the Lovestone group and its international allies since 1923. It is impossible to enter a bloc with the Lovestone group while it retains and defends these conceptions. It is impossible to try to solve the crisis and overcome the division in the Communist movement by a "united front" with the elements that caused the crisis.

Moreover a united front with the Lovestone group—since the official Party bureaucrats can still prevent the Party from joining such a front—would constitute an unprincipled bloc against the Center, i.e., against the Party. It would end in a miserable fiasco (as did the Lovestone "united front" in the textile industry), or as a rallying ground for anti-Party forces. We are aiming, on the contrary, to restore the Party to a Marxist foundation, since it is our Party from which no clique of bureaucrats can separate us.

A united front of all Communist workers is essential. A determined effort must be made to overcome the crisis now raging in the movement. We have advocated such a front and we continue to propose it now. But we do not stand for an abstract unity, or bloc, but for one that has a basis in principle. With its present views on essential questions, and its evasion or silence on many others, a bloc with the Lovestone group is out of the question. Such a bloc demands certain pre-conditions which we hereby pose to the Lovestone faction:

Questions to Lovestone

1. One of the reasons for the crisis, the division and demoralization of the movement over which you express so much concern, has been the prevention of open discussion. Meetings have been broken up, raids on private homes conducted, comrades physically assaulted. These methods are still used in the Party against all Oppositions, on the basis of the precedent of gangsterism you established in the struggle against our group. There can be no issue from the present difficulties, and no genuine unity, without a condemnation of these atrocious methods, which means in the first place an open renunciation of your own past crimes in this respect. Otherwise no basis can be laid for a free and intelligent discussion of the problems of the movement.

2. One of the main reasons for the crisis and split is the expulsion of the Left Opposition from the Party. This was executed primarily by your group, at that time in control of the Party. It is necessary to know if this is still the official attitude of your group. Else how can you appeal to unite us into a movement to present the point of view of Communism while expelling us from the Communist Party?

3. But our group is only the American section of the international Left Opposition. The expulsion of these comrades, and particularly of the Russian Bolshevik-Leninists, has been of enormously destructive effect to the movement, reflected in the American Party as well as elsewhere. Comrade Trotsky has been deported to Turkey, and thousands of the best Bolsheviks exiled and imprisoned in the U.S.S.R. Bolshevik fighters have even been assassinated by Stalin. Up to now the Lovestone group has maintained a cowardly silence on these crimes. But without the release from prison and exile of the Oppositionists, the return to the U.S.S.R. of Trotsky, and their full reinstatement into the Party, no progress can be made in overcoming the division and demoralization in the movement. Does the Lovestone group intend to prefer a "diplomatic" silence on this burning question to a protest and demand?

4. No bloc is conceivable for us without a revolutionary policy in the trade unions. On this point we have had only vague ambiguities from your group. Recently, your official organ, Revolutionary Age, has given its hearty endorsement to the action of Hais and Co. in Czechoslovakia in surrendering the independent Red unions under their control to the Amsterdam International. This piece of liquidation was labelled by you as a step in the "unification" of the Czech working class. Does that signify that in the United States, where the Left unions are relatively even smaller than the reformist trade unions, you favor a similar liquidation of, let us say, the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union into the reformist International Ladies Garment Workers Union? The "logic" of Hais' action in Czechoslovakia would seem to apply in the American instance with even greater force—from your point of view. As you are aware, we condemn such actions unreservedly. Clarification on the trade union question is a sine qua non for any sort of bloc on principle grounds.

5. A united front of Communist workers or groups pre-supposes a certain amount of mutual confidence. The whole past course of your group does not inspire us with any. Your spokesmen and your press continue systematically not only to "interpret" our position, but to falsify it deliberately. The resolution on Trotskyism of your Plenum is a typical instance. We find there a repetition of the hodge-podge of known falsehoods, half-truths, consciously forged quotations that were pressed into service against the Left Opposition since the opening of the campaign against it in 1923. We find there a cheap falsification, unworthy of the dignity of a Communist, of our position on the danger of Thermidorian elements in the Soviet Union. Such methods are intolerable, even if they are characteristic of the whole struggle against a so-called Trotskyism. We demand an end of these falsifications and misrepresentations of our viewpoint.

Our reply is dictated solely by our insistence upon the maintenance of a principled point of view in the Communist movement. We are little concerned with the noises emanating from the empty barrels in charge of the official Party today, to the effect that the "Lovestoneites and Trotskyists" are now merged to fight the Party. The avowal by the Lovestone group itself that its differences with the Centrists are of a minor character compared with its differences with the Left Opposition which are of a principle character, speaks for itself and shows that in its whole philosophy the Right wing stands immeasurably closer to Centrism than does the Left wing. This clarification of the principle position has a great value.

Nor is our reply dictated by any desire for unity as such and on any basis. Our aim is the re-conquest and unification of the revolutionary movement on the basis of Marxism and the living experiences of Communism in the last two decades.

Communist League of America (Opposition)

An Answer and a Challenge to a Debate

The Communist League of America (Opposition) has received a letter from Bertram D. Wolfe, head of the Workers School of the Lovestone group, proposing a symposium of the three groups in the movement, the Party, the Lovestone group, and ourselves. In reply, the following letter was sent to Wolfe.

* * *

In your letter of August 14, 1930, you declare:

"The New Workers School therefore invites the Communist Party of the U.S.A., the Communist League of America, and the Communist Party (Majority Group) to send one representative each to present their respective viewpoints at a symposium discussion under a chairman selected by the Civil Liberties Union where they will be able freely to voice their opinions on the present crisis in the Communist movement and the respective merits of the three groups proposals for remedying the situation."

Such an invitation can only be welcomed by us, particularly since, from the very beginning of our struggle and expulsion from the Communist Party, we have insistently proposed a public debate before the Communist and Left wing workers, of the groups. We issued a public challenge, as you will remember, at the time Bertram D. Wolfe was lecturing against us immediately after our expulsion. At that time, the group you represent was in control of the Party and deliberately prevented such a discussion and debate not only by expelling us from the Party's ranks, but by resorting to the most disgraceful methods of slander falsehoods and even physical violence. After your own expulsion from the Party, we again proposed on a number of occasions that you agree to debate our respective viewpoints. Up to now this was refused. Such a debate, however, remains as necessary now as it was in the past.

It is quite clear that the official Communist Party will not consent to participate in the proposed symposium. Since only two groups would be represented, your own and ours, we propose instead of a "symposium" a debate. We have already selected our spokesman for such a debate. In addition, we have chosen a committee of two to meet with a similar committee representing your group, to decide on the title of the debate, the time, the place, the chairman, the auspices and all other details.

As soon as you shall have done the same, we are ready to meet together and work out all the necessary arrangements. Communist League of America (Opposition)

Socialist Indignation

During the sessions of the Second International at Zurich the Swiss government refused permission to enter its borders to the inoffensive Pietro Nenni, of the Italian Socialist Party. This was the occasion for great indignation among the leaders of the socialist international who are accustomed to much more deference from bourgeois governments. With an academic solemn pen, they addressed a protest against the denial of "hospitality" by the Swiss government to a proscribed politician.

Now we know the social democratic conception of democratic "hospitality": It consists of patronage by the bourgeois governments to social democratic leaders. But it is never to be extended to proscribed revolutionists who fight implacably against the capitalist order. Even when the social democrats themselves hold the reins of bourgeois government, they apply this hospitality exclusively to the bourgeoisie and its servitors. This rule was not transgressed by the MacDonalds and Muellers in excluding from this democratic "hospitality" the Communist Leon Trotsky. But when the Swiss government failed to maintain the laws regulating relations between the bourgeoisie and their socialist footmen, the latter protested. Their sorrowful and resigned indignation is comprehensible.

STALIN AS A THEORETICIAN

The Peasant's Balance Sheet of the Democratic and Socialist Revolutions

By L. D. TROTSKY

"... the appearance of comrade Stalin at the conference of the Marxist agronomists—was epochal in the history of the Communist Academy. As a consequence of what Stalin said, we had to review all our plans and revise them in the direction of what Stalin said. The appearance of comrade Stalin gave a tremendous impetus to our work."

—(Pokrovsky, at the 16th Congress)

In his programmatic report to the conference of the Marxist agronomists (December 27, 1929), Stalin spoke at length about the "Trotsky-Zinoviev Opposition" considering "that the October revolution, as a matter of fact, did not give anything to the peasantry". It is probable that even to the respectful auditors, this invention seemed too crude. For the sake of clarity, however, we should quote these words more fully: "I have in mind," said Stalin, "the theory that the October revolution gave the peasantry less (?) than the February revolution, that the October revolution, as a matter of fact, gave nothing to the peasantry." The invention of this "theory" is attributed by Stalin to one of the Soviet statistical economists, Groman, a known former Menshevik, after which he adds: "But this theory was seized by the Trotsky-Zinoviev Opposition and utilized against the Party." Groman's theory regarding the February and October revolutions is quite unknown to us. But Groman is of no account here altogether. He is dragged in merely to cover up the traces.

In what way could the February revolution give the peasantry more than the October? What did the February revolution give the peasant in general, with the exception of the superficial and therefore absolutely uncertain liquidation of the monarchy? The bureaucratic apparatus remained what it was. The land was not given to the peasant by the February revolution. But it did give him a continuation of the war and the certainty of a continued growth of inflation. Perhaps Stalin knows of some other gifts of the February revolution to the peasant? To us, they are unknown. The reason why the February revolution had to give way to the October is because it completely deceived the peasant.

The alleged theory of the Opposition on the advantages of the February revolution over the October is connected by Stalin with the theory "regarding the so-called scissors". By this he completely betrays the sources and aims of his chicanery. Stalin polemicalizes, as I will soon show, against me. Only for the convenience of his operations, for camouflaging his cruder distortions, he hides behind Groman and the anonymous "Trotsky-Zinoviev Opposition" in general.

The real essence of the question lies in the following. At the 12th Congress of the Party (in the spring of 1923) I demonstrated for the first time the threatening gap between industrial and agricultural prices. In my report, this phenomenon was for the first time called the "price scissors". I warned that the continual lagging of industry would spread apart this scissors and that they might sever the threads connecting the proletariat and the peasantry.

In February 1927, at the Plenum of the Central Committee, while considering the question of the policy on prices, I attempted for the one thousand and first time to prove that general phrases like "the face to the village" merely avoided the essence of the matter, and that from the standpoint of the "Smytchka" (alliance) with the peasant, the problem can be solved fundamentally by correlating the prices of agricultural and industrial products. The trouble with the peasant is that it is difficult for him to see far ahead. But he sees very well what is under his feet, he distinctly remembers the yesterdays, and he can draw the balance under his exchange of products with the city, which, at any given moment, is the balance-sheet of the revolution to him.

The expropriation of the landowners, erated the peasant from the payment of a sum amounting to from five to six hundred million rubles (about $275,000,000—Ed.). This is a clear and irrefutable gain for the peasantry through the October—and not the February—revolution.

But alongside of this tremendous plus, the peasant distinctly discerns the minus which this same October revolution has brought him. This minus consists of the excessive rise in prices of industrial products as compared with those prevailing before the war. It is understood that if in Russia capitalism had maintained itself the price scissors would undoubtedly have existed—this is an international phenomenon. But in the first place, the peasant does not know this. And in the second, nowhere did this scissors spread to the extent that it did in the Soviet Union. The great losses of the peasantry due to prices are of a temporary nature, reflecting the period of "primitive accumulation" of state industry. It is as though the proletarian state borrows from the peasantry in order to repay him a hundred-fold later on.

But all this relates to the sphere of theoretical considerations and historical predictions. The thoughts of the peasant, however, are empirical and based on facts as they appear at the moment. "The October revolution liberated me from the payment of half a billion rubles in land rents," reflects the peasant. "I am thankful to the Bolsheviks. But state industry takes away from me much more than the capitalists took. Here is where there is something wrong with the Communists." In other words, the peasant draws the balance sheet of the October revolution through combining its two fundamental stages: the agrarian-democratic ("Bolshevik") and the industrial-socialist ("Communist"). According to the first, a distinct and incontestable plus; according to the second, so far still a distinct minus, and to date a minus considerably greater than the plus. The passive balance of the October revolution, which is the basis of all the misunderstandings between the peasant and the Soviet power, is in turn most intimately bound up with the isolated position of the Soviet Union in world economy.

Almost three years after the old disputes, Stalin, to his misfortune, returns to the question. Because he is fated to repeat what others have left behind them, and at the same time to be anxious about his own "independence," he is compelled to look back apprehensively at the yesterday of the "Trotskyist Opposition" and ... cover up the traces. At the time the "scissors" between the city and the village was first spoken of, Stalin completely failed to understand it for five years (1923-28), he saw the danger in industry going too far ahead instead of lagging behind; in order to cover it up somehow, he mumbles something incoherent in his report about "bourgeois prejudices (!!!) regarding the so-called scissors". Why is this a prejudice? Wherein is it bourgeois? But Stalin is under no obligation to answer these questions, for there is nobody who would dare ask them.

If the February revolution had given land to the peasantry, the October revolution with its price scissors could not have maintained itself for two years. To put it more correctly: the October revolution could not have taken place if the February revolution had been capable of solving the basic, agrarian-democratic problems by liquidating private ownership of land.

We indirectly recalled above that in the first years after the October the peasant obstinately endeavored to contrast the Communist to the Bolsheviks. The latter he approved of—precisely because they made the land revolution with a determination never before known. But the same peasant was dissatisfied with the Communists, who having taken into their own hands the factories and mills, supplied commodities at high prices. In other words, the peasant very resolutely approved of the agrarian revolution of the Bolsheviks but manifested alarm, doubt, and sometimes even open hostility towards the first steps of the socialist revolution. Very soon, however, the peasant had to understand that Bolshevik and Communist are one and the same Party,

In February 1927, this question was raised by me at the Plenum of the Central Committee in the following manner:

The liquidation of the landowners opened up large credits for us with the peasants, political as well as economic. But these credits are not permanent and are not inexhaustible. The question is decided by the correlation of prices. Only the acceleration of industrialization on the one hand, and the collectivization of peasant economy on the other, can produce a more favorable correlation of prices for the village. Should the contrary be the case, the advantages of the agrarian revolution will be entirely concentrated in the hands of the Kulak, and the scissors will hurt the peasant poor most painfully. The differentiation in the middle peasantry will be accelerated. There can be but one result. The crumbling of the dictatorship of the proletariat. "This year," I said, "only eight billion rubles worth of commodities (in retail prices) will be released for the domestic market ... the village will pay for its smaller half of the commodities about four billion rubles. Let us accept the retail industrial index as twice the pre-war prices figure, as Mikoyan has reported ... The balance (of the peasant): 'The agrarian-democratic revolution brought me aside from everything else, five hundred million rubles a year (the liquidation of rents and the lowering of taxes). The socialist revolution has more than covered this profit by a two billion ruble deficit. It is clear that the balance is reduced to a deficit of one and a half billion.'"

Nobody objected by as much as a word at this session, but Yakovlev, the present People's Commissar of Agriculture, though at that time only a clerk for special statistical assignments, was given the job of upsetting my calculations at all costs. Yakovlev did all he could. With all the legitimate and illegitimate corrections and qualifications, Yakovlev was compelled the following day to admit that the balance-sheet of the October revolution for the village is, on the whole, still reduced to a minus. Let us once more produce an actual quotation:

"... The gain from a reduction of direct taxes compared with the pre-war days is equal to approximately 630,000,000 rubles ... In the last year the peasantry lost around a billion rubles as a consequence of its purchase of manufactured commodities not according to the index of the peasant income but according to the retail index of these commodities. The unfavorable balance is equal to about 400,000,000 rubles."

It is clear that Yakovlev's calculations essentially confirmed my opinion: The peasant realized a big profit through the democratic revolution made by the Bolsheviks but so far he suffers a loss which far exceeds the profit. I estimated the passive balance at a billion and a half. Yakovlev—at less than a half a billion. I still consider that my figure, which made not pretension to precision, was closer to reality than Yakovlev's. The difference between the two figures is in itself very considerable. But it does not change my basic conclusion. The acuteness of the grain collecting difficulties was a confirmation of my calculations as the more disquieting ones. It is really absurd to think that the grain strike of the upper layers of the village was caused by purely political motives, that is, by the hostility of the Kulak towards the Soviet power. The Kulak is incapable of such "idealism". If he did not furnish the grain for sale, it was because the exchange became disadvantageous as a result of the price scissors. That is why the Kulak succeeded in bringing into the orbit of his influence the middle peasant as well.

These calculations have a rough, so to speak inclusive, character. The component parts of the balance sheet can and should be separated in relation to the three basic sections of the peasantry: the Kulaks, the middle peasants and the poor peasants. However, in that period—the beginning of 1927—the official statistics, inspired by Yakovlev, ignored or deliberately minimized the differentiation in the village, and the policy of Stalin-Rykov-Bucharin was directed towards protecting the "powerful" peasant and fighting against the "shiftless" poor peasant. In this way, the passive balance was especially onerous upon the lower sections of the peasantry in the village.

Nevertheless, where did Stalin get his contrasting of the February and October revolutions, the reader will ask. It is a legitimate question. The contrast I made between the agrarian-democratic and the industrial-socialist revolutions, Stalin, who is absolutely incapable of theoretical, that is, of abstract thought, vaguely understood in his own fashion: He simply decided that the democratic-revolution—means the February revolution. Here we must pause, because Stalin and his colleagues' old, traditional failure to understand the mutual relations between the democratic and socialist revolutions, which lies at the basis of their whole struggle against the theory of the permanent revolution, has already succeeded in doing great damage, particularly in China and India, and remains a source of fatal errors to this day. The February 1917 revolution was greeted by Stalin essentially as a Left democrat, and not as a revolutionary proletarian internationalist. He showed this vividly by his whole conduct up to the time Lenin arrived. The February revolution to Stalin was and, as we see, still remains a "democratic" revolution par excellence. He stood for the support of the first provisional government which was headed by the national liberal landowner, Prince Lvov, had as its war minister the national conservative manufacturer, Gutchkov, and the liberal, Milukov, as minister of foreign affairs. Formulating the necessity of supporting the bourgeois landowning provisional government, at a Party conference, March 29, 1917, Stalin declared: "The power has been divided between two organs, not one of which has the complete mastery. The roles have been divided. The Soviet has actually taken the initiative in revolutionary transformations; the Soviet—is the revolutionary leader of the rebellious people, the organ which builds up the provisional government. The provisional government has actually taken the role of the consolidator of the conquests of the revolutionary people ... Insofar as the provisional government consolidates the advances of the revolution—to that extent we should support it."

The "February" bourgeois, landowning and thoroughly counter-revolutionary government was for Stalin not a class enemy but a collaborator with whom a division of labor had to be established. The workers and peasants would make the "conquests", the bourgeoisie would "consolidate" them. All of them together would make up the "democratic revolution". The formula of the Mensheviks, was at the same time also the formula of Stalin. All this was spoken of by Stalin a month after the February revolution when the character of the provisional government should have been clear even to a blind man, no longer on the basis of Marxist foresight but on the basis of political experience.

As the whole further course of events demonstrated, Lenin in 1917 did not really convince Stalin but elbowed him aside. The whole future struggle of Stalin against the permanent revolution was constructed upon the mechanical separation of the democratic revolution and socialist construction. Stalin has not yet understood that the October revolution was first a democratic revolution, and that only because of this was it able to realize the dictatorship of the proletariat. The balance between the democratic and socialist conquests of the October revolution which I drew was simply adapted by Stalin to his own conception. After this, he puts the question: "Is it true that the peasants did not get anything out of the October revolution?" And after saying that "thanks to the October revolution the peasants were liberated from the oppression of the landowners" (this was never heard of before, you see!) Stalin concludes that: "How can it be said after this that the October revolution did not give anything to the peasants?"

How can it be said after this—we ask—that this "theoretician" has even a grain of theoretical conscience?

NOTES OF A JOURNALIST --- By ALFA

Two or Not Even One? (Blucher's Enigmatic Speech)

One of the first sessions of the Sixteenth Party Congress was greeted by the commander of the Far Eastern army, Blucher. This fact in itself has no political significance and would hardly deserve mention. Neither has the fact a Party significance: If, as a soldier, Blucher is far inferior to Budenny for instance, then in a Party sense he is very little superior to him. Besides Blucher's speech of greetings was edited beforehand in the office of Voroshilov and therefore very badly edited. But the spirit of the flunkie who falls in line at command was consistent to the end. There were the enraptured acclaim of Stalin and the ardent greetings to Voroshilov, and several jabs aimed at the Right wing before whom Blucher stood at attention only the day before. Everything is in order. There is also an interesting admission: "In the period between the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Congresses, our Party and Communist Youth organization in the army carried on a successful struggle against counter-revolutionary Trotskyism." The Fifteenth Congress, as was said in its day, drew the final balance under the "struggle against Trotskyism" and liquidated it completely. Now we hear from Blucher that "a successful struggle against Trotskyism" was carried on in the army for the last two and a half years, between the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Congresses. We must assume that at the Seventeenth Congress we will find out not a little of instructive value concerning the further course of this struggle which is no sooner ended than it starts anew. If we live—we shall hear about it.

But we have paused at Blucher's speech not because of this admission, nor because of its general tone, which can be expressed in three words: At your service! In this speech, or at any rate in the reports of it, there is one point which is of serious significance—not as a characterization of Blucher but as a characterization of what is now being done in the Party and what is what is now being done to the Party.

According to the report in Pravda of June 28, 1930, Blucher declared:

"We, the fighters in the Red Army, can proudly report to you that during these battles we did not have a single defection, not a single deserter to the enemy. The army showed a high political and class devotion to socialist construction."

Every revolutionist can only welcome this information. Unfortunately, however, we have a second version of this point in Blucher's speech which undermines all our confidence in the whole report. In the journal, Rabotchi, which is the daily organ of the Central Committee of the White Russian Communist Party, the quotation from Blucher's speech is reported as follows:

"We can proudly report to you that we had no defections nor a single deserter to the camp of the enemy. We have only two dark, shameful stains: two qualified recruits who were to serve for a period of nine months went over to the enemy. Both of them turned out to be Trotskyists."

The words we underlined are completely absent from the Pravda report. Were they spoken by Blucher or not? If we are to judge by the text we would have to conclude that these words were arbitrarily and incongruously inserted into the report after it was made, as a result of which we have an obvious absurdity. At first it says that there was not "a single deserter" and then it is reported that there were two of them. Obviously, there is something foul here: If there is not a single one, then where did the two come from? And if there really were two deserters then how can one say "not a single one"? But let us assume that it was not Blucher himself who made the ends meet: In the speech unfortunately, there is generally more ardor than sense. But then why did the Pravda report omit such tempting information about two deserters? Why did Pravda conceal the counter-revolutionary betrayals of the "Trotskyists"? If Pravda did not conceal anything, if Blucher did not even say this, then how is it that these words appear on the same day in the Minsk Rabotchi?

We know well enough how all the information about the Congress is edited. Not a single line leaves the boundaries of the Congress without a visa from the Press Commission. This means that the information about the Trotskyist-deserters could never have been invented in Minsk. It had to be sent from Moscow with the seal of the Congress Press Commission. But then, once more, why were these lines omitted from Pravda? That is the first question.

There is also a second question. "Two qualified recruits went over to the enemy," we are told by Blucher or by somebody supplementing him. "Both of them turned out to be Trotskyists." These words are printed in the Minsk journal in bold face type. Naturally! But here is what is incomprehensible. Between the Fifteenth and the Sixteenth Congresses, according to the words of Blucher, the army was completely purged of the remnants of Trotskyism. Why wasn't it purged of these two also? Evidently they were not known until the moment of their flight. How did Blucher find out that they were "Trotskyists", after they had fled? "Both of them turned out (?) to be Trotskyists." What does he mean "turned out"? How and on what point? The water is dark, so dark that it looks like a stagnant pool. And it also looks as though someone had been splashing around in that pool.

And finally there is a third question: Why did the "Trotskyists" have to flee to the camp of the Chinese counter-revolution? At its head stands Chang Kai-Shek. He was never our ally. He was the ally of Stalin. He came to Stalin for negotiations. A week prior to the bloody coup d'Etat of Chiang Kai-Shek in April 1927, Stalin in the Hall of the Columns vouched for the loyalty of Chiang Kai-Shek. Chiang Kai-Shek's party belonged to the Comintern with a consultative vote. The Opposition fought against this intransigently. Stalin and Rykov exchanged photographs with Chiang Kai-Shek in April 1927, Stalin in ceived a portrait of Chiang Kai-Shek from the office of the Comintern with the request that he give his own portrait to Chiang Kai-Shek in exchange. Trotsky returned the portrait and refused to give his own. Stalin taught that Chiang Kai-Shek's Kuo Min Tang is a substitute for Soviets. The Opposition revealed the alliance between Stalin and Chiang Kai-Shek as a betrayal of the revolution. What grounds, then, could the "Trotskyists" have had for fleeing to the camp of Chiang Kai-Shek? And would it not be better for you, my good sirs, to remain silent about this?

A Reply To Comrade Weisbord

The speech of comrade Weisbord at the plenum of the Lovestone faction is significant as an example of a strong trend in the Communist movement to consider again the fundamental principle questions in dispute, and to draw closer to the Marxist standpoint of the Left Opposition. The recent adherence to our group of some of the best militants in the official Party, the winning of a section of the youth comrades who formerly followed the Lovestone group, and the present attitude of comrade Weisbord, for years a supporter of the Lovestone faction,—these are incontestable facts which demonstrate that the Left Opposition in the United States continues to be the rallying banner for ever-increasing numbers of revolutionary Communists.

They are facts which by themselves are sufficient answer to the pitiful declarations in the camp of the Right wing and the Centrists about our "disintegration", repeated solely for the purpose of retaining domination over militants whom the barrage of anti-"Trotskyism" alone has prevented from endorsing our views.

In this sense, the Communist League of America (Opposition) welcomes the statement of comrade Weisbord. At the same time, it is imperative to indicate some extremely serious defects in it, also typical of a certain confusion that exists in the ranks of many militants who are drawing closer to our point of view. It is not a question here of a number of relatively minor differences of opinion, which are quite admissible within the ranks of the Opposition itself. Nor do we raise the question of criticisms made by comrade Weisbord, which, in any case, can be discussed and solved on the basis of comradely argument and internal democracy. More fundamental questions are involved.

The Need for Clarity

The Communist League is the Left wing of the Communist movement, a faction fighting for the reconstitution of the Communist International on the unshakable foundations of Marx and Lenin which have been systematically undermined by Stalinism. As a faction, its base is necessarily narrower than that of the official Party and its requirements more stringent. Without wasting arguments on the philistine contentions of the Right wing concerning our alleged "sectarianism" (i. e., our insistence upon revolutionary principle), we must establish at all costs a thorough clarity in all fundamental problems of the movement, since without that it is impossible to point the correct road for the movement and help the revolutionary workers in and around the Communist Party tread this road by unloading their artificially appointed "leaders" and their baggage of pernicious theories. That is why, particularly in the case of Weisbord, a comrade who has occupied prominent posts in the work of American Communism and is not in the same position as a new-comer or rank and file worker in the movement, all unclarity and confusion must be energetically opposed.

They exist in Weisbord's views on the problems of the Indian and Chinese revolutions and the relations of the various groups in the movement. What comrade Weisbord entirely fails to see in connection with the guerilla warfare in China is the character of the period. It is not a question of "right" or "wrong" in the Chinese guerilla warfare, but of what period we are experiencing in China. Neither Stalinism nor the Lovestones recognize that their Menshevik policies during 1925-27 led to the victory of counter-revolution, the recession of the revolutionary wave, and the virtual decapitation of the Communist movement.

Because they consider the defeat of the Chinese revolution as a passing or already passed "episode", the policy of putschism is systematically advocated or condoned by them. They fail to see the need, particularly now in a period of depression of the workers, of re-awakening them, re-grouping them by means of democratic slogans, centering around the demand for a Constituent Assembly. At the same time this cheap "Leftism" is supplemented by the outright Menshevik perspective of the "democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry", i. e., a new Kuo Min Tang scandal, a new Kerenskyism.

It is these questions of strategical and tactical significance that must be decided in the Chinese revolution. Only by establishing a sound foundation on them can the present guerilla warfare be estimated correctly, in its proper place, and not in the ambiguous manner into which comrade Weisbord falls.

An Ambiguous Position on India

The same ambiguity exists in Weisbord's words on India. Side by side with perfectly correct formulations are to be found perfectly confused ones, particularly on the relations of the proletarian movement with the national bourgeoisie. The primary problem of the Indian revolution is not one of an alliance with the national bourgeoisie, but of how to shatter every bit of faith of the masses in that leadership, how to make them rely upon themselves exclusively, to drive the national bourgeoisie (Ghandism in all shades) relentlessly out of the movement. The native bourgeoisie is the principal brake on the popular masses; it is the last and most substantial prop of British imperialism in India.

The economic and political needs of

We do not know who fell into this fit of babbling: Blucher, or the editor of his speech, or both of them. But it is clear that somebody here fell into a fit of babbling exceeding the most exceptional norms of verisimilitude. That is why Pravda refused to print these words. It was decided there, and not without cause, that this is too stupid. But at the same time the Press Commission of the Congress was reluctant to throw them out: maybe somebody will find some use for them. And really—such an alluring morsel: On the one hand, not a single deserter, which is such an excellent testimonial to the army. On the other hand, fully two deserters, and both of them "Trotskyists"; and this is still better, for it reveals the direct connection between the Opposition and Chiang Kai-Shek. A pity to throw it out: Perhaps it will come in handy in Minsk.

In conclusion, there still remains to take a look at the composition of the Press Commission. It includes the former Social Revolutionists, Berdnikov, who is prepared for any service; Stalin's former secretary, Nazaretian, who has quite a distinct and well-earned reputation; the former Menshevik, Popov, who supplements Berdnikov; the chief cook of the Bureau of Party History, Saville; and Stalin's former secretary, Tovstukha. This ought to be enough for anybody.

The Sermon on Cockroaches

In his concluding remarks, Stalin spoke about how Rykov, Bucharin and Tomsky became frightened as soon as "a cockroach stirred somewhere, before it even crawled out of its hole". . . . The speech evidently referred to the dissatisfied Kulaks and middle peasants. Further on, however, the above-mentioned cockroach turns out to be "feeble and moribund". This complicates matters somewhat. It may be that a feeble cockroach can stir, but so far as a moribund cockroach is concerned—we would say frankly that we have our doubts. We are quite in accord with the moral that even live cockroaches should not be feared. But on the other hand we assume that under no circumstances should a cockroach be called a raisin, as an economical father once did when a baked cockroach was discovered in his bread. Nevertheless, some people—"economists" if not "economical"—believed and taught others, beginning with 1924, that the Kulak is a myth altogether, that socialism can very well be reconciled with that "powerful middle peasant"—in a word, for four years they ardently converted the cockroach into the raisin of national socialism. This too should have been avoided.

A Self-Portrait of Yaroslavsky

The irreplaceable colleague, Yaroslavsky, in the interests of self-criticism, read at the Congress a description of a Communist given by a certain organization in a forsaken locality: "Consistent, politically literate, has no firm convictions of his own. Awaits what other will say." The report records "laughter". But if one stops to think, it is not at all a laughing matter. It is only too true. And maybe this is precisely why it is so ludicrous. The province has hit the mark, describing not a man but a type.

Yes, even if we take this same Yaroslavsky. In 1923, he wrote panegyrics to Trotsky. In 1925, he wrote agreeing with Zinoviev's "Leninism", which was directly entirely against Stalin. In 1927, he wrote that Bucharin has no deviations whatever and that he is educating the youth in the spirit of Leninism.

But can it be said that Yaroslavsky is inconsistent? Nobody will say that. He is quite consistent, even too consistent. Politically illiterate? No, of course not. At worst—he is semi-literate. Has he his own firm convictions? It appears that he has not. But why should convictions be firm? They are not metallic. But how is it that Yaroslavsky, without firm convictions, maintains himself at the top? Very simple. He "awaits what others will say".

No, the Congress laughed for nothing. The description fits perfectly.

A Statement of Views on Some Disputed Questions

By ALBERT WEISBORD

(This is the final installment of the speech made before the Lovestone group plenum by comrade Weisbord in which he present his views. The reply of the Communist League is appended.)

* * *

18. India. The basic slogans for the Communists today in India must be Lenin's "Three Pillars", that is, a basic slogan for the proletariat (say the eight hour day) a basic slogan for the peasantry (confiscation of the land) and the slogan of Democratic Republic. To these "three pillars" the slogan "Freedom for India" must be added. Only around all these slogans can the masses be effectively mobilized. It would be a gross error for the Communists to stress the slogan of Freedom for India alone as does the nationalist Indian bourgeoisie. The slogan for "Constituent Assembly" by itself is not incorrect but is incomplete and may be dangerous for it does not take into consideration the fact that British Imperialism can maneuver so as to make the slogan of Constituent Assembly a SUBSTITUTE for a democratic republic. The slogan Constituent Assembly can be used correctly only in conjunction with the slogan for a Democratic Republic.

The Slogan of Soviets

The slogan of Soviets can be appropriate only when a sufficiently acute revolutionary situation has been engendered around the "three pillars", when the class struggle and civil war rages in the villages and towns. In this connection it must be emphasized that Soviets can be built even with the slogan of Constituent Assembly. The two slogans of Constituent Assembly and Soviets need not be antagonistic at all times. But what must be stressed is the actual organization of civil war in the village and town and the leadership of the proletariat in this civil war. Only the dictatorship of the proletariat in India can make permanent its revolution.

The Communists must make plain to the masses the role of the nationalistic Indian bourgeoisie and the role of Ghandi as an agent of this class. Not only the experiences of 1921 must be gone over, but all the treacherous actions of the present Ghandi campaign (the salt campaign, the anti-machine movement, passive resistance, opposition to workers, record at the Nationalist Congress, etc., etc., etc.) must be elaborated. Simultaneously mass movements in town and countryside against native usurer, gentry, kulak, bourgeois, must be effected. By no means must the Chiang Kai-Shek disaster be repeated. The criminal negligence of the C.I. in failing to build the Communist Party but in building worker-peasant parties instead must be speedily liquidated. It is clear it is not OUR business to organize peasant parties.

It is clear that the main task of the Communists must be the stimulation of the masses around the "three pillar" and freedom slogans. These movements are directed against both native and foreign rulers and bourgeoisie who may desire a nationalist revolutionary movement under the sole slogan of "Freedom of India" from the British. Nevertheless, and this is most important to understand, so long as a section of the nationalist Indian bourgeoisie is fighting British Imperialism under the slogan of Freedom of India from Imperialist rule, so long as this movement unleashes the energy of the masses which otherwise could not be unleashed and so long as the masses have not been actively mobilized around the correct slogans and while the exposure of the native bourgeoisie is but in its incipency, it would be manifestly incorrect for the Communists not to enter or to struggle for a national revolutionary front against British Imperialism even though this national revolutionary front would temporarily contain sections of the nationalist revolutionary bourgeoisie (whom the masses follow) even though the sole slogan were "Freedom for India" from British Imperialism and even though later the united front would have to be broken by the development of the class struggle in the villages and towns of India. The center of attack must be against British Imperialism and its conscious reactionary agents within India.

The crime of the C.I. in China (and this opinion is not in contradiction with the basic opinions of comrade Trotsky, it seems) was NOT that the C.P. of China joined a national revolutionary front, but that the C.I. SUBSTITUTED the Kuomintang for the Communist Party, succumbed to Sun Yat Senism, introduced class collaboration against the class struggle, sacrificing the class struggle to this national revolutionary front against foreign imperialism, failing to raise the "Three Pillar" slogans and thus leading the civil war in village and town on concrete demands of the masses against the native exploiters as well. The policy today must be: a national revolutionary front which later will be broken by the progress of the class struggle in India under the leadership of the proletariat (through its Communist Party) in alliance with the peasantry on the road to the struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat.

The Problem in China

14. Here too the slogan of the Constituent Assembly is still correct, although it is apparently incorrect to state that the Chinese revolution is still on the wane. Here the mobilization of workers and peasants on concrete issues can lead to such an acute revolutionary situation that Soviets can be formed.

It is dubious to say, as do some members of the International Left Opposition, that the present guerilla warfare going on in China today is wrong and not to be supported. Under the present conditions, if the facts are that masses of desperate peasants are ready to take up civil war in the countryside, the Communists must stimulate, support, organize and lead such a movement. On the other hand, it must be clear that no matter how much the Imperialists and native Chinese rulers may be weakened, armed peasant bands cannot take the place of mass peasant uprisings, the peasant movement can not take the place of a proletarian struggle, and peasant "Soviets" cannot replace the dictatorship of the proletariat.

15. The colonial revolutionary situations in China and India are of the greatest importance to the rest of the world, and to the United States especially. How can we foresee that the United States will "weather the economic storm" and "reach new peaks" unless we foresee already the complete and sudden crushing of the revolutionary wave in the Far East. It is the rankest opportunism to fail to connect in the most intimate way the revolutionary situations in the East with the immediate perspective of the United States. All of the Communist groups suffer from this opportunism more or less. Unless this view is corrected it will be true that the revolutions will be defeated, but it will be the Communists who will have aided unconsciously the hangmen both in the East and in the West.

16. The slogan Soviet United States of Europe today seems dubious. Lenin was opposed to this slogan. Today, it may tend to aid reactionary schemes like those of Briand. It should be remembered that among the capitalist nations the sharpest basic antagonisms are no longer between European nations but between Europe and America.

17. The situation within the Soviet Union, our fatherland, must be of the utmost concern for us. The difficulty and delicacy of the subject must not lead to less discussion but to more. There is no question but that, on the whole, here comrade Trotsky was correct both in stressing industrialization and the necessity of a "plan", and in proposing an intensification of the war on the kulak. When there is recalled Bucharin's slogan to the peasantry "Enrich yourselves" and how there was solemnly discussed in Russia the possibility of the "kulaks growing into socialism", when there is recalled the arguments that any plan of industrialization was "too premature" and would lead to terrible catastrophes and "war in the village", when there is recalled how backward the original industrialization plans were and how far the masses outstripped the "Party leaders", then the conclusion is ripe that the attack on comrade Trotsky on this question only hid the Right opportunism of the Stalin-Bucharin regime.

The Five-Year Plan

The five year plan, belated as it was, and its speedy execution, mark a tremendous step forward. The industrialization of the Soviet State must tend greatly to strengthen the revolutionary movement and tend to hasten the end of capitalism. But the economic progress of the U.S.S.R. does not BY ITSELF NECESSARILY lead to an advance of the world revolution. If with such an economic advance there should be fastened upon the Communist Parties still more the theory of building socialism in one country, if this should lead not to an international but a nationalist viewpoint, if this should in turn lead the C.I. leadership to playing with and a sacrifice of foreign sections of the C.I., if this should fasten the hold of the bureaucrats still more, if this should lead to Trotsky deportations and Edumkin murders and violence to every Communist opposition movement, then indeed it is possible to state that unless the Communists throughout the world (aided by the very economic advance of the Soviet Union) can guard against this degeneration from Leninism it is possible to have an economic advance of the Soviet Union simultaneously with a setback to the world proletarian revolution. Trotsky's exposure of the elements of Thermidor generating within the Soviet Union is absolutely correct.

Section D. 18. The Comintern today is in a profound crisis. The narrowing down and great loss of prestige of the C.I. and the mass expulsions show how deeply opportunism was part of the Communist movement. The formation of three different separately organized international Communist groups speaks of the disintegration of the movement. But it also marks a step forward since such a situation exposes the rottenness in all groups, hardens the real Leninists and prepares the way for new advances.

We owe it primarily and above all to L.D. Trotsky for exposing the situation since Lenin died, for bringing to light the Testament of Lenin which the other leaders had deliberately hidden, for exposing the forgeries of Lenin's writings attempted, and for bringing to light many facts of Party history concealed by the bureaucrats from the membership.

However it, seems that comrade Trotsky is incorrect in designating the struggle between Bucharin and Stalin (and the national groups around them) as one between "Right" and "Centrist" tendencies in the Communist movement. It is in reality a struggle between two forms of the "Right". Both philosophically and politically the conception of a "Centrist" COMMUNIST wing is wrong. Centrism can be used as designating Socialists but not Communists. This was Lenin's usage of the term. Practically, it gives the illusion that the "Centrists" are more to the "Left" than the "Right" and that "Centrists" are more easily swayed and have no real policy of their own.

19. In the United States, the disintegration of the Communist Party has exposed three groups with definite Right wing tendencies. The putschism of the official Communist Party factionalists is not the wrong estimation of those too impatient and too eager to struggle, but a deliberate make-believe to conceal their utter Right wing bankruptcy. The theory of building socialism in one country, their attitude on colonial questions, their deliberate isolation from the masses, their conception that leaders of a Communist Party can be liars and fakers trying to bluff both Moscow and the membership, and can reach leadership without ever having been called to carry out responsible mass work in a Communist manner before becoming leaders, their violence against Communist groups, these are some of the things that show on what road this clique marches.

The Communist "Majority" group (Lovestone) shows just as bad tendencies. The failure to analyze international questions (China, Russia, etc.) and to link up these questions in the closest degree with questions of the United States; the "Right" line when these questions are approached, the wrong estimation both of the whole present period of post-war capitalism and of the present situation inside and outside the United States and the complete failure to understand the many Right wing mistakes (including the methods of dealing with the Trotsky opposition) that were committed by the leaders of this group as leaders of the Party. These are but part of the evidence to show how firmly rooted the Right tendencies of this group have become.

The Communist League (Opposition) also has shown definite "Right" tendencies. But the Right tendencies have NOT flowed from comrade Trotsky and the International Left Opposition—now that the true position of the "Trotsky" opposition is known—but are peculiar to its American section. The May 1929 factional platform, the passivity and sectarian leanings, the absolute and complete lack of self-criticism and failure to see that the Cannon faction within the Party was as un-Leninist as any of the others, these defects flowed from the fact that the American section of the Left International Opposition was too close to but a reconstituted Cannon faction in the beginning of its formation. However there must be admitted the great service such a faction did render in the publication and popularization of the principles of the Left International Opposition.

The crying need of the hour today is absolute ideological intransigence, plus the working together of all Communist groups. One of the crassest forms of opportunism was the factional unity attempted in the Party in 1928 (and before) and which was only the obverse side of the unprincipled factionalism that had existed before merely in another form. The correct solution of the momentous questions of the day on the basis of Leninism stand above all questions of formal discipline.

At the same time all Communist groups must work together on the basis of the recognition of the Communist character of each group. The Communist "Majority" opposition group and the Communist League group by working together can help to re-establish mass work and to resist the violent tactics of the Party officialdom. They can help to separate the Communist movement as a whole from the Mensheviks and can deal a death blow to the theory of "fascism" and "social-fascism" thus winning the advanced workers to a Leninist conception of Party democracy. Only such a working together of Communist groups can raise those fundamental principles of Leninist organization that can reconstitute an International of Lenin.

What Is Going On In China?

SHANGHAI—

The year 1922-29 may be described as a period of a certain economic revival of the Chinese bourgeoisie. Three conditions aided the bourgeoisie to restore its economy: a prosperous gain in agricultural harvest in the second half of 1927 and the first half of 1928; the ebb tide of the strike movement as a result of the proletariat's defeat; the temporary cessation of the civil war and the restoration of inland communication. The Chinese bourgeoisie, taking advantage of this good situation, restored its economic power. Up to 1930, the bourgeoisie had wholly recovered in the factories destroyed by the war. The general profit of the principal industry—textile—had surpassed the record after the war, while the import and export of merchant ships had increased by 20 percent higher than before, and domestic and foreign trade had increased proportionately. But the rise came to an end with the civil war and agrarian famine at the beginning of 1930.

In 1929, the war between Chiang Kai-Shek and the Kwangsi clique broke out. In 1930, the Chiang-Yen Sih-Shan war broke out. In the consideration of the latter, there are two different opinions: the one of Lee Li-san, the present leader of the Chinese Communist Party, the other is that of the Leninist Opposition.

According to Lee Li-san, this is a war of the classes, that is, the revolutionary high wave, because, according to his "analysis", the participants in the civil war represent different classes: Feng Yu-Hsiang represents the petty bourgeoisie; Kwangsi, the landlords; and Chiang the national bourgeoisie.

The National Action Committee of the Chinese Bolshevik-Leninists (Opposition) has already declared that such wars are unavoidable results after the fall of the proletarian forces. The imperialists in China and their agents, the Chinese bourgeoisie are intoxicated with the desire to split up China still further because the local governments established by these splits are the only safe guarantee for the exceptional power and interests of the imperialists and the government of Chiang Kai-Shek is the "provisional government" supported unanimously by the imperialists and the local bourgeoisie as well in order to suppress the revolutionary forces after the exhaustion of the proletariat and the forces under its leadership; but the full attention of the imperialists and the whole local bourgeoisie is concentrated on the splitting up process: the civil war is only a means for the purpose of split.

Since the "provisional government" (Nanking) has succeeded in its role and task of suppressing the revolutionary forces, then its power must be weakened by civil wars to the level of the former Peking government, while the local powers must also be reduced to the "Tuchun" period before 1925. All these are natural phenomena under the regime of different imperialists. The temporary (and only temporary) restraining of the militarists from civil wars is possible only under the most reactionary regime which suppresses the workers and peasants completely. But this is a temporary restraint which only means the preparation of new and more violent wars. The complete elimination of civil wars among the militarists is conceivable only through the seizure of power by the proletariat in the coming, third revolutionary uprising.

Under the condition of permanent civil war the masses are impelled to recognize the real political countenance of the Communist Party and to turn towards the Left. It is inevitable that during this period the bourgeois groups in opposition to the one in power, will hide themselves more cunningly behind the "Left" mask in order to betray the masses. Here one may assume two alternatives for the near future: The "reorganizationists" and the "West Hill Conference group" will put aside their own reformist platforms in order to unite with Yen Sih-Shan, Feng Yu-Hsiang, Kwangsi war lords, and organize a government whose policy will become more reactionary than Chiang Kai-Shek's. The Centrists of the Kuo Min Tang like the so-called board of "New Life" will surely stand in opposition to this bourgeois government under the mask of a "Left" turn. Or some of them will split from the ranks of the "reorganizationists" to oppose the policy of Wang Chin Wei and Co. This is the first possible alternative.

The other one would be more dangerous to the proletariat. The Left bourgeoisie with its existing organizations and under the mask of an "ultra-Left" turn will consent to the bourgeois democratic revolution and to the "democratic dictatorship of the workers and peasants", to the slogan "Unite with the Soviet Union" only under the condition that the property of the Chinese bourgeoisie is not confiscated. Then, under this mask, the "ultra-Left" bourgeoisie will again be able to betray the proletariat and get material support from the Soviet Union.

This letter represents the point of view of the "Our Word" group of the Left Opposition in China. The Militant disagrees seriously with a number of statements and opinions expressed by comrade Peter in estimating the present situation in the country, with particular regard to the guerilla warfare, on which we have already written and will continue to write in future issues. Nevertheless, the first-hand account of the situation in China which this letter offers makes its publication in the Militant of great interest and value.

"Can it be considered that the revolution of 1925-1927 has at least partly satisfied the basic interests of Chinese capitalism?" said comrade Trotsky in his criticism of the Comintern program. "No. China is now just as far from national unity and from customs independence as it was prior to 1925. But as a matter of fact the creation of one home market and its protection from cheaper foreign goods is for the Chinese bourgeoisie a question of life and death. It is a question only second in importance to that of maintaining the basis of its class domination over the proletariat and the rural poor. But also for the Japanese and for the British bourgeoisie, the maintenance of China in its colonial state is a question of no less importance than the question of economic independence is for the Chinese bourgeoisie. That is why the Chinese bourgeoisie will still display many zig-zag moves towards the Left in its future policy. For those who like united fronts there will still be many chances in the future."

The present task of the Chinese Opposition is to avoid the two dangers mentioned above by all means. So that the most important work to be carried out is the slogan of a national (Constituent) Assembly through which we may sharply disclose all the deceivers of the "opposition" bourgeoisie. On the other hand, with the aid of this slogan, we must try our best to carry on a propaganda for the dictatorship of the proletariat and nationalization of the means of production, establishing firmly the real program of the proletariat which will be contrary to the obscure "bourgeois democratic" platform of the Stalinists.

In the Party

In recent months, the official Communist Party, with the opportunist program adopted by its sixth congress under the leadership of the ultra-Right winger Lee Li-san, came to an agreement with the reorganizationists, compromising the struggle between the poor peasantry and the Kulak. But under the "Left" turn of Stalin, this ultra-Right policy was wiped out by diplomatic decree of the Comintern. Chi Chiu-

* Theoretical organ of the Kuo Min Tang Centrists, whose task is to explain their theories by a "materialism" and "Marxism" of their own.

Bai and Mif, after their arrival in China, formally criticized the former policy of agreement between Lee Li-san and the reorganizationists. Nevertheless such a "Left" attempt does not correct the fundamental principle error of the Party line, since with a course based on the "bourgeois character" of the revolution, "temporary" agreements with the liberal bourgeoisie are a natural conclusion.

At present, the Party regime is still under the influence of the Lee Li-sans. That the powerful Lee agrees to publish the criticism of Chi Chiu-Bai and Mif in the official Party organ is only a false demonstration to the Comintern. But it does show that the ultra-Right spirit of Lee Li-san has prevailed strongly in the whole Party. For instance, the serious struggle between Tchu-Deh and Mu Tse-tong in the Red Army. Comrade Mu Tse-tong is more to the Left and may stand on the side of the Party masses against Tchu-Deh. But the Central Party regime of the ultra-Right wing has decided to replace comrade Mu Tse-tong with the follower of Lee Li-san, Yun Tai-in.

The history of the Russian revolution teaches us that in the ranks of Menshevism there were many differences, especially on the question of relations with the constitutionalists. The Mensheviks were divided into cooperators and opponents. But on the fundamental problems of the revolution they unanimously opposed the Bolsheviks. So does Chinese Menshevism. The reorganizationists are clearly no other than the Chinese Constitutionalists, the most dangerous enemy of the proletariat. Therefore on the question of relations with the Chinese Constitutionalists, whatever differences exist among the Chinese Mensheviks like Chi Chiu-Bai and Lee Li-san the Bolshevik Opposition can never come to agreement with them. They are for the road of the "bourgeois character" of the revolution and the "democratic dictatorship", while we are for the proletarian dictatorship and nationalization of the means of production.

The Red Army

The Red Army in China is an ever disputed question. In the ranks of disguised Oppositionists in China, the attitude towards the Red army has been falsified by saying that it is simply "an unorganized disturbance of bandits, vagabonds and villains" (Tchen Du-Siu and Liurze groups). The Stalinists are of the opinion that the Soviets of the occupied provinces are the proletarian power, and the Red Army the 100 percent military force of the latter.

As a matter of fact, the present Chinese Soviets are not established on the basis of the class struggle between landlords and peasantry, not to speak of the leadership of the proletariat. The present Soviets are only the jobless grouped in the village in order to obtain a living. Their attitude towards the peasants at work takes the form of a conqueror, so that the Soviets are not considered by the peasant as his own organization. The Soviets can make agreements with the upper classes in the village because of their separation from the sympathetic support of the peasant masses. In most of the Soviet districts, the leadership does not accomplish the division of the land, confiscation of the merchant shops, but, on the contrary, carries out the slogan of "Protect the merchant shops and money-lenders". The leaders, furthermore, do not disarm the bandits in order to arm the poor peasantry, but permits them to rob freely.

But although the Soviets under the leadership of the Stalinists are not the power of the workers and peasantry, they are peasant war groups, depending upon the activities of their leaders, like the group under Hong Siu-Chuan, the Taipings leader. Such groups are able to exist even in the period of the greatest consolidation of the reactionary regime; militarist civil war makes their further growth possible.

In these peasant war groups, the proletariat must by all means acquire the leading position. But the leadership can easily be captured by "populist" parties, which seek to make the peasants independent from the workers. The Stalinists are helping the development of such "populist" parties. First, they attempt to organize purely peasant Soviets under the slogan of the "democratic dictatorship of the proletariat and peasantry". Secondly, they do not tell the peasants that the revolutionary situation has weakened, but play up to the narrow-minded and prideful thoughts of the peasantry that the workers in China are much more backward than the peasants. Third, they do not develop the independent spirit of the proletarian struggle, but spread exaggerated news about the Red Army in their organ with the largest type as if its victory were the road out for the workers. In a word, all the propaganda of the Stalinists objectively incites the "populist" ideas of the peasant's independence from the workers. From our point of view, the Stalinists in China are undergoing a process of "Social Revolutionarization".

To want to eliminate such peasant Soviets and their struggle in no way coincides with the standpoint of the Opposition. Despite the fact that they are not workers' and peasants' Soviets under the leadership of the proletariat, they are far better for us than the power of the landlords. In the future revolutionary rising wave, such peasants' Soviets will be very easily turned into a workers' and peasants' Soviet power, preparing for the proletarian dictatorship. It is without doubt that during the reactionary period, the organization of workers' and peasants' Soviets is impossible; but the existence of isolated peasant war groups in so widespread a country as China is quite possible. It is the remaining spurt of the village revolution of 1925-27. The duties of the present leadership are to agitate for the more extensive development of the city labor movement, to lead it and to prolong its existence before it is completely exhausted and destroyed by reactionaries.

The Chinese Bolshevik-Leninists (Opposition) recognizes that the significance of the peasant war groups is quite different from that of the workers' and peasants' Soviets. But our sympathy is wholly on the side of such peasant wars. We insistently protest against the shameless stories about them spread by the landlords and the bourgeoisie. We speak to the working classes that these Soviets are peasant war groups, much more advanced than those of landlords and that the workers should unite with them. But we do not betray the workers like the Stalinists do by saying that these are the very Soviets of the future proletarian dictatorship.

The capture of Changsha, capital of Hunan province, by the Red Army has given a great impetus to the demonstration on August 1st in Shanghai. We distributed our leaflets with an "Appeal to the Workers, Peasants and Soldiers of the Red Army for the capture of Changsha". There we declared that the capture of Changsha by the heroic militants in the peasant war deserves the praise of the world proletariat. The heroic Red Army should not only make further attacks on the bourgeois militarists but should also carry out the confiscation of property, Chinese and foreign, divide the land of the Kulak and landlords among the poor peasants in spite of the Stalinist opportunist line etc., etc. We hope to send you a report on the Changsha situation, the present strike movement, etc., within the next few days.

In the Party

Why I Joined the Left Opposition

Comrade Sylvia Bleeker, organizer of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, and one of the oldest members of the Party, whose case we spoke of in the Militant, two issues ago, has been expelled for "Trotskyism". She sends us the following declaration:

* * *

The statement by the Party Central Control Commission on my expulsion (Daily Worker, 9-3-1930) needs further explanation. It was not merely a statement of my expulsion but a slander and misrepresentation of my relation to the struggle in general. And while I am sure that every worker or member of our Union who read it felt repelled by such contemptible slander, I nevertheless wish to make a few explanatory remarks.

Records Needs No Apology

My record of work, activities and devotion to the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union and the Party needs no apology. It has been known to the workers for almost 10 years. Any work assigned to me was carried out faithfully and flawlessly. And were it not for my agreement with the platform of the Communist League, the Party would still speak of my loyalty.

My adherence to the "Trotsky Opposition" in no way eradicates my former record. On the contrary, it is a logical consequence of my serious and vital concern with the policies of the C.I. and its American section.

Since when is one a good Communist who doesn't think, question or disagree? Since when has it become our slogan: Obey and not ask questions? The Communist Party is not a religious sect (and even their history is filled with "periods of questioning"). The Party is the political weapon of the workers in the fight against the capitalist system, and it is the duty of every Communist to use this weapon to its maximum effectiveness. We need the Communist Party to lead the working class in all its struggles; we need it to fight and expose reformist influence among the workers; we need it to build the kernel of the proletarian revolution. No sooner do the policies of the Party fail to live up to its historical role than every Communist must point it out, criticize and if compelled, organize a faction to correct these policies.

That is exactly what comrade Trotsky has been doing, and that is exactly what the American Left Opposition is doing at present. The criticism made by comrade Trotsky from 1923 to now, whether nationally or internationally, has been entirely confirmed by events, much more than any of us expected. And it is because of the very correctness of his prognoses that he doesn't stand alone but has a movement of devoted class-conscious workers behind him. Every day brings new groups of adherents to the course of Leninism as against the policies of Stalin's regime, which is leading the Party into the abyss.

A Contemptible Slander

The C.C.C. statement that I "covered myself with the cloak of Trotskyism to escape from the struggle" is a despicable slander. No serious worker believes it now and will surely not believe it in the future. I remain in the ranks of the class conscious workers and will work together with them regardless of difficulties. But true to my principles, I shall never agree with either the present official policies of the Party which are disastrous, nor with the bureaucratization of the Party. The average member in our Party is becoming a mere cog and not a sober, conscious fighter. This is not a fault of the Communist ideal but of the present Party leadership.

The frequent changes and uncertainties in the Party and trade union policies, without any broad discussion at the units, the Party fractions, introduce confusion, apathy and general loss of faith by the rank and file. Reorganizations take place at such a tempo that it is no longer possible to follow them up. These constant reorganizations are resorted to as a substitute for correct policies, but they are absolutely wrong and suicidal. The fact is that the attendance at Party fraction meetings has been reduced to a fourth of the membership. The mechanical introduction of policies, their mechanical execution, abolition and re-introduction (as in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers) are ruinous.

Elections in the Party are becoming a word of the past. Secretaries and financial secretaries can no longer be elected, only appointed by the bureau!

Can or should a real Communist overlook all this? Is it not time to make an end to all these ruinous policies? Regardless of what the official apparatus does—expel, slander, temporarily isolate us, beat us up, break up meetings—it is our turn to speak. A Communist who keeps quiet now when danger is facing our Party is a coward and a slacker against the working class. The differences in the Comintern can no longer be concealed. The platform of the Leninist Opposition can no longer be misrepresented or misquoted. The facts are out in the daylight.

Communism Weakened by Expulsions

By expelling us from the Party's ranks, our strength is only weakened. By driving us out of active work in the trade unions and auxiliary organizations, the Party officials are deliberately hurting the cause of the workers. We want to be in the Party. We want to be in the trade unions. We want to be in every class struggle. We are ready and willing to sacrifice as we have proved in the past. Vicious attacks and slander will not solve the problem.

We ask for a broad and genuine discussion of the problems we are now facing. We demand that a halt be called to the unheard of repression and persecution of the Opposition comrades in the Soviet Union. The bureaucrats cannot and will not tear us away from the ranks of Communism and the working class!

—SYLVIA BLEEKER

the native bourgeoisie leads them into a dispute with the British imperialists which "unleashes the energy of the masses". But so did Kerensky "unleash the energy of the masses". And like him, the Ghandists at the same time fetter the energy of the masses. A genuine unleashing—and proper direction—of the energies of the masses can happen only by fighting as mercilessly against the national bourgeoisie and for the independence of the proletariat (which alone enables it to lead behind it the peasantry) as the Bolsheviks fought against the Kerensky and Menshevik compromisers in 1917. This must be repeated and repeated until it penetrates every fiber of the Indian revolutionists.

It is with comrade Weisbord's proposals on the various groups in the movement that the Left Opposition has its sharpest disagreement. Advocacy of such views by a leading comrades is contrary to all we stand for. "All Communists groups must work together on the basis of the recognition of the Communist character of each group. The Communist 'Majority' group and the Communist League group by working together can help re-establish mass work . . . they can help to separate the Communist movement as a whole from the Mensheviks", etc., etc. This is false from beginning to end.

We recognize the Communist character of the Right wing only insofar as it still groups a number of good Communist workers whom the incompetent Centrist bureaucracy was unable to hold. We contend that the Right wing now occupies a position midway between social democracy (Menshevism) and Communism—not for long, it is true, as is shown by the passage of some of its leading strata directly into the camp of Amsterdam and the international of August 1914. How can we, the Marxist wing of the movement, unite with this semi-Menshevik wing (a bloc which under present conditions would mean a movement directed against the official Communist movement), in order to "separate" the Communist movement as a whole from the Mensheviks? How can a bloc with the Right wing "re-establish mass work", when it is the whole philosophy of the Right wing that has brought the Communist movement into such isolation from the

Stalinist Party Folly in St. Louis

ST. LOUIS—

Since the expulsion of the Opposition, the C.P. has practically ceased to exist in this territory. With the loss of its best members it no longer has any contact with the trade unions. Jealous of Opposition influence in the trade unions the Party finally succeeded by underhanded methods in getting our members expelled from them. In consequence, all militant Left wing elements have been barred from participation in the unions, leaving the field entirely in the hands of bureaucratic reactionaries. Well known militants like MacMillan and Goldberg have been expelled because of these malicious and senseless Party tactics.

Opposition Organizes Unemployed

The Communist Opposition was the first in this territory to organize an Unemployed Council which led a mass demonstration of 1,500 on January 3rd through the business section of St. Louis. The Party was invited to participate but refused on the grounds that they were not the organizers.

Seeing our success and in order not to be outdone, the Party finally organized its own council. The Opposition, knowing their council was in fact nothing but a name, nevertheless, sent delegates asking for a united front of all workers against unemployment. This the Party not only refused but threw our delegates out. Because of this action, the one or two members whom the Party had succeeded in gaining, left and came over to our group.

Remembering our success in demonstrating, the local Stalinists decided to arrange a series of demonstrations of their own. These turned out complete fizzes, each being a bigger failure than its predecessor. The Party speakers, instead of tackling the problem of unemployment turned their meeting into anti-Trotsky meetings, which of course meant nothing to the rank and file unemployed. The workers, disgusted with such tactics, left and are now in our ranks.

After two months of strenuous effort the Party, succeeded with the co-operation of the Opposition, in mustering about 200 demonstrators for the Sacco-Vanzetti protest meeting. The Stalinists, instead of exposing the system which burned Sacco and Vanzetti, turned this meeting also into an anti-Trotsky affair. They also decided to devote their talents to a strenuous attack on the one poor wilted Lovestoneite in the city calling him among other things a social menace and a Sacco-Vanzetti lyncher, much to the amusement of the spectators.

In spite of Party persecution the Opposition goes forward. With the exception of the officials, the rank and file members have been neutralized. This has occurred in spite of the fact that members are expelled when caught talking to Opposition sympathizers or when found attending Opposition meetings.

A case in point is the recent expulsion of the secretary of the Y.C.L., Frank Wall, one of the most active of the League members when caught by Party spies attending Shachtman's lecture. He was summarily "dismissed". It seems that it is no longer necessary to endorse the Opposition platform for expulsion, but expulsions are now in order for members daring to associate with "Trotskyists".

While the Party goes onward in its path of complete isolation, the Opposition grows in membership and influence among rank and file workers. The Left wing militants continue in their task of carrying forward true Communist education, co-operating with all workers, and aiding the sale of the Militant. The Militant now has a larger subscription list in this city than the Daily Worker. The sale of Klorkett also is not smaller than the sale of the Jewish Morning Freiheit. Consequently with the coming of the fall cool weather we expect to make even bigger strides and still more successes.

—H.L.GOLDBERG

Road to Ruin, Not to Victory

Such a policy, combined as it is with comrade Weisbord's entirely false estimate of Centrism (his denial of it, in fact) is the shortest road to destruction for the Left Opposition and a disavowal of its historical function. This is clear from all the experiences of the Opposition in Europe. Our road is not that of Urbahns, Pollack and Paz who only discredited the Opposition and reduced what they controlled to hopeless sects.

* * *

On the basis of his present views on a number of vital questions, the national committee has decided that it cannot accept comrade Weisbord for membership in the League. At the same time it expressed the hope and desire that further reflection and discussion would make it possible for comrade Weisbord to find his place as a fighter—and a valuable one—in the ranks of the Opposition. We have welcomed this discussion and the criticisms made by comrade Weisbord, particularly because it offered the opportunity for a recapitulation of our point of view. At the same time, the national committee decided, in view of Weisbord's closeness to the views of the Opposition, to invite his collaboration in fields of work conforming to his position.

BOOKS - FOR - WORKERS

SINCE LENIN DIED by Max Eastman, Labour Publishing Company, London, 1925, 158 pages.

The fact that this book earned the concentrated scorn of the latter-day Comintern leadership, should immediately interest all Communists suffering under the deluge of "anti-Trotskyite" verbiage distributed in recent years under the guise of Leninism. Aspirants to leadership, in all English-speaking countries, from Rothstein to Browder, finding the thorny path of fight against capitalism not so promising, have turned with enthusiasm to slinging mud at the Russian Opposition and its leader, comrade Trotsky. But the authority of these slanderers of the revolution is shortlived. This book is one of the nails in their political coffin.

Coming fresh from the Thirteenth Party Congress of the Russian Party (May, 1924) and the hysterical campaign leading up to Trotsky's resignation as president of the Revolutionary Military Soviet in January, 1925, Max Eastman was the first to publish the authentic documents of the controversy in English. He was in Russia during the whole development of the fight, witnessed the consolidation of the shady opponents of Leninism under the crafty leadership of the "Triumvirate". The book is valuable to us now because in it are published the original documents, theses, letters and press articles of the period. These documents have already been supplemented, amplified and a thousand times verified in the writings of comrade Trotsky and other leaders of the Russian Opposition. Also by the shamefaced confessions of Zinoviev, Kamenev, etc. when they were no longer of use to Stalin.

Eastman will be remembered for unswerving courage and determination in the face of the solid mass of howling bureaucrats, to speak the truth and prove it. He has the honor of being one of the first to be expelled from the American Party for supporting the Russian Opposition. He certainly was the first to bring the documents and platform of the Russian Opposition out of the "illegality" imposed by Stalin and into the light of day. —CARL COWL

CHINA Manifesto of the International Left Opposition

During the last few months a considerable peasant movement has again appeared in certain provinces of Southern China. Not only the world press of the proletariat, but the press of its enemies as well, is filled with the echoes of this struggle. Deceived, defeated, emasculated, the Chinese revolution still shows that it is alive. Let us hope that the time when it will again lift its proletarian head is not far off. And in order to be ready for this, we must put the problem of the Chinese revolution on the order of the day of the working class of the world.

We, the International Left Communist Opposition (Bolshevik-Leninists) consider it our duty to raise our voices now, in order to attract the attention of all Communists, all advanced, revolutionary workers to the task of liberating the great country of the Asiatic East, and in order to warn them at the same time against the false policy of the leading faction of the Communist International, which obviously threatens to undermine the future Chinese revolution as it ruined the revolution of 1925-27.

The symptoms of the resurrection of the Chinese revolution in the country indicate its inner forces and immense potentialities. But the task is how to transform these potentialities into reality. The first condition of success is to understand what is happening i. e., to give a Marxian definition of the moving forces and to evaluate correctly the stage which the struggle has reached at the present moment. In both these tasks the leadership of the Comintern is wrong.

Is There a Soviet Government?

The Stalinist press is full of communications about a "Soviet Government" established in vast provinces of China under the protection of a Red Army. Workers of various countries are excitedly greeting this news. Of course! The establishment of a Soviet government in a considerable part of China and the creation of a Chinese Red Army would mean a gigantic success for the international revolution. But we must state openly and clearly: It is not yet true.

In spite of the meagerness of the information which reaches us from the vast spaces of China our Marxian understanding of the developing process enables us to reject with complete confidence the Stalinist point of view of the present events. They are false and extremely dangerous for the further development of the revolution.

The history of China has been for centuries a history of menacing uprisings of a destitute and hungry peasantry. Not less than five times in the last two thousand years have the Chinese peasants succeeded in accomplishing a complete redistribution of the landed property. Each time the process of its concentration would begin anew and continue until again the growth of the population produced a partial or general explosion. This vicious circle was an expression of economic and social stagnancy.

Only the inclusion of China in world economy opened new possibilities for the Chinese people. Capitalism invaded China from the outside. The backward Chinese bourgeoisie became an intermediary between foreign capital and the mercilessly exploited masses of their own country. The foreign imperialists together with the Chinese bourgeoisie combine the methods of capitalist exploitation with the methods of feudal oppression and enslavement through usury.

The fundamental idea of the Stalinists has been to transform the Chinese bourgeoisie into a leader of the national revolution against feudalism and imperialism. The consequences of this political strategy ruined the revolution. The Chinese proletariat paid dearly for a knowledge of the Hoover Advises Labor Workers' United Front vs. «Optimistic» Pledges!

President Hoover has given his reply to the needs of the unemployed workers in his speech, at the bankers' convention in Cleveland. With a characteristic genius for insight, he disclosed the fact that what was wrong with many people was . . . the reduction of their incomes. And how had their incomes been reduced. The answer of the Great Engineer is: "The income of a large part of our people is not reduced by the depression but it is affected by unnecessary fears and pessimism, the result of which is to slacken the consumption of goods and discourage enterprise."

It is the proper answer from the highest official representative of the capitalist class to the workers whose wages are being cut and hours of work lengthened, to the unemployed who are starving and being evicted. The reason for the "slackening in the consumption of goods" is that the working class is "affected by unnecessary fears". The workers do not buy food and clothing, they do not—cannot!—pay their rent because . . . they are pessimistic.

Surely, it was worth while electing Hoover to the presidency in order to have this brilliant analysis of the present state of affairs, and get such soothing assurances for a working class driven desperate by the sharpening crisis.

Hoover and Wage Cuts

Hoover's speech to the workers was a campaign speech, made at a time when the Republicans, the "party of prosperity", is being hard pressed by its political opponents. Misery is spreading among the workers and farmers of the country like a prairie fire. The coming winter looks bleak in more than one sense. An intensive wage-cutting campaign is being conducted throughout the land, actively instigated by business men and bankers, passively accepted by the capitalistic labor leaders. At the very same bankers' convention, John W. Barton, president of the national bank division of the American Bankers Association, declared that "the standard of living in America is too high" and advocated carving another pound of flesh from the bodies of the working class.

But this is an important election year, so Hoover, with the arch-hypocrisy of an Uriah Heep, "emphatically disagreed". But what is Hoover doing to call a halt to the wage-cutting drive? Not a thing. And for cause, since he is the chairman of the capitalist class executive committee in Washington, the menial of the bankers and business men. All the "solemn pledges to maintain wage standards" have dissolved before the offensive of the bosses. No less loyal a footman of American capitalism than William Green of the A.F. of L. must publicly "regret" the increasing wage cuts, which, according to his excessively moderate figures, affected 24,700 workers in August "and cuts averaged 10.5 percent—the highest yet".

The same question can be put to Green as to Hoover. The answer is that this lackey without livery is working in the labor movement with might and main to prevent or crush the spirit of resistance rising among the workers. The Greens serve the masters of the land as effectively as the Hoovers—each in their own allotted way.

Two Servitors of Capitalism

Green denounces the Communists, organizes pogroms against them in the trade unions, serves as informer against them to the courts of capitalism. Hoover speaks to the bankers in Cleveland on the "depression", while victims of this "depression" demonstrating in the streets for bread or work, are clubbed and bombed by Hoover's police. French royalty sarcastically told the people to eat cake if they could buy no bread. Hoover tells the people to be courageous and optimistic while they are on the rack of unemployment.

It is correct—but not as Hoover means it. The workers need to be bold and confident—bold enough to act decisively and confident that united action will bring them relief from the torments of the crisis. Why are the workers embittered but passive today? Why do they not enter in masses into open struggle against the masters of industry and finance? Because they fear defeats which disunity, and lack of organization and leadership bring in their train. The pressure of the crisis is driving tens and hundreds of thousands to the ideas and moods of struggle. What is imperatively required is a leadership that will give the movement a head and direct its energies profitably. Such a leadership properly belongs to the Communists, who alone represent the present and future of labor. But the Communists will establish themselves as leaders of the masses only if they can convince the masses of non-Communist workers that they are fighting for one militant line of struggle—FOR THE UNITED FRONT!

The United Labor Front

The slogan for the united front of labor to resist the offensive of the capitalists and ameliorate the lot of the jobless, combined with a minimum program of demands for which the workers can fight (and not merely cast a vote for in November)—that is the need of the moment. That is what will set masses of workers into motion under the guidance of class conscious and far-sighted leaders. But it is precisely here that the leadership of the Communist Party has failed so miserably. Their stubborn, gross mistakes, their piling of blunder upon blunder, their capers and lunges from frigid sectarianism to the open opportunism in the election campaign—in a word, the overbrimming cup of the "third period"—threaten to lose an unprecedented opportunity for the Communist movement.

The Browders, Bedachts, Hathaways and all the lesser Harrison Georges are dealing blow after blow at the very vitals of the movement under the impulsion of the international Stalinist machine which has tossed them to the surface for a brief moment. The Communist workers in the ranks—within and outside the Party—must ward off these blows. The quicker this is done and the whole camaraderie of Stalinist leaders put where they properly belong the quicker the Communist movement is restored, the quicker the working class will be mobilized to fight in united ranks.

Boris Selinitchenko

The editors of the "Bulletin of the Russian Opposition" inform us:

The Bolshevik-Leninist, comrade Selinitchenko had been confined in exile at Samarkand, where he was taken ill with tuberculosis of the larynx. His health grew worse every day. As his condition grew worse, instead of taking him to a more favorable climatic environment, the Stalinists took him to the city of Osch. Osch lies in the Kirgis Steppes, far from the railroad, without the slightest possibility of any kind of clinical treatment. After the arrival of comrade Selinitchenko, the Oppositionists exiled there applied in a series of telegrams to the Central Committee and Central Control Commission of the Party, and to the G.P.U., and requested the transference of comrade Selinitchenko to other climatic conditions and pointed out that an inevitable and swift ruin threatened him in Osch. No reply was received. So the Osch exiles decided to get comrade Selinitchenko to Tashkent on their own hook, in spite of the fact that the G.P.U. could hold them responsible for "flight". Placed before an accomplished fact, the G.P.U. was compelled to transfer comrade Selinitchenko from Tashkent to the Crimea. Here, however a new series of sufferings began for the steadfast Bolshevik: free treatment was refused him, etc. The Stalinist G.P.U. has attained its aim: comrade Selinitchenko could not even last a few weeks in the Crimea, and went under.

Danville Workers Out on Strike

A few thousand textile workers have gone out on strike in Danville, Va., under the auspices of the United Textile Workers. Elizabethton, Ware Shoals, Marion and other places where the "progressive" U.T.W. has led strikes are sufficient indication of where they intend to end up with the Danville strike. Because of that, the question must be asked:

What has happened to the National Textile Workers Union? Since the recent strike in Bessemer City, N.C., which the Daily Worker proudly heralded with an eight column streamer as being led by the N.T.W., only to turn around 24 hours later and admit its leadership by men who were opposed to that union, things have been strangely quiet. In fact, since the Bessemer City episode where the N.T.W. organizers were virtually run out of town, the Left wing union has not been conducting any activity whatsoever. This is in distinct contrast to the increasing influence of the United Textile Workers Union throughout the South, which has led to the present Danville situation.

In the South there is now practically no N.T.W.U. left. Only an isolated supporter can be found here and there. In the rest of the textile centers practically the same condition can be found. The only cities in which any semblance of an organization is functioning is in New Bedford, Mass. and Paterson, N.J.

In New Bedford where at one time thousands of textile workers rallied under the banner of the N.T.W.U. today not much more than 200 are to be found in the organization. In Paterson even a smaller group is functioning. Everywhere else where the N.T.W.U. was developing strength and in the past had some measure of success all semblance of a union has disappeared. This includes Fall River, Mass., Passaic, N.J. and Bethlehem and Allentown, Pa.

End the Stalinist stranglehold of the N.T.W.U.! Stop the exaggeration policy and deliberate lying, of which the Bessemer City strike is only one of many cases! Allow non-supporters of the Browder machine to participate in the union work! Conduct a real broad united organization campaign to enroll the workers in the N.T.W.U.!

A Concrete Program for Organizing the Unemployed

On August 14th, the Daily Worker carried an article by Jack Johnstone. The article begins: "What are workers to do when they are hungry, are being evicted from their homes, are out of a job, and can't find anything to do? This question is one that is being asked by tens of thousands . . ."

And what is Johnstone's answer? In effect it is: "Come to the mass meeting in Union Square, September 1st, 12 o'clock sharp."

But suppose the workers say, "We have demonstrated already for almost a year, before March 6th, on March 6th, on May 1st, on July 6th, on August 1st, etc. Is this all you have to offer us? Is there no practical program? What are we to do when we are hungry? When we are being evicted from our homes? When we are out of a job?"

This is surely what the workers will say. They are saying it now: March 6th—75,000, May 1st—30,000, August 1st—10,000 etc. They have been saying it with their feet!

It is up to every honest and serious Communist to understand that the Party leaders are politically bankrupt. We must unite all forces to the end that a real unemployment program is worked out and carried out. The question asked by the workers must be answered!

Unemployment to Become More Serious

The unemployment question will become more acute than ever this coming fall and winter. The world economic situation will grow worse. The home situation will grow worse. The industrial crisis will sharpen and will add to it a deepened agrarian crisis. The unemployment question must become the principal question of the day. It can become the lever for the organization of the unorganized for the building of a Labor Party, for mobilizing the greatest mass of workers around the Communists. It is indeed that link in the chain of events which the Communists must seize to move the whole chain forward.

The Communist object in the unemployment movement must be 1. The mobilization of the widest layers of the population, above all, of course, and mainly, of the working class 2. The revolutionization and activation of these sections and the development of leadership from their ranks. To win the widest strata, we must connect the unemployed with the employed, and throw the family as a whole into the struggle.

The line of the Party has been just the opposite in effect—to isolate the working class from the rest of the population, to isolate the advanced workers from their reserves, to isolate the unemployed from the employed, to isolate the vanguard from the unemployed, to place the workers in an impossible fighting position.

If the difficulties of work are extraordinary, due to the mobility of unemployed labor, to the systems of intermittent and part-time work, etc., these difficulties are more than counterbalanced by far by the wonderful opportunities for work.

How shall we begin the work of actually organizing the unemployed? The first problem is the problem of reaching the unemployed masses of which the primary basic principle is that we must go to the masses and not expect them to come to us. But how is this to be done? The proletarian quarters of the city must be carefully mapped out. In a larger city there will be several such quarters, very often built around some large factory or several of them. Each quarter contains a number of blocks. The block organization must be the basic unit. Leaflets should be given out from flat to flat, from tenement to tenement, first with general propaganda on the unemployment question and then announcing a series of meetings. These meetings should be held where possible, outdoors, block by block of the whole district being systematically covered. Through these meetings and through the systematic distribution of leaflets, all the unemployed in a given block can be registered and the main bulk organized in a block council with its own leaders and executives, meeting regularly in the block, carrying out a uniform policy and preparing for action.

How the Party is Working

Let us stop here briefly to contrast our position with what has been done by the Party officials.

1. The first difference is that instead of "showy" haphazard work there is systematic responsible work. For years, for example, Amter dabbled with unemployment work in Cleveland. With what results? When the Party reviewed its work after March 6th, it declared the situation in Cleveland disgraceful, that there was not even a council organized. Another example, was there any serious estimation of the organization problems set forth by the "organizer" Johnstone at the July 4th conference in Chicago?

2. The second difference is that we go to the masses, not await their coming to us. How were the so-called "unemployment councils" built up throughout the country by the Party? Let us take a typical case—Newark, New Jersey. There the Party is relatively small and weak. It has little money and poor guidance. (In a few months it had 4 different paid section organizers between spells of having none at all.) A few dollars are raised and spent on leaflets. A meeting is announced in their own hall. First a hundred or so workers come, then two hundred, then four hundred and the hall is packed to the doors.

But already the workers begin to feel disappointed. At every meeting the same wordy phrases are passed out. The workers begin to ask "What are we to do when we are hungry, are being evicted from our homes, are out of a job?" "Come to the next meeting!" is the answer. No practical plans are set at the meeting. Party members alone control. No one is elected on an executive. No discussion of local problems. No non-Party leaders developed. The original enthusiasm begins to cool a bit. Then comes a police raid. The few leading Party members are arrested. The attendance rapidly falls off. Detectives stand in the hall, forming a cordon through which workers, one by one, must pass. Police agents in the hall openly cast their shadow of terror over the meeting.

Is it any wonder that after March 6th everything melted away? Could anything be more amateurish? The workers say the Communists mean well but they are a bunch of empty-headed impractical persons who like to talk.

Let us take the Party figures on unemployment that one person is out of work for every 15 people. Newark is a city, roughly of 450,000 population. This would mean at least 30,000 out of work. The Party then asked these 30,000 to come to a hall holding normally 300 people. There is no hall in Newark that could hold 30,000 people nor can the Party afford to hire any larger one than what they had. But to the workers the situation was very clear. In reality what the Party was doing was exposing its vanguard troops to the withering fire of the enemy in the most foolish manner. The workers knew that and either never came around or withdrew. Only the foolish Communist Party "leaders" did not know this. In reality the Party was keeping out thousands of workers eager to join the movement, and was condemning those who came, to isolation. In reality the Party was stifling the movement!

The Basis for Unemployment Work

3. The third difference is that with us, the basis for unemployment work is the proletarian quarter of the city, not the factory gate, not the meeting "downtown", or speeches at "bread lines".

Wrong and Right Tactics in the Unemployment Movement

The unemployment situation in this period of depression following the period of overproduction and crisis of American capitalism brings forth a problem of greater magnitude than the unemployment accompanying the classical crisis of capitalism in its growth stage. A permanent army of unemployed due to the machine development and rationalization, aggravated by the crisis, swelling the numbers of the unemployed to over seven millions. Unemployment is the most pressing immediate problem of the American workers and every class conscious organization, reform group and the capitalist vanguard is vitally concerned with its solution; the working class with one aim and the capitalist class with the opposite aim.

The aim of the workers vanguard is to utilize this issue to strengthen the position of the working class and consolidate the ideological change taking place in the ranks of the workers. The aim of the capitalist class is to stem the tide, throw out enough crumbs to prevent this ideological crystallization and maintain their tottering equilibrium a little longer.

Not only can the two main contending classes use this issue to strengthen their position but the reformist and revolutionary wings of the working class movement are now in battle for a position in the American working class which will be an important victory in the immediate future and a big factor in determining the strength and duration of reformism in America. Therefore, tactics not only against the capitalist but especially against the reformist wing are vital problems in the unemployment activity of the revolutionary movement.

The Program of the Official Party

All the class conscious organizations are reaping some benefit from the favorable objective situation in spite of the fact that none of them has a concrete program for unemployment. The Communist Party, as the main organized force of these organizations, has done the most in this field and has a concrete program. But what kind of a concrete program, is another question.

Parties that only present an abstract program for the unemployed cannot be criticized in the same light the Communist Party must be. The Party at least attempts to solve the problem. It is its "Third Period" antics and non-Marxian analysis that causes all the trouble.

When the crisis began the Party issued the slogan of "Work or Wages". After the 7th Convention, when the crisis has deepened and is going deeper it shifted the emphasis to the Social Insurance Bill. The political analysis of the Party informs us, through the 7th Convention thesis, that we are in a period of revolutionary upsurge in America and yet this seventh convention gave birth to the Social Insurance BILL as the main activity in a period of "revolutionary upsurge".

The struggle for social insurance and the unemployment councils are elementary activities to mobilize all workers possible in order to use this mass against capitalism today and to win the most advanced section of this mass to our Party. The "revolutionary unions" of the T.U.U.L. on the other hand, represent the most advanced section. To tie the unemployed councils organizationally to the tail of the T.U.U.L., is to cut off our advance. The Party must be the driving force and the T.U.U.L. must be the most active factor for organizing these unemployed but to apply the separate front in place of the united front, and mechanical control in place of control through Marxian policy, is fundamentally wrong.

The "Social Insurance Bill"

A struggle for social insurance is correct, but to direct our main energy in this field in the manner of the Party, means creating parliamentary illusions. Communist participation in elections does not guarantee revolutionary political action instead of parliamentary action. A struggle for social insurance does not mean the main weight should be placed on a BILL, on the contrary the main emphasis should be placed on the industrial end with proper political coordination. This would easily enable us to draw a clear line of demarcation between our struggle for social insurance and that of the reformist and capitalist but at present the only distinction the Party speakers can find to prove that our bill is "revolutionary" is that we advocate $25.00 and they advocate $5.00. To compare our bill with "Roosevelt's Bill" in order to denote the revolutionary content of our social insurance struggle is another step in the swamp.

A struggle against unemployment must have the main emphasis on the field of struggle rather than in Congress and this activity (trade union, unemployment councils, shop committees, mass literature distribution of elementary educational value) should be coordinated with the parliamentary (elections, etc.) in order to strengthen our entire activity instead of arming the "industrial actionist" on the one hand and the reformist on the other by stressing a Congressional BILL.

The United Front

This struggle against unemployment of millions of workers who are just becoming class conscious, with only a small section of this ideology crystallized, cannot be even started unless the Leninist UNITED FRONT is applied. The Party started at the beginning of the crisis with pure separate fronts and after the convention only gave lip service to the united front in a couple of half-hearted articles in the Daily Worker and Labor Unity. A united front with all the organizations of the workers, will enable us to gain and to expose the reformist. The reformist and trade union fakery have made this a big issue and our tactics are strengthening them. We need tactics that will strip these fakery before the eyes of the workers proving that their fight for unemployment is in name only.

The struggle for shorter hours is more important in content than a struggle for a social insurance bill. The main emphasis must fall on shorter hours. Such a struggle, like the 1830 struggle for the ten hour day and the 1886 struggle for the eight hour day are political struggles of basic working class content which is the distinction between revolutionary political action and "pure" parliamentary action. Not the slogan for the seven hour day but the slogan for the 6 hour day and five day week is what is needed.

Abstract propaganda for the Soviet Union means nothing to the average American worker who is separating himself from the capitalist and reformist. The sympathizer of the movement will be patient with any amount you give him, but we cannot base our propaganda on the circle we have already won. The slogan demanding credits to the Soviet Union is a concrete method of gaining the support of the workers. In the basic industries, those which produce the means of production which the Soviet Union needs and is buying, is where we can come to the American worker with a "Soviet issue" that means more than abstract support through convictions of a few based on scientific understanding. The approach should be through the bread and butter angle. It will tear down the walls of prejudice to enable us to present a scientific understanding to unbiased minds. And one may mention that credits to the Soviet Union is a burning issue with the plan of socialist construction.

The depression is growing deeper and this winter the conditions of the workers will be worse. Defensive struggle will reach a higher plane. There is still time for the Party and the revolutionary forces really to work out a concrete program of action for the unemployment situation and for the Party to shift from its reformist tendencies of main emphasis on a BILL to revolutionary political action.

How Do the Cutters Stand?

By ALBERT ORLAND

In the Militant, Number 29, in his article on the last convention of the A.C.W. in Toronto, comrade Schneider wrote about the fight between the Beckerman and the Hillman cliques and the compromise reached by them at that convention to divide the spoils in the New York organization and continue to keep the members in submission. To have a better understanding of the situation in the New York organization and the importance of the Toronto convention it is necessary to have some knowledge of the character and functions of the Cutters Union, Local "Big Four", A.C.W.A. For in the fights between the cliques in the New York Amalgamated organization in the last few years this local has played an important part and on the developments in the Cutters' Local depends much of the future of the Amalgamated in New York.

Local 4 has always been considered the strongest post of the A.C.W. in New York. Due to the specific conditions under which the cutters work, they have been a sort of aristocratic caste in the ranks of the clothing workers, particularly in New York, unlike the clothing workers here.

Working directly for the manufacturers in separate cutting rooms, isolated from the tailors who make up the garments in the shops of the contractors the cutters have occupied a position more advantageous than that of the rest of the workers in the industry. The cutters have consequently been easily influenced by the craft ideology of the leadership of the old United Garment Workers as well as of the present A.C.W. leadership. The cutters union has maintained its local autonomy under the A.C.W. Its affiliation with the New York Joint Board has been almost on the lines of a fraternal organization and its co-operation of a voluntary character.

The peculiar position of the Cutters Local has been responsible to a large degree for the demoralization and the sufferings of the thousands of clothing workers in New York. Holding the key position to the New York organization, Local 4 has been the decisive factor in the struggles between the union and the bosses and also a strategic post for all political machinations of the cliques and factions in the union. In the years when the A.C.W. was a militant union, the cutters local was the vanguard of the clothing workers and contributed the greater share to the improvement of their conditions in the shops and the building of the union.

Today the Cutters Union, while it has maintained many of the gains of the previous period so far as conditions go, is looked upon as the bulwark of reaction in the A.C.W. This reputation of Local 4 is due to the role it has played in recent years in Hillman's campaign of "efficiency-unionizing" the New York Clothing market.

Local 4 has been the chief instrument in Hillman's hands for breaking the resistance of the tailors against standards of production, the introduction of piecework and finally the crushing of the Left wing.

Each victory over the tailors in New York was achieved by the help of the Cutters' corrupt officials who in addition to the strategic position they have occupied in the organization have also, through their connections with the strong arm guard, been best qualified for that job.

Who does not remember the infamous Beckerman campaign of forcing piece-work on the tailors and his blackjacking of the Left wing? And Beckerman as the evil link between the cutters union and the New York organization has contributed most to wrecking the morale and the solidarity and making the job of betrayal of the tailors so much easier for themselves. In the above mentioned campaign of Hillman and Beckerman against the tailors, the cutters stood aloof, thereby sanctioning all the disgraceful acts of their officials.

But in all the bargains between Hillman and his agents, the Cutters union officials, the membership of the local has been the loser. The privileges of the cutters have been gradually lost, their conditions worsened, and due to the general disruption of the A.C.W. organization in New York, they are today as helpless as the rest of the workers in the industry. The speed-up in the shops, the temporary job system which serves as a means of supplying cheap and efficient labor to the bosses and keeping the workers divided, have demoralized the membership and thrown hundreds of them into the streets.

The intolerable regime in the local, the irresponsibility of the officials, the tramping upon the elementary rights of the membership, the espionage system and the economic terror have destroyed the activity and broken the resistance of the rank and file of the membership. These are the results of the machinations of the A.C.W. officialdom in the strongest local in New York.

The Cutters local has faithfully performed its service as an instrument in Hillman's hands to force "efficiency-unionism" on the tailors. It now comes next in order to be whipped into line with the rest of the clothing workers. The cutters will not escape the fate prescribed for them by Hillman and the clothing bosses.

What did the Toronto convention accomplish for Hillman and what will be its results for the cutters? This convention completed a chapter in the history of Hillman's "efficiency-unionizing" of the New York market. In this chapter, the cutters local had written not a few important pages and its future can already be forecast.

The cutters local is already being placed under Hillman's control. The local officials are gradually submitting to his Wipe Hooliganism Out of the Movement!

Those who imagine that the Stalinists have given up their tactics of violent physical attacks upon ideological opponents within the working class, like the disruption of public meetings, are laboring under a misapprehension. The only change in the tactics has been that the Daily Worker is more careful than it was about boasting of the bureaucratic gangsterism. In reality, however, it continues in just as dastardly a manner as when it was first begun by the Lovestone faction against the meetings of the Left Opposition. The most recent case in point is the disruption of the New York I.W.W. street meeting at University Place and 14th Street, a couple of Wednesdays ago.

The I.W.W. has been holding its meeting on that corner for sometime, every Wednesday night. Recently, some Party members have been instructed to cultivate the habit of attending these meetings not for the purpose of discussing respective points of view, but of deliberately provoking battles. Two weeks ago, this contemptible procedure reached its peak. Surrounding the meeting at which a handful of I.W.W. was present, some 150 to 200 Party members worked up to a pitch of incitement that ended with a physical assault upon the I.W.W. members who were greatly outnumbered. As usual, the Stalinists were equipped with blackjacks and similar persuasive instruments. In spite of the odds, the I.W.W. courageously and successfully routed the hoodlums even before the police came on the scene. Needless to say that the meeting was then dispersed.

Some time later, at 10th Street and 2nd Avenue, where a Party meeting was in process, Herbert Mahler, a local I.W.W. member, started to ask Engdahl, the Party speaker who had just mentioned the Party fight for free speech, why the Party sought to prevent the Wobblies from speaking freely. A gang of Party members immediately set upon Mahler and his companions. Bulls and cops came on the scene in a moment, and one of the former was kicked, while beating a prostrate I.W.W. with his fist. Mahler, Kolescar and a few other I.W.W. were then arrested! In the patrol wagon, Mahler was unmercifully slugged by the dicks so that he bled profusely. Kolescar, a slight worker, had two of his teeth knocked out. Both he and Mahle are being held for trial now on charges of "felonious assault".

So much for the upshot of this sample of Stalinist gangsterism!

Significantly enough, the Stalinists who organized and led the rioting were almost exclusively young comrades in the movement, with perhaps a year or six months of membership. They have apparently been taught by the Party leadership that Bolshevism is synonymous with . . . violence. While the Beckerman forces have been split, the administration of local 4 is forced to divide power with the Hillman forces in the local. These combined forces have already shown their strength in the local by a recent victory over the membership in doubling the amount of membership dues in the local. In what grip the membership will soon find itself is not difficult to imagine.

These are the net results of the Toronto Convention for the Hillman leadership. The New York market is nearing the final stage of being completely "efficiency-unionized" for the benefit of Hillman's "higher union strategy". As to the clothing workers—their history is still to be written.

Where is the Left Wing in the Local?

To fix the blame for not having a strong Left wing group in the cutters union entirely on the politicians of the "third period", as comrade Schneider does in the case of the other locals would not be entirely correct, neither would it be just. In the specific conditions of the cutters union the absence of an outspoken Left wing group in the present period of general reaction is hardly surprising. Unlike the other branches of the A.C.W., the cutters local still enjoys some union conditions, like the week-work system and the lence. They do not seem to know that during the history of the struggle between Bolsheviks, S.R.s and Narodniki in czarist Russia, a struggle that reached the bitterest points at times, there was never a single, solitary instance of one of the groups in the revolutionary movement organizing a gang for the deliberate purpose of disrupting the meeting of another group. Heckling, questioning and similar means of discussion were frequent occurrences, but never the fanatical hoodlumery that is the crowning contribution of Stalinism to the revolutionary movement.

As comrade Trotsky has so poignantly expressed it, the Stalinists try to make up for their impotence in the face of the bourgeois state by physical domineering over and attacks upon non-Stalinist groups in the movement; they substitute for an appeal to the workers brains, a club on the workers' heads. These methods disgrace the movement as a whole. We branded them vitriolically when Lewis Sigman, Hillman and Co. introduced them in the trade unions. We have no less condemnation for them when they are introduced in the name of a Stalinist neo-Communism.

The workers everywhere will be aiding the cause if labor by shouting their hostility to these reactionary methods against adversaries in the movement. The worker in the official Party, in whom the revolutionary spirit has not been extinguished by the senseless marionettes who occupy the high posts, will do an incalculable service to the Communist movement too by standing up and raising his voice in protest against these degrading tactics. He will find a ready echo from the hearts, if not the lips, of hundreds of others.

At the formal opening of the two classes, to which all friends are invited, comrades Cannon and Weisbord will outline and introduce their courses. Workers, wishing to join either or both of the classes can do so at this meeting.

minimum wage, and their disposition is in general less revolutionary than that of the tailors. But their discontent has been continually growing under the intolerable regime of the local, and with a correct policy the Left wing could establish a good base there.

But the zig-zag tactics of the T.U.U.L. and previously the T.U.E.L. that have followed like a weathercock the official winds of the Communist International have had their disastrous results here as everywhere else. The swift alterations between the united fronts at all costs and the holler-than-thou attitudes of the "third period" apostles have so confused the rank and file that no organized Left wing movement is to be found in the A.C.W.A. The existence of a Left wing there is not at all desired by the official Communist Party, and any attempt to organize a Left wing in the A.C.W.A. is met with fierce opposition by the Stalinists.

According to the "third period" policy activation of the membership of the old unions is branded as reformism. Participation in these is considered a sort of "necessary evil" and permitted only with the object of exposing the reactionary officialdom and recruiting members for the revolutionary union under the leadership of the T.U.U.L. This policy is of course based on the theory that the workers in the reactionary unions have already been radicalized and are ready on short notice of the T.U.U.L. agents to leave the old unions and join the revolutionary ones. All that is necessary is just to stage a few exposures of social-fascists there at their meetings. No pressure, however, should be used on the officials to show in concrete cases of struggle just where they stand on questions affecting the interests of the workers for fear that this may create illusions among the workers that the old unions can be reformed. Here is how this policy is expressed in the Daily Worker, August 19th editorial:

"It is not our duty to desert the A.F. of L. and leave the members of these union under the leadership of the bosses' agents to be utilized against the interests of the workers. On the contrary revolutionary workers must carry on their activities within the A.F. of L., not with the Lovestonian conception of forcing the leaders to fight, but with the revolutionary conception of winning the leadership of these workers for the building of revolutionary trade unions which alone can successfully fight for the economic demands of the workers."

This policy is a complete refutation of the Leninist conception of working within the old unions. To believe that the workers will get radicalized under the influence of a few speeches exposing the reactionary leadership and not by organized pressure on this leadership to show their color in action condemns the work in the unions to futility. The result of such a policy can only be the isolation of the revolutionary element from the bulk of the membership still under the influence of the reactionary leadership and the strengthening of the later's position in the unions. The reactionary officials, relieved of the pressure of an organized opposition, have a free hand to carry on their work of betrayal and can only be thankful for such a policy.

In reciprocation for this policy, which is a real service rendered them by the Left wing, they are obligingly taking careful pains to relieve the "third period" Left wingers of the effects of the "necessary evil"—of the participation at union meetings entirely, by either expelling them or gradually doing away with union meetings, thereby also saving the reactionary unions and themselves from exposure. That this always means strengthening the revolutionary unions is hard to say but it should mean that to "right-thinking" Communists anyway. However, the immediate effect of the new policy is this amazing reciprocity between the reactionaries and the "third period" revolutionists which, though not pre-arranged or even intended, is nevertheless logical and unavoidable under the application of the new policy.

It remains entirely for the Left Communist Opposition to undertake the rebuilding of the Left wing movement in the A.C.W.A. as well as in the other unions where the Left wing has been wrecked. The rank and file of the membership will respond to a call to action by a responsible and constructive Left wing organization.

(Coming articles by comrade Orland will deal with the concrete conditions of the cutters at present, and with other sections of the men's garment industry, and the problems of the Left wing.—Ed.)

The above-mentioned unfavorable balance of the October revolution for the village is, of course, temporary and transitory. The principal significance of the October revolution for the peasant lies in the fact that it created the pre-conditions for the socialist reconstruction of agriculture. But this is a matter of the future. In 1927, collectivization was still completely tabooed. So far as "complete" collectivization is concerned, nobody even thought of it. Stalin however, includes it in his considerations after the fact. "Now, after the intensified development of the collectivization movement"—our theoretician transplants into the past what lies ahead in the future—"the peasants are able . . . to produce a lot more than before with the same expenditure of labor". And after this, once more: "How can one say, after all this (!) that the October revolution did not bring any gain to the peasant? Is it not clear that people saying such nonsense are obviously telling lies about the Party and the Soviet power?" The reference to "nonsense" and "lies" is quite in place here, as may be seen. Yes, some people "are obviously telling lies" about chronology and common sense.

Stalin as we see, makes his "nonsense" more profound by depicting matters as if the Opposition not only exaggerated the February revolution at the expense of the October, but even for the future refused the latter the capacity for improving the conditions of the peasant. For what fools, may we ask, is this intended? We beg the pardon of the honorable professor Pokrovsky!

The Aim of the Opposition

Incessantly advancing, since 1923, the problem of the economic scissors of the city and village, the Opposition pursued a quite definite aim, now incontestable by anyone: To compel the bureaucracy to understand that the struggle against the danger of disunity can be conducted now with sugary slogans like "Face to the village", etc., but through: a) faster tempo of industrial development; and b) energetic collectivization of peasant economy. In other words, the problem of the scissors as well as the problem of the peasants' balance of the October revolution was advanced by us not in order to "discredit" the October revolution—what is the very "terminology" worth!—but in order to compel the self-contented and conservative bureaucracy by the whip of the Opposition to utilize those immeasurable economic possibilities which the October revolution opened up to the country.

To the official kulak-bureaucratic course of 1923-1928, which had its expression in the every day legislative and administrative work, in the new theory, and above all, in the persecution of the Opposition, the latter opposed, from 1923 on, a course towards an accelerated industrialization, and from 1927 on, after the first successes of industry, the mechanization and collectivization of agriculture.

Let us once more recall that the Opposition platform which Stalin conceals, but from which he fetches in bits all of his wisdom, declares: "The growth of private proprietorship in the village must be offset by a more rapid development of collective farming. It is necessary systematically and from year to year to subsidize the efforts of the poor peasants to organize in collectives." (Page 68, English edition). "A much larger sum ought to be appropriated for the creation of Soviet and collective farms. Maximum indulgences must be accorded to the newly organized collective farms and other forms of collectivization. People deprived of elective rights cannot be members of the collective estates. The whole work of the cooperatives ought to be penetrated with a sense of the problem of transforming small-scale production into large-scale collective production. The work of the land distribution must be carried on wholly at the expense of the state, and the first thing to be taken care of must be the collective farms and the farms of the poor, with a maximum protection of their interests." (Page 71.)

If the bureaucracy had not vacillated under the pressure of the petty bourgeoisie, but had executed the program of the Opposition since 1923, not only the proletarian but also the peasant balance of the revolution would be of an infinitely more favorable nature.

The Problem of the «Scissors»

The problem of the "smychka" (alliance) is the problem of the mutual relations between city and village. It is composed of two parts, or, more correctly, can be regarded from two angles: a) the mutual relationship between industry and agriculture; b) the mutual relationship between the proletariat and the peasantry. On the basis of the market, these relations, assuming the form of commodity exchange, find their expression in the price movement. The harmony between the prices of bread, cotton, beets and so forth on the one hand and calico, kerosene, plows and so forth on the other hand, is the decisive index for evaluating the mutual relations between the city and the village, of industry and agriculture, between workers and peasants. The problem of the "scissors" of industrial and agricultural prices therefore remains, for the present period as well, the most important economic and social problem of the whole Soviet system. Now how did the price scissors change between the last two congresses, that is, in the last two and a half years? Did they close, or, on the contrary, did they widen?

We look in vain for a reply to this central question in the ten hour report of Stalin to the Congress. Presenting piles of departmental figures, making a bureaucratic reference book out of the principal report, Stalin did not even attempt a Marxist generalization of the isolated and, by him, thoroughly undigested data given to him by the commissariats, secretariats and other offices.

Are the scissors of industrial and agricultural prices closing? In other words, is the balance of the socialist revolution, as yet passive for the peasant, being reduced? In the market conditions—and we have not yet liberated ourselves from them, and will not for a long time to come—the closing or widening of the scissors is of decisive significance for an evaluation of the successes accomplished and for checking up on the correctness or incorrectness of economic plans and methods. That there is not a word about it in Stalin's report is of itself an extremely alarming fact. Were the scissors closing, there would be plenty of specialists in Mikoyan's department who would, without difficulty, give this process statistical and graphic expression. Stalin would only have to demonstrate the diagram, that is, show the Congress a scissors which would prove that the blades are closing. The whole economic section of the report would find its axis, but unfortunately this axis is not there. Stalin avoided the problem of the scissors.

The domestic scissors is not the final index. There is another, a "higher" one: the scissors of domestic and international prices. They measure the productivity of labor in Soviet economy with the productivity of labor in the world capitalist market. We received from the past, in this sphere as well as in others, an enormous heritage of backwardness. In practice, the task for the next few years is not immediately to "catch up with and outstrip"—we are unfortunately still very far from this!—but planfully to close the scissors between domestic and world prices, which can be accomplished only through systematically approximating the labor productivity in the U.S.S.R. to the labor productivity in the advanced capitalist countries. This in turn requires not statistically-minimum but economically-favorable plans. The oftener the bureaucrats repeat the bold formula "to catch up with and outstrip", the more stubbornly they ignore exact comparative coefficients of socialist and capitalist industry or, in other words, the problem of the scissors of domestic and world prices. And on this question also not a word is to be found in Stalin's report. The problem of the domestic scissors could have been considered liquidated only under the conditions of the actual liquidation of the market. The problem of the foreign scissors—with the liquidation of world capitalism. Stalin, as we know, was preparing, at the time of his agricultural report to send the N.E.P. "to the devil". But he changed his mind within the six months that elapsed. As is always the case with him, his unaccomplished intention to liquidate the N.E.P. is attributed by him in his report to the Congress to the "Trotskysts". The white and yellow threads of this operation are so indiscreetly exposed that the report of this part of the speech does not dare to record the slightest applause.

What happened to Stalin with regard to the market and the N.E.P. is what usually happens to empiricists. The sharp turn that took place in his own mind under the influence of external pressure, he took for a radical change in the whole situation. Once the bureaucracy decided to enter into a final conflict with the market and the Kulak instead of its passive adaptation to them, then statistics and economy could consider them non-existent. Empiricism is most frequently the pre-condition for subjectivism, and if it is bureaucratic empiricism, it inevitably becomes the pre-condition for periodic "turns". The art of the "general" leadership consists in this case of converting the turns into smaller turns and distributing them equally among the helots called executors. If, at the end, the general turn is attributed to "Troskyism", then the problem is settled. But this is not the point. The essence of the N.E.P., regardless of the sharp change in the "essence" of Stalin's thoughts about it lies as before in the determination by the market of the economic inter-relationships between the city and village. If the N.E.P. remains then the scissors of agricultural and industrial prices remain the most important criterion of the whole economic policy.

A «Bourgeois Prejudice»

However, half a year before the Congress, we heard Stalin call the theory of the scissors a "bourgeois prejudice". This is the simplest way out of the situation. If you tell a village quack that the temperature curve is one of the most important indices to the health or illness of an organism, he will hardly believe you. But if he grasps some sage words and, to make matters worse, learns to present his quackery as "proletarian medicine", he will most certainly say that a thermometer is a bourgeois prejudice. If this quack has power in his hands he will, to avoid a scandal, smash the thermometer over a stone or, what is still worse, over somebody's head. In 1925, the differentiation within the Soviet peasantry was declared to be a prejudice of panic-mongers. Yakovlev was sent to the central statistical department, from which he took away all the Marxist thermometers to be destroyed. But unfortunately, the changes in temperature do not cease when there are no thermometers. But for that, the appearance of hidden organic processes takes the healers and those being healed unawares. This is what happened in the grain strike of the Kulak, who unexpectedly appeared as the leading figure in the village and compelled Stalin, on February 15, 1928 (see Pravda of that date) to make a turn of 180 degrees. The price thermometer is of no less significance than the thermometer of differentiation within the peasantry. After the Twelfth Party Congress, where the term "scissors" was first used and explained, everybody began to understand its significance. In the three years that followed, the scissors were invariably demonstrated at the Plenums of the Central Committee, at Conferences and Congresses, as precisely the basic curve of the economic temperature of the country. But afterwards, they gradually began to disappear from usage, and finally, at the end of 1929, Stalin declared them to be . . . "a bourgeois prejudice". Because the thermometer was smashed in time, Stalin had no reason to present the Sixteenth Congress of the Party with the curve of economic temperature. Marxist theory is the weapon of thought serving to clarify what has been, what is becoming, and what lies ahead, and for the determination of what is to be done. Stalin's theory is the servant of bureaucracy. It serves to justify zig-zags after the event, to conceal yesterday's mistakes and consequently to prepare tomorrow's. The silence over the scissors occupies the central place in Stalin's report. This may appear paradoxical, because silence is an empty place. But it is nevertheless a fact: in the center of Stalin's report is a hole, consciously and premeditatedly bored.

Awaken, so that no harm shall come to the dictatorship out of this hole!

Four New Organs of the Left Opposition

We are proud to announce the publication of four new organs by the International Left Opposition, solid proofs of the forward march of our movement in the face of all obstacles put in its path by Stalinism, and a refutation of all the fantastic tales concerning our "disintegration".

The first is the "International Bulletin of the Left Communist Opposition" printed in Paris by the Provisional International Secretariat of the Opposition. The first number, just received here, is printed in French and German, and contains the following material: An Appeal to the Proletarians of the World. Editorial Notice. List of Organizations Adhering to the International Conference of the Opposition. The Left Opposition and the Party in Germany. The Crisis in the Belgian Opposition. (Resolutions of the Charleroi Federation and the Executive Bureau). The Development of the Opposition in France. The Conditions of the Oppositionists Deported in the U.S.S.R. What is the Situation in the Austrian Opposition movement? Future issues will contain articles in English translation also. The price per copy is 5 cents, to be purchased through the Militant.

The second is "Claridad", published by the Mexican Opposition. The first number contains the following articles in the Spanish language: An Address to the Mexican Communists. The Expulsion of Andres Nin from the U.S.S.R. The Recent "Revolutions" in South America. A. Marti Arrested in Nicaragua. The Opportunists of Transport Workers Confederation and the Government. The Crisis in the U.S. Communist Party. The Situation in Cuba. The Expulsion of comrade Golod from the Spanish-speaking section of the U.S. Party. And many more other important items. Copies of "Claridad" can be purchased in the United States at 5 cents each by writing A. Gonzalez, 25 Third Avenue, Room 4, New York, N.Y.

The third is "Spartacus", monthly organ of the Opposition in the Communist Party of Greece. The first number contains among other articles, the following: A Criticism of the Report of the Comintern, by S. Maximos. Proportional Elections or Extra-Parliamentary Struggle? Economic Adventurism, by L. Trotsky. The First of August and the New "Turn" by Mon. The Pan-Hellenic Congress of the C.G.T. of Greece and the Duty of the Revolutionary Workers, by Tassos Dimitriou. The Struggle against the Right Wing at the 16th Congress, by N. Senine. In the Light of Marxism, etc., etc. Greek comrades in the United States can get copies by writing to Jean Monastiriotes, Poste Restante, Athens, Greece. The Militant hopes to have them on sale at its office soon.

The fourth is "Jiskra" (Spark), organ of the Left Opposition in Czechoslovakia. It is published monthly in the Czech and German languages and marks a big step ahead for our Czech comrades. The first issue contains a declaration of their point of view and a definite demarcation from the Right wing liquidators around Haimuna-Neurath-Kowanda and the Centrists of the official Party. The enormous task of our comrades in Czechoslovakia in winning over the bulk of the Communist workers discouraged by Centrism or misled by Right wing will be greatly facilitated now with the issuance of their own paper. Czech workers in the U.S. can obtain connections with the paper by writing its editor, Ferdinand Jerabek, Ziskov, Domazlicka, 8/III, Praha, Czechoslovakia.

MIMEOGRAPH WANTED

A mimeographing machine in workable condition is needed by the office of the Militant. The machine must be of the automatic "pick-up" type, and be offered at a really reasonable price. Those wishing to sell can see the secretary at 25 Third Avenue, Room 4, at any hour during the day, or can write full particulars to the same address.

The Election Results

By Our Berlin Correspondent

The result of the German elections proves that electoral participation was extremely increased. It considerably surpassed 80 percent. By the growth of the electorate and the participation of the young element (2,500,000), the number of votes rose from 30,000,000 to 35,000,000, and the total number of mandates from 493 to 576, increasing the number of deputies by 83. More than half of these six million new electors are proletarians. These facts must be emphasized in order to analyze the election results.

The Middle Bourgeois Parties Beaten

In spite of desperate efforts, the parties of the middle bourgeoisie forming the Bruening government were unable to halt their disintegration. Only the Center, the party assembling under the banner of the Catholic Church the big industrialists of the Rhine and the workers of the Rhineland and Upper-Silesia, succeeded in maintaining its positions (68 mandates instead of 62), that is, to increase, due to the increased participation, the number of its votes by about 5 percent while the increase in the electorate was about 20 percent.

The other government parties (State party, Right wing Democrats, People's party) suffered very heavy defeats, in part even crushing. The dictatorial regime which had hoped to convert its parliamentary minority into a majority, obtained hardly a third of the mandates out of the total.

In spite of the growth in the number of electors, the socialist party fell from 9,150,533 votes (1928) to 8,572,000 (143 mandates as against 153). In certain regions however, it held on, for instance in Saxony, where it succeeded in rising from 871-327 votes obtained in the Landtag elections (June 1929) to 992,547. As a whole, the defeat of the social democracy is undeniable, but it would be wrong to speak of a "crushing defeat" (see Rote Fahne, September 15, 1930); one must rather speak of a process of crumbling.

The press of the German C.P. announces that "the Communists are the victors of the electoral battle". The Party has succeeded in rising from 3,262,876 votes (1928) to 4,587,000, a gain of about 40 percent. Considering the increase in the electorate, the Party succeeded in gaining about 500,000 to 600,000 new votes. That is certainly an important fact, which does not indicate the correctness of the Party policy but the enormous, the intense effectiveness of the masses in the crisis.

Fascism, the Real Victor

The National Socialist party (Fascists) bounded from 809,939 votes (1928) to 6,400,000 and their mandates from 12 to 107! As we had foreseen, it became the strongest bourgeois party and at the same time the strongest party in general after the social democrats. What interests us above all is to know at the expense of what class this victory was achieved.

At the very outset it is apparent that the fascists have taken the heritage of the petty bourgeois parties. They took 2 million votes from the nationalists, 1 million from the People's party, and about a half million, without doubt, from the other bourgeois parties. As for the increased participation, it also went in large part to Fascism. At first sight it might seem that the enormous victory of Fascism is due to the simple fact that it drew the bourgeois masses to it. But a deeper examination of the electoral results shows that Fascism succeeded in making a deep breach in the proletariat. That is what the figures from the industrial regions show, in which the Fascists almost increased their 1928 vote ten-fold. Thus, East Dusseldorf, 210,106 (1928: 19,926); West Dusseldorf, 168,635 (1928: 10,104). Chemnitz-Zwickau, 264,871 (1928: 41,497); Hamburg, 144,584 (1928: 17,761).

In the industrial regions of the Rhineland, the Fascists went from 600 to 8,400 in Hamborn, and from 1,222 to 26,079 in Wuppertal-Barmen.

In Berlin, the figures are still more alarming. In this city, there were municipal elections in November 1929, that is, in the period of the crisis. Here the Fascists rose from 132,031 to 393,266, and that in ten months. In the proletarian bastions, the Fascists increased, in Wedding (a particularly striking instance), from 8720 (November 1929) to 20,655; in Neukölln, from 7,124 (1929) to 22,128, in Friedrichshain, from 2,324 (1929) to 24,900, in Pankow from 355 (1929) to 11,773.

And Now?

Nothing would now be more dangerous than dizziness of the Party before its own success, nothing would be more dangerous than the way the bureaucrats treat the Fascist victory as a mere bagatelle ("Last night Herr Hitler had his 'greatest day', but the so-called election victory is the beginning of their end . . . " Rote Fahne, September 15).

The Party has advanced. It has advanced in virtually all the proletarian regions. But the fact that the Fascists did so also in a whole series of industrial sections (West Dusseldorf) or even strongly surpassed it (Chemnitz-Zwickau, Hamburg, Dresden-Bautzen, Northern Westphalia) is alarming. The Rote Fahne writes: "The rise of our growing influence among the workers and all the exploited, the rise in which we won the toiling masses in the cities and the country for our program of revolutionary emancipation, showed itself to be even more impetuous than we thought before September 14"; that is one of the most dangerous ways of deceiving oneself.

We are on the eve of decisive struggles in Germany. The rise of the counter-revolutionary wave has exceeded all previous ones. Now everything will depend upon the extent to which our Party will be able to utilize the confidence which the masses place in it in order to lead the extra-parliamentary struggle, the struggle against the capitalist offensive, and mass unemployment, the struggle against Fascism. The greatest danger is the continuation of the present course whose culminating point is now the "program for the national and social liberation of the German people". Fascism cannot be vanquished on the basis of national-Bolshevism; the Fascists cannot be conquered by exchanging amicable discussion articles with them in the Communist and national socialist press (Berlin am Morgen, Nationalsozialist). If this course is continued, the present success of the Party will be transformed into its opposite. In the competition of "national Bolshevism versus Fascism", it is Fascism that will triumph.

In the struggle against Fascism, the central point, now as before, is the social democratic workers whom we must win over, with whom we must make a united class front against Fascism.

The Left Opposition in Germany will have to work in the weeks to come, under still more difficult conditions. The Party masses still follow the policy of Centrism in their majority. The success of yesterday threatens to render them insensible to the dangers before us.

The Left Opposition was not taken unawares by the events. It will continue to fight with increased strength to save the Party from disaster the danger of which is greater than it would seem; in this electoral struggle during which the Party leadership trampled the principles of Communism under foot it has begun to poison the most precious thing the Party has: the internationalist class position of the cadres of the Party, it has undermined the ideological resistance power of the Party, it has yielded ideologically to Fascist pressure.

Today's victory brings to light the elements of an inevitable defeat, unless the pressure of the proletarian kernel of the Party radically changes the political life of the Party.

—KURT LANDAU

ON MAURICE MALKIN

Last minute technical difficulties made the omission of a report on the visit made to Comstock Prison, New York, to see comrade Maurice L. Malkin, unavoidable. In the next issue the Militant will publish an account of this visit made to our Opposition fighter in prison by Max Shachtman, Sylvia Bleeker, Rose Karsner and other comrades. It will be highly interesting. In the meantime, all comrades are urgently requested to write to comrade Malkin. He told his visitors that the day he receives a letter from a comrade is a Red Letter day in his life. Write about the movement and the struggle. Write often. Write regularly. Remember our fighters behind the prison bars and do not neglect them. He should be addressed: Maurice L. Malkin, No. 10061, Box 51, Comstock, N.Y.

The C.P.G. in the Campaign

The outcome of the German elections has been a violent—though not unexpected—political shake-up, an indication of the rapid shifting of class forces that has been taking place for some time—to be precise since the adoption of the Young Plan. The enormous Fascist victory and the quite substantial gains of the Communist Party are only the beginning of a radical trend which German politics will follow in the days to come. We may yet witness many vacillations in the degree of influence of the Fascists and the C.P.G. during the course of developments, but with the increasing enslavement of the German proletariat through unemployment, taxation and wage cuts; with the progressive impoverishment and declassing of the small bourgeoisie due to the ruthless attempt of the capitalist class to force the burden of the reparations on the lower classes, the dilemma: Fascism or Communism, is definitely on the order of the day in Germany.

With such a perspective before us, it would be well to review the progress of the German Communist Party, to inspect its forces and fighting ability. The elections brought the Party a gain of over 1,000,000 votes, not be overestimated in importance when we consider the almost octupled increase of the Fascists, (over 5,000,000!) but nevertheless a great advance, especially taking into account the gains in such a strategic center as Berlin, where the Communists surpassed the social democrats and became the strongest party. However, we must ask ourselves: How did the Party face the elections? How did it appeal to the workers on this occasion? These questions are indispensable for a real accounting.

The C.P.G.'s Programmatic Declaration

And here we receive as an answer the amazingly shameless document known as the "Programmatic Declaration of the C.P.G. on the National and Social Emancipation of the German People". It is a document whose very title betrays it to be a petty bourgeois electioneering device, an unscrupulous means of competing with the demagogic "national" slogans of the Fascists, the Hitlerites. It points out the social democracy to the masses not so much as the agent of the German bourgeoisie, but as "the voluntary agents of French and Polish imperialism"; it speaks of their "high treason" in almost the same tones as Hitler does; finally, it sees the "point of departure of the enslavement of all German workers" in the "Versailles robber treaty"! Not the class rule of the German bourgeoisie, but the Versailles treaty, which is the summary of the struggle between the German and the Allied imperialists has become the "point of departure of the enslavement of all German workers"! As a consequence, the necessity of the struggle for immediate demands against the capitalist offensive at home is shelved or reduced to insignificance, the entire election campaign is centered around the irresponsible and all too general slogan: "In the event of our seizing power we shall declare null and void all obligations arising out of the Versailles Peace". A very strong echo of the "national-Bolshevik" deviations of the German infantile "Lefts" of 1919 (Laufenberg-Wolfheim) and of the Brandlites in 1923.

Lenin gave the "national-Bolsheviks" and the infantile "Lefts" of 1919 the proper Marxist reproof. It still holds good today for the Thaelmanns and Neumanns, and all those who carry out the Centrist, nationally limited line of Stalin in Germany.

Lenin's View

"We Communists," wrote Lenin, "are not at all bound to repudiate the Versailles treaty—or what is more, to repudiate it immediately. The possibility of successfully repudiating the treaty depends not only upon the German, but also upon the international success of the Soviet movement." (Left Wing Communism.)

The election campaign, with the crassly nationalist note that accompanied it, was the purest expression of ultra-Left opportunism. At a time when the oppression of the masses is heading for a crisis, when it is necessary, in a campaign of broad struggle to break the ground for the decisive blows against the class enemy by a sharply outlined, patient and sober campaign to win authority and leadership among the workers, the German Party leadership offered nothing more than the as yet vague slogan of a Soviet Germany.

That this slogan of necessity expressed the immediate reaction of over four and a half million German workers is gratifying, to be sure. But what guarantee is there that these workers, who thus voiced their dissatisfaction with the existing regime and their desire for a workers' Germany, will follow the Party in the struggle beyond the ballot box? Do the recent economic struggles, perhaps, offer such a guarantee? No, indeed! The defeats of Mansfeld and the Northwest in July of this year, the latest in a whole string of strike failures since the Ruhr fight of 1928, bespeak the contrary.

In a moment of splendid opportunity for mass work in the factories and in the broad working class organizations the Party leadership present an ultra-Left sounding parliamentary spectacle to the German working class, hiding its real impotence to cope with the situation as a Bolshevik Party should. The nationalistic mimicry of the Fascists, heaped upon the general confusionist theories of "social-fascism" and the "immediate revolutionary situation" with all their subsequent isolationist tactics, keep the Party corralled, bound, unable to carry out its historic task.

The Capitalist Offensive

Immediately after the papier-mache "victory" of the elections, the fierce, all-round offensive of the bourgeoisie is only coming into its real swing, is gaining its full amplitude. A Times dispatch, dated Berlin, September 26, reports:

"The conscription of labor probably will replace the system of unemployment doles in the government's new program of financial reforms, and it will be only one of several innovations to which recourse will be taken in a final attempt to prevent the collapse of Germany's financial structure."

"The government's plans include also an increase in the number of indirect taxes in the move to reduce direct imposts . . . In keeping with its scheme for cuts in production costs and retail prices, the government intends to reach an agreement with the trade unions providing for a reduction of 10 percent in wages."

The drive of the capitalist class against the standard of living of the working class, for the abolition of even the meager "dole" is coming to a head. The social democracy, in the Mueller coalition government, in the yellow trade unions, has supported this drive by the most revolting acts of treachery and deception. But as yet not even the most elementary steps have been taken to organize the proletarian defense which would reveal the true countenance of fascism and social democracy before the workers.

The Role of the Thaelmanns

Confined in its stifling atmosphere of self-deception and illusion, the Party leadership has failed to do its duty. It is not yet too late to regain lost time, to repair the Party and prepare it for the historic battles to come. Our German Opposition comrades are leading in the fight to unmask the incapable epigonic Thaelmann-Neumann leadership before the Party, to instigate the membership to throw off the shackling theory of "social fascism" and all its tactical deductions, as well as the whole dangerous playing with "national-Bolshevik" phrases, to rehabilitate and reconstitute it as the weapon of the working class, now more indispensable than ever.

The struggle to follow, the fight against unemployment, for the seven hour day, for credits to the Soviet Union, for a broad defense against wage cuts, will in Germany, as here and everywhere, prove the justice of the policy of the Left Opposition. We, the Leninists of the entire world, know the import of the coming class struggles in Germany. It is for this reason that we look ahead with such anxiety towards the progress of the German Party, fighting for its renovation and the Comintern's, in order to help that "international success of the Soviet movement" which alone can forever tear up the Versailles Treaties, the Young Plans and every other remnant of capitalist class rule.

Perspectives and Tasks of the Chinese Revolution truth that their bourgeoisie can not, and does not want to, and never will fight either against the so-called "feudalism"—since the latter constitutes the most important part of its own system of exploitation—or against that imperialism, of which it is an agent and under whose military protection it operates.

As soon as it became evident that the Chinese proletariat, in spite of all the obstructions offered by the Comintern was eager to get on its own independent revolutionary road, the bourgeoisie, with the help of the foreign imperialists, demolished the workers, beginning at Shanghai. As soon as it was clear that the friendship with Moscow was not able to paralyze the uprising of the peasants, the bourgeoisie shattered the peasant movement. The spring and summer of 1927 were the months of the greatest crimes of the Chinese bourgeoisie.

Frightened by the consequences of its mistakes, the Stalinist faction tried at the end of 1927 to make up at once for what it had let slip up for a whole period of years. Thus was organized the insurrection in Canton. The leaders assumed that the revolution was still on the rise. In reality it was already completely on the decline. The heroism of the advanced workers could not prevent the disaster caused by the adventure of these leaders. The Canton insurrection was drowned in blood. The second Chinese revolution was completely demolished.

We, the representatives of the International Left Opposition, the Bolshevik-Leninists, were from the very beginning against joining the Kuo Min Tang and for an independent proletarian policy. From the very beginning of the revolutionary rise we demanded the organization of workers, soldiers and peasants soviets. We demanded that the workers should stand at the head of the peasant insurrection and lead the agrarian revolution to its end. Our course was rejected. Our supporters were persecuted, expelled from the Comintern and those in the U.S.S.R. were arrested and exiled. In the name of what? In the name of a union with Chiang Kai-Shek.

The Crushing of the Revolution

After the counter-revolutionary coup d'Etat in Shanghai and Wuhan we, the Left Communists gave insistent warning that the second Chinese revolution is over, that a period of temporary triumph of the counter-revolution had supervened, and that an attempt at an insurrection of the advanced workers in face of the general depression and weariness of the masses, will inevitably bring a further criminal extermination of the revolutionary forces. We demanded a transition to the defensive, the strengthening of the underground organization of the Party participation in the economic struggles of the proletariat and the mobilization of the masses under the slogans of democracy; the independence of China, the right of self-determination of the different nationalities in the population, a national assembly, confiscation of the land, eight-hour working day. Such a policy would have given the Communist vanguard the possibility to emerge gradually from its defeat, to re-establish connection with the trade unions and with the unorganized masses of city and country and be ready to meet later in full arms the new revolutionary rise.

The Stalinist faction denounced our policy as that of "liquidators" while itself, as has happened before in its history passing from opportunism to adventurism. In February 1928, when the Chinese revolution was at its extreme decline, the IX Plenum of the E.C.C.I. announced in China a course towards armed insurrection. The results of this madness was a further defeat of the workers, extermination of the best revolutionaries, a split in the Party and demoralization in the ranks of the workers.

The decline of the revolution and the temporary weakening of the fight between the militarists, made possible a certain economic revival in the country. Strikes began over again. But they were conducted independently of the Party, which, not understanding the situation, was absolutely unable to show the masses the new perspectives and unite them under the democratic slogans of the transitory period. As a result of mistakes, opportunism and adventurism, the Communist Party at present counts in its ranks only a few thousand workers. In the Red trade unions according to the data of the Party itself, there are about 60,000 workers. In the months of the revolutionary rise there were about 3,000,000 of them.

The counter-revolution left its mark directly and much more ruthlessly on the workers than on the peasants. The workers in China are not numerous and are concentrated in the industrial centers. The peasants are protected to a certain degree by their numbers and their diffusion over vast spaces. The revolutionary years trained up in the country quite a few local leaders, and the counter-revolution did not succeed in exterminating them all. A considerable number of revolutionary workers hid themselves in the country from the militarists. For the last decade a considerable number of arms were scattered all over the country. In conflicts with local administrators or military units, these arms are produced by the peasants and companies of Red irregulars are organized. In the armies of the bourgeois counter-revolution, agitations often take place, and at times, open revolts. Soldiers with their arms desert to the side of the peasants, sometimes in groups, sometimes in whole companies.

The Peasant Uprisings

Hence it is quite natural that even after the defeat of the revolution, waves of the peasant movement continued to roll up to the various provinces of the country and at present have burst out with special force. With armed hands, the peasants drive out and exterminate the local landlords, as many as are to be found in their regions, and especially the so-called gentry and Tuchuns, the local representatives of the ruling class—the bureaucrat-proprietors, the usurers and the rich peasants.

When the Stalinists talk about a Soviet government established by the peasants over a considerable part of China, they do not simply show their credulity and superficiality, but obscure and misrepresent the fundamental problem of the Chinese revolution. A peasantry, even the most revolutionary, is not able to create an independent government. It can only support the government of another class, dominating in the cities. The peasantry in all decisive moments follow either the bourgeoisie or the proletariat. So-called "peasant parties" can only disguise this fact, but they cannot annul it. Soviets are the organs of power of a revolutionary class antagonistic to the bourgeoisie. This means that the peasantry is unable to organize a Soviet system by its own force. The same is true of an army. More than once the peasantry has organized in China as well as in Russia and other countries, guerrilla armies, which fought with incomparable courage and obstinacy. But these were only guerrilla armies, attached to a local province and not fit for centralized strategic operations on a large scale. Only the dominance of the proletariat in the decisive industrial and political centers of the country creates the necessary premise for the organization of a Red army, and for the spreading of the Soviet system to the country. To those who are not able to understand this, the revolution has remained a book closed with seven seals.

The Chinese proletariat is just beginning to come out from the paralysis of the counter-revolution. The peasant movement is moving at present, in a considerable measure, independently of the workers movement, according to its own laws, and its own tempo. Meanwhile, the whole problem of the Chinese revolution consists of the political coordination and organizational combination of the proletariat and peasant uprising. Those who talk about the victory of the Soviet revolution in China, if even in separate provinces of the South only, in face of the passivity of the industrial North, ignore the dual problem of the Chinese revolution, the problem of cooperation of workers and peasants and the problem of leadership of the workers in this cooperation.

The vast flood of the peasant revolt might undoubtedly serve as an impetus to a revival of political struggle in the industrial centers. We firmly count upon it. But this would not mean in any case, that the revolutionary awakening of the proletariat would lead immediately to the conquest of power or even to the struggle for power. The awakening of the proletariat might in its first steps assume the character of partial economic and political, defensive and offensive fights. How long a time would it take the proletariat, and especially the Communist vanguard, to grow up to the role of the leaders of a revolutionary nation? At any rate more than weeks and months. The command of bureaucratic leaders can not replace the independent growth of a class and of its party.

The Chinese Communists need at present a policy of far aim. Their task consists not in scattering their forces among the isolated fires of the peasant revolt. Small in its number and weak, the Party will not be able to get hold of this movement. The duty of the Communists is to concentrate their forces in factories and shops, in workers' districts, to explain to the workers the meaning of what is going on in the country, to raise the spirit of the tired and the discouraged, to form groups of them for the struggle to defend their economic interests, and for slogans of the democratic and agrarian revolution. Only in this way, i. e., through the awakening and the uniting of the workers will the Communist Party be able to become a leader of the peasant insurrection, which is to say, of the national revolution as a whole.

To support the illusions of adventurism and to disguise the weakness of the proletarian vanguard, the Stalinists say: The matter in question is only a democratic and not a proletarian dictatorship. In this central point adventurism is relying in full on the premises of opportunism. Not satisfied with their experiment with the Kuo Min Tang, the Stalinists are preparing for the future revolution a new means of putting to sleep and enslaving the proletariat under the name of the "democratic dictatorship".

The Slogan of Soviets

When the advanced Chinese workers promulgated the slogan of Soviets they meant by it: We want to do what the Russian workers did. Only yesterday the Stalinists replied to them: "No, you must not, you have the Kuo Min Tang, and it will do what is necessary." Today, the same leaders answer more cautiously: "You'll have to organize Soviets not for a proletarian but for a democratic dictatorship." By this they tell the proletariat that the dictatorship will not be in their hands. Then there is some other, as yet undiscovered force which will be able to realize the revolutionary dictatorship in China.

Thus the formula of the democratic dictatorship opens the gates for a new deception of the workers and peasants by the bourgeoisie.

To clear the way for the "democratic dictatorship", the Stalinists represent the Chinese counter-revolution as "feudal-militaristic and imperialistic". In this way they exclude from the counter-revolution the Chinese bourgeoisie, i. e., idealize it, as they did before. In reality, the militarists express the interests of the Chinese bourgeoisie, which are inseparable from the feudal interests and relationships. The Chinese bourgeoisie is too hostile to the people, too closely tied up with the foreign imperialists, too afraid of the revolution, to be eager to rule in their own name by parliamentary methods. The militaristic-fascist regime of China is an expression of the anti-national, anti-revolutionary character of the Chinese bourgeoisie. The Chinese counter-revolution is not a counter revolution of feudal barons and slave-owners against bourgeois society. It is the counter-revolution of all property holders—and first of all bourgeois proprietors—against the workers and peasants.

The proletarian insurrection in China can and will come only as a direct and immediate revolution against the bourgeoisie. The peasants' revolt in China is much more than it was in Russia, a revolt against the bourgeoisie. A class of landlords as a separate class does not exist in China. The landowners are bourgeoisie. The gentry and Tuchuns, against whom the peasant movement is immediately directed, represent the lowest links of the bourgeoisie, as well as of imperialist exploitation. In Russia, the October revolution at its first stage opposed all the peasantry as a class to the class of the landlords, and only after a number of months began to introduce the civil war into the peasantry. In China every peasant uprising is from its very first step, a civil war of the poor against the kulaks, i. e., against the village bourgeoisie.

The middle peasantry in China is insignificant. Almost 80 percent of the peasants are poor. They, and they only, play the revolutionary role. The question is not of uniting the workers with the peasantry as a whole but with the village poor. They have a common enemy: the bourgeoisie. No one but the proletariat can lead the poor peasants to victory. Their mutual victory can lead to no other regime but the dictatorship of the proletariat. Only this regime is able to establish the soviet system and organize a Red Army which will be the military expression of the dictatorship of the proletariat supported by the poor peasants.

The Stalinists say that the democratic dictatorship, as the next stage of the revolution, will grow later into a proletarian dictatorship. Such is at present the teaching of the Comintern not only for China but for all countries of the East. It breaks completely with the teachings of Marx concerning the state and with Lenin's conclusions as to the part the state plays in revolution. The democratic dictatorship, differs from the proletarian by being a bourgeois-democratic dictatorship. The transition from a bourgeois dictatorship to the proletarian can not nevertheless be realized by the way of peaceful "growing into". The dictatorship of the proletariat can come into the place of a democracy, as well as of a fascist dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, only by way of armed insurrection.

The peaceful "growing" of a democratic revolution into a socialist revolution is possible only under the dictatorship of one class—namely, the proletariat. The transition from democratic measures into socialist measures took place in the Soviet Union under the regime of proletarian dictatorship. In China, the transition will happen much faster, as the most elementary democratic problems in China have a still more anti-capitalistic and anti-bourgeois character than they had in Russia.

The Stalinists evidently need one more bankruptcy, paid by the workers' blood, in order to make up their mind to say: "The revolution has reached the highest stage, the slogan of which is the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Towards the Third Revolution

At the present moment, nobody can say how much a reflection from the second revolution is combined in the present peasant insurrection with the far-off lighting of the third. Nobody can foretell now whether the hearths of the peasant revolt will be able to keep a fire burning continuously through all the long period of time which the proletarian vanguard will need to gather its own strength, bring the working class into the fight and coordinate its struggle for power with the general offensive of the peasants against their most immediate enemies.

What distinguishes this present movement in the country is the eagerness of the peasant to give it a soviet form, or at least a soviet name, and to make their own guerrilla armies as much as possible like the Red Army. This shows how intensely the peasants are seeking a political form which might enable them to escape from their scatteredness and impotence. On this foundation the Communists can build successfully.

But it must be understood beforehand, that in the consciousness of the Chinese peasant the vague slogan of Soviets does not by any means signify the dictatorship of the proletariat. The peasants in general can not speak for the proletarian dictatorship a priori. They can be led to it only through the experience of a struggle which will prove to them in reality, that their democratic problems can not be solved any other way except through the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Such is the fundamental reason why the Communist Party of China can not lead the proletariat to the struggle for power, except under the slogans of democracy.

The peasant movement, although adorned with the name of Soviets, remains disintegrated, local, provincial. To lift it (Continued on Page 8)

What is Social - Fascism?

Radek has his novitiate to serve. Towards this end, he writes long-winded feuilletons in Pravda on "social fascism". "What is this, a rope?" as the philosopher said among the Chemnitz folk. And since the trouble is the readers of the numerous articles on "social fascism" disastously forget all the excellent arguments of the previous investigators, it is up to Radek to begin from the beginning. To begin from the beginning means to declare that Trotsky stands on the other side of the barricades. It is possible that Radek had to insert this sentence upon the special request of the editorial board, as a moral honorarium for the publication of his article.

But still: what does the essence of "social fascism" consist of? And wherein lies its difference from avowed Fascism? It appears that the difference lies in the fact (who would have thought it?) that social fascism is also "for the carrying out of the fascist policy, but in a democratic way". Radek explains in long words why nothing remained for the German bourgeoisie than to carry out the fascistization policy through parliament "with an outward retention of democracy". Then what is the matter in question? Up to now the Marxists were of the opinion that it is democracy which is the "outward" disguise of the class dictatorship—one of its possible disguises. The political function of the present social democracy is the creation of precisely such democratic disguises. In nothing else lies its difference from Fascism which, with other methods, other ideology, in part also with another social basis, organizes, insures and protects the same dictatorship of imperialist capital.

But—Radek seeks to prove—it is possible to maintain decaying capitalism only with Fascist measures. In the long run, this is entirely correct. From this, however, does not flow the identity of social democracy and Fascism, but merely the fact that the social democracy is compelled in the long run to clear the road for Fascism, during which, reaching the end, it does not deny itself the pleasure of battering in a considerable number of Fascist heads. Such objections, however, are declared by Radek to be an "extenuation of the social democracy". This terrible revolutionist apparently thinks that to rub out the bloody tracks of imperialism with the brush of democracy is a higher and more eminent mission than to defend the imperialist coffers with blackjack in hand.

Radek cannot deny that the social democracy clings to parliamentarism with all its feeble power, for all the sources of its influence and welfare are bound up with this artificial mechanism. But, protests the inventive Radek, it is nowhere said that Fascism requires the formal dispersal of parliament. Just look! But it was precisely that political party which, in Italy for the first time, destroyed the parliamentary machine in the name of the Praetorian Guard of bourgeois class rule, that was called Fascism. This means nothing, it appears. Fascism as a phenomenon is one thing, its essence is another. Radek finds that the destruction of parliamentarism is, apparently not the kind of democracy is taken as such. "What is this, a rope?"

But since he feels that this does not pass off so smoothly, Radek adds with still greater inventiveness: "Even Italian Fascism did not disperse the parliament right away (!)". What is true, remains true. And yet it did disperse it, without sparing even the social democracy, the finest flower in the parliamentary bouquet. With Radek it looks as though the social fascists dispersed the Italian parliament, only not right way, but after reflection. We are afraid that Radek's theory does not quite explain to the Italian workers why the social fascists live in the emigration. The German workers, too, will not easily grasp who it really is in Germany that wants to disperse the parliament: the Fascists or the social democrats?

All of Radek's arguments, like those of his tutors, imply that the social democracy is in no way an ideal democracy (that is apparently not the kind of democracy that Radek saw in his roseate dream after the reconciliatory embraces with Yaroslavsky). The profound and fertile theory of social fascism is not built upon the foundation of a materialist analysis of the particular, specific function of the social democracy, but upon the foundation of an abstract-democratic criterion which is peculiar to the opportunists even when they want to or must occupy the extreme wheel of the extreme barricades (here they usually turn their backs to the wrong side and hold the weapon at the wrong end).

There is no class difference between social democracy and Fascism. Fascism as well as social democracy are bourgeois parties, and not bourgeois in the general sense, but such as protect sinking capitalism, which sustains itself less and less, not only with democratic forms, but also with the least firm legality. That is precisely why the social democracy is condemned to sink down to nothing, giving way to

Who Is «Betraying» Labor Defense Unity?

In the Daily Worker (September 29-30, 1930), Sam Darcy, one of the Stalinists, appointed to ruin the International Labor Defense, vents his feeble spleen at the Opposition for having joined with the I.W.W. in New York to commemorate the death of James McInerney, the I.W.W. Centralia prisoner who recently died in Walla Walla, Washington penitentiary while serving his term with the other Centralia men.

It would be time wasted to engage in a dispute with this individual who knows little and cares less about the struggle for the class war fighters whom capitalism snatches out of the ranks and confines in its penitentiaries—if it were not that Darcy's whole outlook is so typical of the wrecking crew the I.L.D. has had foisted upon it.

Against what does Darcy direct his dull shafts? Against those who for the narrowest factional reasons sabotaged the united front for labor defense? Of course not. That would mean an attack upon his own masters in the Central Committee of the official Communist Party. He strikes out instead, against the Left Opposition for having sent a speaker to the New York memorial meeting for McInerney, arranged by the local I.W.W. which Darcy—either through inexcusable ignorance or deliberate malice—pretends to identify with the reactionary "Emergency Program" section of the I.W.W. (now outside its ranks) which controls the Central Publicity Committee.

At a time when the I.L.D. flourished, and was recognized by every honest worker in the labor movement as a genuine united front for the defense of class war fighters, the I.L.D. had to fight and did fight successfully against those elements its struggle was in quite a different direction in the I.W.W., in the Socialist Party, among the anarchists, who sabotage the class unity of the workers' defense movement. This struggle, carried on essentially in the interests of the working class and its victims, was successful. In this fight for unity, the I.L.D. was built and strengthened. Look at the former National Committee of the I.L.D.—when it was headed by precisely those comrades—the Opposition whom Darcy now calumniate—and one will find, for example, the best representatives of the I.W.W. (as well as other groups) functioning on it (Gurley Flynn, Cline, Fred Mann, Ralph Chaplin, Charlie Gray, Dick Brazier, etc.) despite the hardly concealed antagonism to the International Labor Defense displayed by reactionary elements within the I.W.W. at that time. Then look at the "national committee" of the I.L.D. today under the direction of Messrs. Bowder, Engdahl, Darcy and associated incompetents, and every one of its 20 members is a Communist of the Stalin brand!

Darcy writes: "While in the C.P., Cannon, the leaders of the Trotskyites, for years correctly fought against the syndicalist conceptions of the I.W.W." But this did not prevent—rather it assisted—as from uniting in one defense front with the revolutionary elements in the I.W.W. Now, however, the agglomeration of Darcy's "fight syndicalism" so "correctly" that it has succeeded in alienating every synerate with the Communists in the labor dicalist workers who was willing to coop-defense movement.

But the impression should not prevail that Darcy's Marxism is outraged at the idea of speaking at one meeting with I.W.W. members. The truth of the mat-

Fascism at one pole and to Communism at the other.

The difference between blondes and brunettes is not so great, at any rate substantially less than the difference between men and apes. Anatomically and physiologically, blondes and brunettes belong to one and the same species of life, can belong to one and the same nationality, also one and the same family, and finally, both can be the same scoundrels—and notwithstanding, the skin and hair coloring has its significance not only in the police pass but in living relations as a whole. Radek, however, in order to earn the hearty applause of Yaroslavsky, wants to prove that the brunette is at bottom a blonde, only with dark skin and black hair.

There are good theories in the world which serve to explain facts. So far as the theory of social fascism is concerned, it is only fit for serving out the novitiate of capitulators.

—ALFA

ter is that when Herbert Mahler, of the New York I.W.W., telephoned the I.L.D. National office for a speaker at the McInerney meeting, he was told that the I.L.D. "can get along all right with the I.W.W." but they wouldn't speak from the same platform with "the Trotskyites and Lovestoneites who are stabbing us in the back". The anarchist and S.P. representatives' presence did not disturb the Darcys; but they were ready to hurt still more the name once gained by the I.L.D. if only it soothed their factional rage against the "counter-revolutionary Trotskyists".

The I.L.D. can never regain its prestige until it has rid itself of these miserable masqueraders.

Besmirching the IWW

We have received a copy of a leaflet issued on the Philadelphia waterfront in English and Polish, signed by the "Marine Transport Workers of the I.W.W." In the last paragraph we read:

"The I.W.W. is now as it was then, against any politician's attempt to organize LABOR Unions to war against Churches and governments and this is the hidden program of the Communists."

One would have to go far and wide to find a similar pronouncement in any of the literature issued by the I.W.W. in its long career. In fact, it contains the word and spirit of the most reactionary elements in the American labor movement, and has not the slightest thing in common with the whole tradition of the I.W.W. To the contrary. A glance at the past publications of the I.W.W. will show that they conducted a systematic campaign of education "against Churches and Governments"—the latter as the political instrument of the capitalist class and the former as the befuddler of the working class. It is quite true that no labor union can make "anti-churchism and anti-governmentism" a pre-requisite for membership; but a trade union that calls itself class conscious and revolutionary must carry on a daily campaign of enlightenment among the backward workers to explain to them the reactionary role of capitalist government and its whole system of religious superstition.

The leaflet in question does precisely the opposite. It plays down to the most reactionary and mystical prejudices of the backward workers. Its author sinks to the lowest levels in the proletariat, instead of remaining on class conscious grounds and endeavoring to enlighten these workers. The I.W.W. should condemn the leaflet and its author or authors out of hand. We are convinced that there are still sufficient militant, class conscious elements in the I.W.W. to see to the repudiation of this whole reactionary business. That sort of thing should be left to the capitalist agents in the A.F. of L. on whose lips it sounds more customary.

PEARLS OF PRICELESS PURITY

"The Workers' Unemployment Insurance Bill is the center of our Party's election campaign. Every worker is either unemployed or threatened with unemployment. Every worker should be made to feel that ONLY BY ELECTING COMMUNISTS TO CONGRESS can a REAL battle be waged for unemployment insurance." (Daily Worker editorial, 9-20-1930, our emphasis.)

A Case of Base Ingratitude

A piteous wailing is being heard from the editorial offices of the New Masses. Teeth are being gently gnashed, and hair artistically torn. The bald and toothless sit around the wall and reflect philosophically that in this world at least there is no justice, and worse yet, no gratitude. The more politically minded artists are advocating the passage of a law. The more violent among them are urging individual terror. Bedlam reigns over the recent article in the Daily Worker by Max Bedacht, M.A.* entitled "The 'New Masses' and Proletarian Literature".

Says Bedacht, in reply to Michael Gold's recent musings on the lack of American "proletarian literature":

"There may be an underproduction of so-called 'light' proletarian literature in America: but this is due primarily to the barrenness and sterility of the self-styled 'American proletarian writers'. Most of what they produce does not breathe the spirit of the proletariat. Most of these writers do not understand the worker, and do not know the workers' thoughts. They cannot reproduce and interpret in literature the American worker, his world and his aspirations, and the process of revolutionary transformation of them. If the publishers and editors of the 'only magazine dedicated to proletarian literature in America' would study a little more intensely and follow a little more closely the contents of the literature published by the 'stodgy and unenterprising' International Publishers it might fecundate the proletarian quality of their literary productions, as well as their literary style."

We will generously omit commenting on how the proletarian quality and style of Bedacht's productions have been "fecundated". But we cannot refrain from asking why the temperate Swiss barber should launch into such a tempestuous assault upon a loyal group of artists like those in the New Masses? Is this the gratitude the Party polcom shows to Michael Gold, who worked so hard in the sewer to bespatter Trotsky in one issue and sock Lovestone in the next? Isn't this the same Gold who told us, while Bedacht and the other Browders nodded benign approval, that it is Trotsky who doesn't understand the workers, that he is . . . an aristocrat? Yes, yes, it is the very same Gold and the identical New Masses.

We cannot honestly say that this attack, conducted with the fury that only a Bedacht is capable of, takes us by surprise. Only two months ago we wrote in the Militant, warning Gold that the raw deal meted out to another Stalinist valet, Barbusse, would soon hit him, too. We said of Barbusse: "The Stalinists have now rid themselves of that embarrassing baggage. Were Gold one-tenth the sage in politics he imagines himself, he ought to be able to read handwriting when it is written on the wall." As we see, he wasn't able to or didn't want to. He has only himself to blame. Or maybe he doesn't give a hoot. It's not at all impossible that "Jews Without Money" has relieved Gold of the necessity of worrying about what all the Bedachts multiplied by two control commissions say about him in the Party press. He who lives will see.

Order from the Militant

25 Third Ave. New York, N Y

Stalinist Antics in California

LOS ANGELES—

An unemployment council was organized here and at one time it had 1200 members. But suddenly the order came to "dissolve the council: Have every one join the T.U.U.L." A meeting of the 1200 was called to tell them the good news and to elect delegates to the Unemployment Convention in Chicago. But where were the 1200—for only 50 showed up.

And really what was the use of coming to the meeting! Who did not know in advance what happened will and must happen. Eva Shaffran read a list of nominees and they elected this list for there was no other to elect.

Is there any wonder, after a council of 1200 members was reduced to 50 who joined the paper unions of the T.U.U.L., that at the September 1st demonstration some two to three hundred Party members, Y.C.L. and Pioneers were out while not one unemployed worker out of the 150,000 in L.A. took active part in it. The Stalinists say that this is due to police interference—but why were the masses not afraid of machine guns on March 6 when the Unemployment Council was still in existence?

* * *

The cloakmakers are on strike, 400 out of 500 of them, and the decision of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union is this: All those working in shops where the Right wingers are in the majority—go out on strike; all those who work in shops where the Left wing is the majority—remain at work! And although the strike is being conducted by the arch-reactionary Breslau of New York, and the police seem to be in cahoots with Breslau to permit picketing, and although we know that the I.L.G.W.U. strike is more of a strike to organize the bosses and sell them unionism than it is for the workers—the double bookkeeping of the Left wing remains ruinous. Strike and scab at the same time! The Left wing never was and never will be built this way. —B.B.

A Persecuted Socialist

The New York Telegram, semi-official organ of Heywood Broun, socialist candidate for Congress in New York, publishes the following heart-breaking account of the murderous brutality with which the New York police are attacking the noble socialist defenders of the working class. The Communist leaders are sent to prison. Here's what happened to Broun when "arrested for picketing" in the Fifth Avenue garment workers' strike:

"Broun went along but not as the officer had expected. He hired a cab and took the policeman with him, directing the driver to proceed to the E. 51st St. station . . . Magistrate Ford on Levy's (Broun's attorney) motion, dismissed the complaint.

"I got a big kick out of reading your column about my friend, Judge Brodsky," he said to Broun.

"I'm very glad you did, said the polite opponent of Brodsky.

"Then to prove that no one held a grudge, Broun and the policemen posed for photographers. Broun's arms were around the cops . . ."

We patiently await the account in the next issue of the New Leader to learn whether Broun and the cops sang the "International" or just "Sweet Adeline".

Weisbord's Statement

In the last issue of the Militant, an omission was unfortunately made in the beginning of the final installment of comrade Alber Weisbord's statement. The omitted section read as follows:

"An analysis of the present situation cannot be complete or correct without a thorough study of all basic international questions. Only the movement headed by L.D. Trotsky has stressed the necessity for a truly international point of view, has fought the tendencies of national socialism, and has made such an international viewpoint the prerequisite warp and woof of every sectional thesis. The Left International Opposition (Trotsky) alone has correctly fought the opportunism embodied (1) in the theory of socialism in one country, (2) in the Anglo-Russian Trade Union Committee affair, (3) in the Chinese Kuo Min Tang adventure. Nevertheless in view of the recent international events, it is necessary to make an independent analysis here of the chief international situations."

Our National Tour

Good Meetings for Saul in Mid-West Cities

Comrade George Saul, who has just reached Chicago by this writing, has been having a number of successful meetings in his national tour for the Communist League. Beginning in Denver, comrade Saul organized three street meetings virtually by himself. All of them were highly successful, and at the end of the third, many workers in the audience asked him to continue holding the meetings. Comrades of the official Party asked many questions which comrade Saul answered thoroughly. As a result of the Denver meetings, a beginning has been made in the work of organizing a local branch of the League. Proceeding to Kansas City, comrade Saul spoke at three meetings there also, one of them in a hall on the subject of "Class Persecutions in the South", the other on a prominent street corner, and the third with the local members of the League. Saul's visit to K.C. had a lively effect upon the local comrades who write enthusiastically to the national office about the interest was been awakened, among new elements as well as among old-timers.

In St. Louis, comrade Saul spoke before a meeting of the Workers' Alliance, and another public meeting arranged by the Communist League branch. A lively discussion took place at these gatherings, with comrade Saul elucidating the position of the Left Opposition on the important problems of the movement, and in particular on the perspectives for the trade union movement in the United States. As a result of the second meeting, eight workers made application for membership in the League.

In Springfield, Illinois, en route to Chicago, comrade Saul met with a number of Opposition comrades and leaders of the Left wing miners' movement. Throughout the whole Southern Illinois territory, the once powerful Communist and Left wing movement has been thoroughly shot by the ruinous policies of the official Party. Efforts will be made now to assemble the Left wing forces again for concerted action. Some gratifying developments may be expected in Southern Illinois in the near future.

From Chicago, comrade Saul is to visit Detroit, Cleveland Youngstown, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia before coming to New York.

Quotations That Somehow Do Not Tally. . .

"Stalin is not a dictator. He is the foremost leader of the Russian Communist Party, indeed, of the world revolutionary movement. He is 'the best pupil of Lenin', the clearest Marxian of the present day. Stalin enjoys great prestige. This he has won by his life time of splendid revolutionary service. Especially has his work been outstanding since the death of Lenin in 1924"

Wm. Z. Foster, Daily Worker, October 2, 1930.

"Comrade Stalin, having become general secretary, has concentrated an enormous power in his hands. And I am not sure that he always knows how to use that power with sufficient caution . . . Stalin is too rude, and this fault, entirely supportable in relations among us Communists, becomes insupportable in the office of general secretary. Therefore, I propose to the comrades to find a way to remove Stalin from that position and appoint to it another man who in all respects differs from Stalin only in superiority—namely, more patient, more loyal, more polite and more attentive to comrades, less capricious, etc."

—Lenin in his "Testament", January 4, 1923.

"It is significant that during the year and a half of bitter struggle in the South during which our organizer at Bessemer City, Ella May, was shot through the heart and killed by a mill owners' mob, during which our organizer George Saul was sentenced to the chain gang for attempting to hold a meeting; while another of our organizers Ann Burlak, now faces the electric chair at Atlanta, Georgia, for merely protesting to the police against the breaking up of a meeting, that during this entire period there has not been a single desertion of importance from the defense struggle under the leadership of the International Labor Defense."

(—Statement by the I.L.D., J. Louis Engdahl, secretary, Daily Worker, September 22, 1930.)

The Left Opposition and the Chinese Events

to the level of a national movement is possible only by connecting the struggle for land, against tax-oppression and the burden of militarism, with the ideals of the independence of China and the sovereignty of the people. A democratic expression of this connection is the plenipotentiary National Assembly. Under this slogan the Communist vanguard will be able to unite around itself the vast masses of workers, the oppressed small townspeople and the hundreds of millions of poor peasants, for an insurrection against foreign and native oppressors.

The organization of workers' Soviets can be attempted only in presence of an obvious rise of the revolution in the cities. Meanwhile we can only get ready. To get ready—means to gather strength. At present we can do it only under the slogan of a consistent, courageous, revolutionary democracy.

In the meanwhile we must explain to the advanced elements of the working class that a National Assembly is for us only a stage in the revolutionary road. We are steering our course towards the dictatorship of the proletariat in the form of the Soviet system.

We do not shut our eyes to the fact that such a dictatorship will put before the Chinese people the hardest economical and international problems. The Chinese proletariat constitutes a smaller part of the population of China than the proletariat did on the eve of the October Revolution in Russia. Chinese capitalism is more backward than Russian capitalism was.

But difficulties are conquered not by illusions, not by a policy of adventure, not by hopes of a Chiang Kai-Shek, nor of a "democratic dictatorship". Difficulties are conquered by clear thinking and a revolutionary will.

The Chinese proletariat is coming to power not in order to resurrect the Chinese Wall and under its protection to build a national socialism. By conquering power the Chinese proletariat will conquer one of the most important strategic positions for the international revolution. The destiny of China, as well as the destiny of the U.S.S.R. can not be considered except in relation to the revolutionary movement of the world proletariat. This is the source of greatest hopes and the justification of the highest revolutionary courage.

The cause of the international revolution is the cause of the Chinese revolution. The cause of the Chinese revolution is the cause of the international revolution.

THE MILITANT NEEDS AID!

A couple of months ago, the Militant announced that during the summer period it would be compelled to go back to semi-monthly publication, after which it would resume its weekly appearance. The summer months have drawn to a close and we are anxious to make every effort to publish the Militant as a weekly once more.

With its initial appearance, the Militant set itself the aim of reaching the workers with the truth. To tell the workers the truth about the capitalist system and the capitalist class is to liberate them from the mental slavery under which they live. To tell the truth about the situation in the revolutionary and labor movements is to liberate them from the illusions and deceptions practised against them by false leaders. To analyze and foretell events, by the teachings learned from Marx, Engels, Lenin and Trotsky, is to help arm the working class in its fight for final emancipation. The Militant has one this systematically and with perseverance.

We have already accomplished a great work in clarifying the ranks of the revolutionary movement. But the big tasks we have set ourselves have only been begun. We are not deterred by the difficulties, nor by the malicious slanders of our adversaries in the labor and Communist movements. The powerful apparatus and machinery they possess cannot overcome the which the strength of the Militant lies.

The coming months will be filled with events of international importance. The class struggle grows more intense in China, in India, the Soviet Union, in Germany and Austria, in the United States and elsewhere. The Militant will strive to the utmost to inform its readers truthfully about what happens and analyze and interpret these events from the revolutionary point of view. In this country, it is a work that the Militant alone is doing.

But its semi-monthly publication is a great handicap. Our paper was created and maintained for almost two years by the efforts of a small group of rebels. Upon their shoulders has been placed the burden of support. Very little effort has been made to appeal for assistance to the militants outside our organization.

We want to re-establish the weekly as soon as possible. Towards this end, a fund must be created that will secure its regular publication. Every reader and friend of the Militant can and should contribute to this fund. Financial support can be rendered in two ways:

Send in a donation immediately as your share; or

Pledge and pay a sum regularly every month for the next six months. Twenty five to fifty cents a week ($1.00 to $2.00 a month) will not be a burden upon an employed reader, but a few score of such pledges will mean a weekly Militant.

We are appealing to every reader of the paper. Respond generously and quickly. The moderate assistance of every comrade added together, will make a Fund that will supply the needed foundation for the Weekly. Send bills, checks, or money-orders to the Militant, 25 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. Do your share in the drive!

All the mistakes that were made are due to my inherent scoundrelism. My principal error was my failure to realize what a smart bunch of comrades we have in the Political Bureau. I know better now. I request that I be severely punished (you can't be too hard on me), and should anything go wrong in the future I offer to take all the blame for it in advance. You see, I'll be blamed for it anyway".

13 Years of Russian Revolution!

The socialist fatherland is thirteen years old this week! It is worth reminding those who have come to take it for granted, that the first stormy days of the Russian revolution were the days of those false prophets in the camp of the capitalists and their "socialist" assistants who predicted that the "Russian chaos" would dissolve in a few weeks into a peaceful capitalist democracy. The few weeks became a few months. The few months gave way to a few years. The capitalist class, so firmly convinced that their services as masters are indispensable to society, could not imagine the working class not only taking the state power into its own hands, but running it successfully for more than a decade and organizing a classless society. The social democrats, steeped in their parliamentary-democratic prejudices, and reflecting the hopes of the master class they really serve, refused and still refuse to give sanction to a proletariat that came to power by any means other than that of the MacDonalds, the Hillquits, the Vanderveldes, the Noskes and Muellers. The thirteenth anniversary of the Russian revolution adds another tombstone over these rotten prophets. The proletariat has shown its ability to seize power, to hold it, and to lay the foundations for a new society, thus opening a new chapter in the history of human kind.

THE OBSTACLES IN THE ROAD

To the Russian proletariat and its party, the Bolsheviks, go the honor of being the first. They have drawn with bold, majestic strokes the outlines of the road the working class everywhere must travel in order to emancipate itself from the yoke of capitalist enslavement. Never before has a ruling class been subjected to such arduous tasks, or confronted with such apparently insurmountable obstacles. The wrack and ruin of the imperialist war; the oppressive heritage of czarist backwardness, ignorance, bureaucracy; the devastation of the civil war organized by the domestic reaction and backed by foreign imperialism; the direct military intervention of Wilson, Poincare, Benes, the Milkado, the Kaiser, Lloyd George and Co; the economic and then the credit blockade; the ravages of the famine—the plagues of biblical times could hardly have been worse than these.

Added to these obstacles, which a state where the few rule could never have overcome, have been difficulties of another nature. The Russian proletariat came to power under the Red Flag, the banner of the international working class revolution. It calculated upon the rapid and indispensable development of the revolution in other countries to come to its aid. A combination of circumstances—some of which might have been averted by correct Bolshevik strategy—set back the revolutionary movement, and compelled the Russian working class and peasantry to continue the work of defending and strengthening the proletarian fortress by their own direct efforts. That enormous progress has already been made since the day when power was taken, in the face of the burdensome, unwanted heritage of the past, is eloquent proof of the giant's vitality of the proletariat, its immense capacities, and the inspiring power of the socialist ideal.

THE TREACHERY OF THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATS

At the same time, it is implicit with the truth that the state aid of the revolutionary proletariat of Europe would have changed infinitely more the complexion of society today, would have produced successes before which those attained on a national scale would shrink into insignifi-ficance. The treachery of the social democrats, who sold their proletarian ideals for the right to serve the capitalist class in the ranks of the working class, is revealed in truly monstrous proportions in the lights of this fact. Their effective work in stemming the revolutionary tide—frequently at the safe end of machine guns—is the historical crime that has set back society for a decade and threatens to set it back for another.

But these are not the only difficulties of the Soviet power. To ignore the others, today more acute than ever, is to do that peculiar, detestable dis-service to the revolutionary cause for which a whole section of the Communist movement and its leadership primarily, has been selected. The infuriated cries of these courtiers and courtesans, who regard revolutionary critics as lese majeste, make this criticism all the more imperative, for its absence is a guarantee of decadence.

The threat to the Russian proletarian revolution to which we refer is a reflection of the whole capitalist encirclement of the U. S. S. R., of the pressure of imperialism and the war danger from without, and the upward strivings of the capitalist elements within the Soviet Union itself. The danger is embodied in the ruling regime within the Bolshevik party, the corrosive course of Centrism oscillating between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie, embodied in the dominant Stalin faction. The Party and the revolution have been sincerely punished by it.

For proletarian internationalism, the Stalinist usurpers have substituted a petty-bourgeois nationalism, a "consoling" philosophy of socialism "in one country." For the live, pulsing, vigorous proletarian Party, Stalinism has substituted a hideous caricature in which all that is retained of democratic centralism is an exaggerated bureaucratic domination, where the Party worker does not dare to criticize or speak his mind. For the fighters and leaders of the October revolution whom it has sent into Siberian exile, in the prison, into banishment, it has substituted a servile group of incompetent yes-men. For the policies of Lenin, triumphant at every time, it has elaborated a revisionist concoction which produces only defeats and setbacks, and that not only in the Soviet Union, but throughout the world revolutionary movement. In undermining the revolutionary proletarian base of the Bolshevik party it is undermining the October revolution. It has led the workers' republic from one crisis to another, barely escaping catastrophe only because it adopted, at the last minute, one part or other of the platform of the Leninist Opposition it persecutes so rabidly. Our allegiance to Bolshevism, our fealty to the October revolution which has changed only by becoming more profound and staunch, compels us to aid the cause of the world revolution by indicating the danger threatening it and organizing the struggle against it.

THE MEANING OF THE OPPOSITION

The proudest heritage of the world proletarian vanguard, the teachings of Marx, Engels, Lenin and Trotsky, the foundations of the Bolshevik revolution, are embodied in the Left Opposition. It is pledged to defend them tenaciously, without yielding to the assaults of capitalism or its socialist retainers, or to the ravaging attacks of Stalinism. The vanguard fighters hail the 13th year as the victory of Bolshevism, but not of Stalinism. Our warmest greetings to the proletariat of the U. S. S. R.! Our warm and comradely salute to the courageous fighters of the Bolshevik Opposition whom a usurpatory clique has confined in dungeons and exile, and to their leader and ours, comrade Trotsky!

Long live Bolshevism and the world revolution!

—S.N.

RESULTS OF THE ELECTION

Outstanding in the national elections just concluded is the enormous increase of Democratic party strength in the country, raising it to a power it has not enjoyed since the days of Woodrow Wilson's administration. To state it more accurately, it should be said that the most significant feature was the almost unprecedented defeat of Hoover administration.

Hoover and his party were swept into office with an immense majority in 1928. Traditional Democratic strongholds in the South were captured for the first time since the Civil War. Despite the relatively huge vote for Smith at that time, the Democratic party seemed to have received a blow at its very vitals.

The 1928 Hoover was the great monument to the unparalleled "prosperity", the fat years of American capitalism.

The Democratic Sweep

Speaking volumes for the jerky and abrupt rapidity of events and changes in our times, less than two years in office were required to deliver an even more crushing blow to the administration than Smith suffered in the presidential elections. Lost fortresses have been retaken by the Democrats. The most extravagant predictions of Democratic leaders pale before the actual returns. As colorless a candidate as Roosevelt succeeded, in spite of the stigma of Tammany Hall, in piling up an absolutely unprecedented plurality. Mossy Republican states like Ohio, Illinois, Kansas and elsewhere went Democratic. In Minnesota, a Democratic Senator was returned for the first time in almost three-quarters of a century. The Democrats took over most governorships and lost but one. They have changed the relationship of forces in both houses of Congress, where it appears at this writing that they may be sufficiently represented to organize both houses for themselves. In a word, Hoover and the Republican Party were almost everywhere heavily snowed under.

In 1930 Hoover defeat is the first political tombstone erected to mark the passing of prosperity.

The fierce crisis, with its mass unemployment, has made its mark on the elections. Even the hardy perennial of American politics, prohibition, took a distant second place. The intoxication even of the masses with a delusive prosperity which produced the tremendous Hoover majority, has given way a blind dissatisfaction of the masses with the crisis and its ravaging effects. The Democratic party was "endorsed" only in the most purely parliamentary sense. In actuality, the Democrats were not so much the recipients of an endorsement as the Republicans—short-sighted held solely responsible for the crisis, instead of being regarded as one of the pillars of capitalism which produced the crisis—were the recipients of a condemnation.

Hoover is the staunchest representative of capitalist reaction, as is the principal opposing party—the Democratic. The revolt against the Republican party was not led by the big bourgeoisie, but by the petty bourgeoisie, the middle class so brutally hit by the crisis. The middle class led the mass of the workers and poor farmers behind it, directing the futile revolt into the stagnant pool of the second capitalist party.

The profound dissatisfaction of the masses is incontestable. Equally incontestable is the fact that the proletariat in the United States has not yet taken the first big steps to break away from the ideological and organizational dominance of the bourgeoisie. If the votes for the Democrats do not prove this sufficiently, the votes for the Communist and Socialist parties do.

The Socialist vote must have been a great disappointment to those who received it. In spite of the contemptibly petty bourgeois, reformist campaign it conducted—revolting to any class conscious worker—it only superficially doubled its vote (according to reports at hand up to now). We say superficially, because in reality, it did little more than stagnate. In New York City, for instance, the standard bearer, Weldman, doubled his 1928 vote, it is true, but recorded no increase over the 1922 vote, not to speak of Thomas' mayoralty vote last year, or Hillquit's 1917 vote. For a so-called "radical" party today to double, or even treble its vote in comparison with a pre-crisis i. e. 1928 or earlier, vote, is no achievement at all. The S. P. received thousands of petty bourgeois votes; its disgraceful Jewish-nationalist campaign in some districts ("every good Jew should vote for Vladeck") brought it many nationalistic votes. But the distribution of its vote nevertheless shows that this petty bourgeois party of capitalist democracy gained a majority of its support from workers.

The Communist Vote

This is all the more noteworthy in face of the poor showing of the Communist Party, a penalty for which Stalinism makes our Party pay. In New York City (the only count at hand at this writing) Foster got 15,560 votes more than double the Weinstein vote of last year. But that was a humiliating low point for the Party. The Party's banner bearer this year did not succeed, however, in even doubling the 1928 gubernatorial vote, that is, a vote cast before the crisis or the unemployment! The tottering S. L. P., with less than one-tenth the Party's apparatus or influence, quadrupled its 1928 gubernatorial vote!

We will return more exhaustively to the results of the elections in the next issue.

In the Next Issue

Pressure of space, due largely to the need of publishing the declaration of the Marine Workers' Opposition, compelled us to omit from this issue a number of very important articles: the A. F. of L. convention in Boston, a complete analysis of the elections, the continuation of Trotsky's article on Stalin as a theoretician, and many others. They will all appear in the next number of the paper, which will be printed in about a week in order to make up for the delay in publishing the present number.

The Coming Dressmakers Strike

The Bureaucratic Leadership Fails to Make Real Preparations

The situation and the problems confronting the needle trade workers and the N. T. W. I. U. at present need a sober and careful evaluation. For years now, the needle trade workers of America have fought against the bosses, against the treacherous brand of leadership, and for a working class trade union. But all their unheard-of sacrifices and hard won conditions, were sold by the Right wing fakers for a few pieces of silver to the bosses. The consistent policy of the Right wing clique, in working hand in hand with the bosses, has been carried on at the expense of the workers.

For years the Left wing, under the leadership of the T. U. E. L. has gathered and molded the discontent and rebellious spirit of the needle trade workers into an organized sentiment. As a result of that work, the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union came to life, representing all the branches of the trade and endowed with the faithful devotion of thousands of class conscious, experienced fighters.

Since its inception, the N. T. W. I. U. has had a number of very instructive experiences, which must serve us as a guide in discussing the tasks facing the union at present. Not one of the lessons, whether it was a victory or a defeat for the workers, can be lost sight of in our present preparations for a general strike of the dress makers, who are a very important branch in our union.

The Strike Plan

The demands and the plan for preparation of the dress strike to be called this coming February, were adopted by the shop delegates' council on October 6, followed by a meeting of the membership a week later. There is no doubt that the question of the strike in its entirety must time and again be elaborated upon and discussed in a far different manner than it was at the delegates council. The discussion certainly did not reflect the importance of the strike issue. On the contrary, there was no desire on the part of the delegates supporting the official point of view to open the discussion, which reveals the very abnormal situation that must be remedied. Why was there no spontaneous desire on the part of the delegates to discuss the plans and demands? Why did the voice of the shop have no desire to speak? Because the atmosphere is stifling, hostile to any view opposing the official decision and leadership — mechanically controlled to such an extent that there is no more place for reason.

New and undesirable precedents are gaining a foothold in the council. No more reports, which should properly precede the discussion. Just "concise" minutes as a matter of record. The reports have been eliminated so that the manager—or as at present, the secretary of the executive committee of the staff—should be assured of not making any deviations.

The discussion that takes place is invariably centered upon an attack on those opposing the official "minutes", thereby undermining the interest of the council delegates. The lack of attendance of the elected delegates has caught the eye even of the official leaders—blind as they are to existing facts and conditions.

The demands for the strike and the plan for preparation was brought down to the council on a string of thin air, completely detached from objective and subjective conditions existing at present in the trade and the union. There was not even an attempt on the part of the leadership to give the delegates a bird's eye view of our strength, the strength or weakness of the enemy (the bosses and the Right wing), the general situation, etc. The demands brought down to us, were not in conjunction with, nor an outgrowth of, a thorough analysis. They were handed down to the council in the same manner as changes in organizational forms and personnel were previously handed down. Take it or leave it—like it or not.

The Strike Demands

The demands are the following: Week work, seven-hour day, minimum wage for various crafts, unemployment insurance. Is there anything wrong with the demands? The dress makers have fought real militant battles for the abolition of piece work. We all know that piece work is degrading for the worker, that it is a source of more profit for the bosses and fierce exploitation for the workers.

It is high time for the Left wing to sound the need for week work, and lead the workers in a struggle for it.

Equally with the seven-hour day, warranted by the surplus number of workers as well as the simplified processes of production. More than that: even a still shorter working day would be applicable to the needs of the workers.

Unemployment insurance is on the order of the day.

Then why such apprehensions on the part of the membership? Why such fear at the outcome of the strike? And here is the key to the situation.

The N. T. W. I. U. convention last June decided that our orientation must be towards a general struggle in the various branches, separately or a few together, to be judged by prevailing conditions and circumstances. Four months passed and what was done in the union to raise the sentiments and inspire the workers for struggle under its leadership? Those were months of changes not for the better, but for the worse. Instead of expansion there has been a diminution of our forces. Instead of a further penetration of unorganized shops, the Right wing shops, instead of giving leadership to the workers against the treason of the Right wing officialdom we have narrowed down our base. All for the sake of securing unquestioned "unanimity"—the last thing a labor union should strive for.

The feeling of desperation that the needle trade workers received from the last strikes of the cloak and fur workers has not been wiped out by any constructive and systematic organization work.

The needle trade workers are quite aware of the fact that the International or the Amalgamated will not solve their problems, will not lead them in struggle for better conditions. But they are also convinced that the wrong policies and criminal neglect of constructive work for our union has given the A. F. of L. fakers a breathing space too long.

We see a report in the press that many hundreds of cloak makers, unemployed furriers, come to a mass meeting. They come to hear the message of the Left wing because they have no faith in the A. F. of L. fakers. The cloak and fur workers have their hope in the Left wing that lead them in such great struggles during, and some time after, the Joint Action fight. But all these workers are out of our ranks organizationally and don't entrust their daily struggles to us only because the Industrial Union leadership has made so many blunders.

To regain the faith and trust of the workers, the Industrial Union must begin real organization work. Every member, regardless of political beliefs, must be drawn into the work. Wide-spread, immediate colonization of union members in non-union shops colonization and concentration on a substantial number of shops controlled by the Right wing. The outcome of the strike will also depend on the strength of the wedge that we will success in driving into the International, shop conferences from organized and unorganized shops; not fake, spectacular press reports, but well prepared and carefully planned conferences as will raise the spirit of the workers rather than dampen it.

Preliminary strikes in shops with comparatively worse conditions, street meetings, especially in Italian and Spanish languages. The building up of an active on as the moving force during the period of preparation and the strike itself. General meetings in all localities, bulletins and systematic publicity, and a number of other means must become the task of the day.

The Danger to the Strike

In a word, it is not in the demands that the trouble lies, as the critics of the Lovestone group would have us believe. The principal danger confronting the strike is the one that was so ruinous in the last strikes of the Industrial Union: bluff instead of solid preparations. It must be said now, and quite openly: Unless our union begins with serious work of preparation, drawing in all elements ready to International — demanding organization — are organized into groups by us to carry on a systematic fight against Schlesinger; unless the Left wing changes its disastrous policy of regarding every worker outside the Industrial Union as a "social Fascist"; unless these steps are taken—the coming dress makers' strike is certain to end just like the furriers' strike: in a debacle.

It is up to the serious Left wing militants in the union to compel serious preparations. The conditions of the workers make it possible to have a successful strike. What is needed is that the Industrial Union fulfill its tasks.

—SYLVIA BLEEKER

Sylvan Pollack for the Opposition

In response to a demand for a reply to the questions mentioned below, comrade Sylvan A. Pollack sent the following statement to the Central Control Commission of the Party. His endorsement of the standpoint of the Left Opposition is a further indication of the ferment taking place in the Party, and the refusal to swallow the opportunist-adventurist policy and leadership foisted upon the movement. Comrade Pollack, editor of Solidarity, the official organ of the Workers International Relief, and its agit-prop director, has been a member of the Party since its foundation in 1919, and active in its ranks and in the class struggle in various fields. While in the anthracite coal region as district organizer for the International Labor Defense this July, he was arrested, charged with sedition, and is now out on bail awaiting trial. For a couple of years, he was on the Daily Worker staff, and assisted in the relief work during the Passaic, Gastonia, and New Bedford strikes. Militant readers will recall the series of articles on the textile situation he wrote under the pen-name of Frank Bromley. Comrade Pollack, in past internal Party disputes, was a supporter of the old Ruthenberg group. His study of the question since the first expulsion for "Trotskyism" have convinced him, like many others, of the correctness of the Opposition standpoint, and the need for its adoption by the Party.

In your letter of October 9, you ask me three questions which I will reply to point by point.

Question 1. "What is your opinion about Trotskyism and the Trotskyite group in the United States?"

The "Trotsky" group (Left Opposition), is conducting a campaign for the reestablishment of the Leninist line in the American party as well as in the Communist International. For that reason I agree with the program of the Communist League of America (Opposition) and believe that all party members and Communist sympathizers should support it. As one who has been a member of the Communist Party since its formation in September 1919 and who has always actively participated in the class struggle, I have, after long and objective study, come to the realization that only by supporting the Left Opposition and adopting its point of view will the international Communist movement regain the strength it had when led by Lenin and Trotsky.

Question 2. "What in your opinion, is their line and activities in relation to the Party and the Comintern? And in relation to the class struggle in general?"

The Left Opposition, under the leadership of Comrade Trotsky internationally and the Communist League here in the United States has formulated the correct policies that must be followed by the Communist movement, that is, a return to the program of Lenin. The national socialism that has been substituted for the Leninist position of the Comintern since Stalin usurped power, must be ended, together with his un-Communist program of "socialism in one country." Comrade Trotsky and the other exiled members of the Russian party must be reinstated and allowed to participate freely in the work of the Party in the Soviet Union. The same rights should be given to the Opposition in the American Party as well as in all other Communist Parties. The expelled members of the American Party should be reinstated and give their aid in the American class struggle. With the unemployment situation becoming more serious and the possibility for mass work especially bright, a Communist party united on Leninist basis is of paramount importance.

Question 3. "Do you have any sympathies whatsoever, with them, or do you agree with the Party that they must be exposed and fought relentlessly as enemies of the Party and of the Comintern and as enemies of the working class, with whom we can have no fraternization, no sympathies whatsoever?"

As my reply to the other questions point out clearly, I do not consider the Left Opposition as enemies of the party or of the working class. In my opinion, the program of the Left Opposition, which is the program of Lenin, will help the Communist movement recuperate from its defeats of the recent past and go forward to victories. Instead of being "renegades," as the supporters of the Left Opposition are called in the official Party press, they are the real defenders and exponents of Communism. In supporting the Left Opposition, I am only continuing the line of revolutionary Marxism I adopted when joined the Communist Party at its foundation in 1919, the same line defended by Lenin and the real founders of the international Communist movement. Instead of putting ridiculous, "Inquisition" questions to Communist militants who differ with the ruling group, we should raise the demands that the Party must eventually adopt:

Reinstate Trotsky and the other expelled Bolsheviks to their rightful places in the ranks of the Communist International!

End the campaign of suppression of all working class expression in the Communist movement!

Stop the false estimation of events that have become the order of the day in the "third period"!

For a real, and not a stupid, bureaucratic struggle against the liquidators of the Right wing.

Unite the Communist movement for an offensive against the capitalist class!

Long live the international Communist movement! Long live the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics!

SYLVAN A. POLLACK

As we go to press, we receive word from Chicago that comrade Ida Levin has been expelled by the Stalinists for her support of the viewpoint of the Left Opposition. Expulsion, ignorance, and terror—these are the answers the Party leaders give to the militants who raise questions of principle.

On the Proposal for a New Farmer-Labor Party Fraud

In this letter we wish to elaborate on the brief and hurried note sent to you on September 27. We are in a better position to act now because we have had the opportunity to think more thoroughly of the questions involved, because we have received the point of view of comrade Swaback, and the minutes of your executive committee meeting of October 8 1930.

Four questions are involved, which are all connected with each other and touch upon our fundamental principled position, for maintaining which the Foster group of Centrists combined with the Lovestone Right wing to expel us from the Party and hound us in the revolutionary and labor movements. If we approach these questions from the standpoint of expediency, the need of snap decisions someone compels us to make by a certain date, or from an allegation that a combination of circumstances exists in which our theories and principles are not supposed to hold, we are guaranteed in advance to make terrific blunders, to retard our progress, and compromise our movement. Our point of departure in these as in other important questions can only be that of revolutionary Marxists who do not yield on principles.

I

What Party shall we support in the Minnesota elections: the Communist Party or the Farmer-Labor Party? We believe that the decision of the Minneapolis branch on this point is absolutely correct. We support the only Party of the proletariat, the Communist Party, and oppose the petty bourgeois Farmer-Labor Party and in this we have the approach, not of a faction, but of our class. The official C.P. is not merely the only political organization in the elections that speaks for Communism and the revolutionary overthrow of capitalism, it is the only Party that represents and defends the interests of the proletariat. Does it do this intelligently, or correctly at all times? There is no dispute among us on that point! It does not. The marionette leadership imposed upon the Party is distorting and discrediting the cause and name of Communism, it defends the proletariat's interests badly at times, and even inflicts great damage upon the cause of the workers. But in spite of that it differs from all other parties by the fact that it DOES defend these interests and the workers who come to its support do it not because of the Reeves and Browders but in spite of them. That is precisely why we, who represent the future of the movement today urge the workers to support the Communist ticket at the same time that we subject the Party leadership and its destructive policies to a merciless criticism. By refusing to take responsibility for the blunders of Stalinism, we uphold the cause of Communism before the workers. The Farmer-Labor Party, on the other hand, represents and defends the interests of the petty-bourgeoisie in the cities and the better off elements among the farmers—the latter dominating the Party in alliance with the corrupt trade union bureaucracy and careerist bourgeois politicians a la Shipstead, Olson and Co.

Take the characteristic case of Lundeen. In which direction has he gone? Unmistakably to the Right. Yesterday, he collaborated with the Communists at least in the so-called "anti-imperialist" work and in the political movement. Today he opposes the Communists and collaborates with the leaders of the Party, which from the letter of O'Flaherty himself, is dominated by the Backus power and lumber interests, and willy-nilly he serves as a mask for these interests. (Lundeen, it is well to bear in mind is to be one of the fathers of the new movement planned for the Northwest.) If it really is a question of what "tail we should ride"—and in actuality it is not at all—then we unhesitatingly choose our Party as against that of Backus-Shipstead-Lundeen. What divides us from Stalinist Centrism is how to make the revolution; what divides us from Farmer-Laborism is why to make the revolution. The one division can be bridged, the other cannot.

II

The official Party is not a fetish with us. Our relations to it depend upon a multitude of circumstances which differ at various times and places. In general, our attitude is pressure from within the Party

The letter printed on this page was recently sent by the national committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) to its Minneapolis branch. The occasion for the letter was a proposal made to the League to participate in the founding of a "general Left wing paper" in Minneapolis, to be launched after a conference on October 13 1930, at Superior, Wisconsin. The conference was initiated by the directors of the newly-founded "Farmer-Labor Party of Montana", a movement centering around the Producers News of Plentywood, Montana, edited by Charles Taylor and T. J. O'Flaherty, and has been endorsed by the leaders of the Finnish cooperatives in Superior (Halonon and others recently expelled from the Communist Party), by the Lovestone group, and by a scattering of individuals formerly active in various Farmer-Labor Party ventures. The significance of the conference does not at all in any "mass movement" it represents, because it doesn't, but in the thoroughly opportunist conceptions inspiring it. Not the least important of its features is the growing reapproachment between the Lovestone faction and the Right wing Finns who find a common basis in such opportunists adventures, as well as in their general conceptions.—Ed.

by those workers whom we convince of the correctness of our position and by class conscious militants outside the Party. This means a firmly welded Opposition movement, which it must be our primary duty to strengthen. Particularly in Minneapolis, where the relation of forces is very advantageous to us, our efforts should be concentrated upon recruiting revolutionary workers directly into our ranks. We are not building a second Party, so we have little to worry about from the empty accusations to that effect made against us by the Party bureaucrats whose own policies and acts have systematically cultivated the seeds of opportunism and social democracy within and without the Party itself. In this sense, the action of comrade Cowl is incorrect.

Why should this position be construed as leading to "isolation", to "sectarianism"? All analyses that conclude in this manner may be based upon conjecture and upon a sound refusal to become disconnected from the masses, but they are surely not based upon the experiences of the movement, not in one but in many countries. Where has the impatient desire to become a strong movement over night and at any price, led other groups in the Opposition before us? The hostility towards the official Party shown by the Paz group, and its contacts with the Right wing in an attempt to build some sort of a bloc led not to mass contact but to Paz's isolation. Brandler's "mass movement" and conferences for "unity" with Left social democratic elements, his open opposition to the official Party in the Saxon elections led to the inevitable result: thousands of workers who originally followed the Right wing deserted it.

Our position, on the other hand, like that of our French and German comrades, has strengthened us. We have gained new and invaluable recruits from the Party ranks (and we will gain more, and in addition, we have won the organizational adherence and sympathy (especially in New York) of revolutionary workers outside the Party.

III

As to the "Left wing" paper to be published in Minneapolis, as proposed by Taylor and O'Flaherty, in what way can we involve ourselves in responsibility for it? In your minutes of August 9, 1930 it says: "The policy of the paper according to O'Flaherty will be that of a general Communist organ with a humorous touch. Will not be the organ of any faction, although he proposes to work in harmony with the local E.C. and the N.E.C. of the League. Wants the paper to cover the Northwest class struggle with a national and international perspective. Expects to solicit the support of prominent Farmer-Laborites like Lundeen and others." The proposal of O'Flaherty for the character of the paper is the principal "humorous touch". It will not be the organ of any faction (that is, presumably, of neither our Group nor Lovestone's) but it will have a national and international perspective. What kind of a perspective? Lovestone's? Ours? The two differ sharply. Or will it be "national and international perspective", i. e., its political outlook and policy, be neither Lovestone's nor ours nor that of the official Party? Then whose will it be?

Comrade Cowl raises a pertinent question when he envisages an editorial board "let us say composed of O'Flaherty, Taylor, Halonon, Gitlow and Dunne or Skoglund" (and maybe, Lundeen!). What will the policy of such a board be towards "two-class parties", towards the Indian or Chinese revolution, towards the dispute in the Communist movement towards the cooper-ative's role in the class struggle towards the "new unions", in a word towards the whole complex of world and domestic problems which cry out for solution? We think the envisaged composition of the editorial board is a guarantee that the paper will be anything but "in harmony with the local E.C. and the N.E.C. of the League". How will we be able to assume responsibility—without indelibly compromising ourselves—for a paper which sways helplessly between the Left Opposition and Lovestone or the Superior Finnish movement, or the Lundeenites or similar nondescript elements.

We are not opposed to a popular paper which concentrates upon agitating among the workers for a certain minimum program without being definitely and avowedly stamped as the organ of any specific section of the movement. We have had such papers in the movement before, and they have been of service. But at the same time it must be dominated by a distinct political conception and guidance, which will not and cannot be the case with the proposal under consideration. The paper will either be torn to pieces by contending viewpoints as soon as an important question arises, or else it will go along with the Right wing combination represented by Lovestone, Halonon and others, and compel us to fight it openly from the beginning.

IV

1. The proposed paper is only the literary expression of the other proposal: the formation of a "Farmer-Labor Party movement in the Northwest". Upon what and whom is the movement—which is in our opinion enormously exaggerated by the Montana people—based? All evidence points to the farmers and not the workers. The so-called "movement" has begun in Sheridan County, Montana, where it is avowedly based upon the farmers, as can be gathered by a reading of the Producers News. The only other "concrete" instance is North Dakota, where a handful of individuals, formerly associated with such movements has been revived. The exclusively agricultural nature of that state needs no exposition. With the exception of a really insignificant movement among a small group of miners in Illinois, these two (Sheridan County and the North Dakota tempest in a teapot) are the only instances adduced to prove the spread of the Farmer-Labor Party movement. Both of them are farmers' movements in every sense.

As we pointed out in our note of September 27, "The base of the Communist movement is the industrial proletariat. It is not our task to organize the farmers politically into a party. The Comintern everywhere (and in the U.S. particularly) almost broke its neck in similar adventures which had nothing to do with Marxism". Is it not of great significance for us that the further East one goes, i. e., the further one goes towards the section of the country where the industrial proletariat predominates there is less and less of any distinct labor or farmer-labor movement afoot?

2. What becomes of our principled position on "two class parties" in this situation? Has it lost its validity? We think not. Do the adventures with Raditch in Yugoslavia, mean nothing? Does the criminal gamble of Stalin-Bucharin with the "four class" party of the Kuo Min Tang, which wrung the neck of the Chinese revolution and set back the world revolution for years, bear no warning for us? Does the "two class party" formed by Stalin-Bucharin-Roy in India, which has left the Indian proletariat without revolutionary leadership especially in these critical days, teach no lessons? And finally, are the instructive and rich experiences with "two class parties" in the United States, from 1924 to this day, to be lost not only upon Lovestone and the Stalinists but upon us Marxists as well? The articles on the lessons of the Minnesota F.L.P. written for the Militant by our Minneapolis comrades, are worth re-reading, especially comrade Dunne's and comrade Hedlund's recent article endorsed by the Minneapolis branch. What great change has occurred since Hedlund's article?

This whole venture, therefore, is born under an inauspicious star: the two class party. The fact that Taylor and O'Flaherty, who declare their agreement with us on most other questions, are making arguments today so vehemently for a two class party should be already sufficient to make us hesitate. Taylor's arguments are reminiscent of Bucharin in the worst days of the Kuo Min Tang adventure. According to him, the Montana farmers (at least) are virtually proletarians by now! What should make us hesitate even more is that Taylor writes that Gitlow "remarked that he was surprised if the Trotskyists acquiesced, because of the Trotsky position against the 'two class Party'." And good grounds for surprise if we were to cast overboard our elementary principled position on this question for the sake of a bloc with Gitlow and the Superior Finns, who, like Taylor see nothing wrong with Communists not only joining a two-class party (and "so-called" is a correct adjective, for in reality it is the petty bourgeoisie that runs these parties), but in advocating their initiation and organization. They see nothing wrong in it, because they also agreed and still do agree with the Kuo Min Tang policy of the Comintern, and Roy's policy in India, and the rest of the decalogue of the Right wing in the Communist movement and evidently with the whole Pepperistic conception of the "revolutionary farmers", and Federated Farmer-Laborism. But that is no reason for our supporting such a reactionary hotch-potch.

It is true as comrade Dunne says, that Pepper cannot be credited with originating the idea of a farmers and workers party (that probably goes to Stalin), but Pepper can be "credited" (together with Lovestone and Co.) with having led the American movement through all the disgraceful adventures with Farmer-Laborism in America, with the ideas of the notorious "August thesis", that every political party has a farmer-labor party of its won, that out of the F. L. P. would develop the "mass Communist Party" over night that the Communists—confronted with the "third American revolution"—would become the unblushing hangers-on to the LaFollette kite, etc., etc. Lovestone wants to repeat the yesterdays that should never have occurred. O'Flaherty and the Finns apparently want to turn backwards the wheel of Communist experience and history while we want to move it forward. In that sense we stated before: "It is not our job to revive Pepperism in the northwest but to liquidate all remnants of it."

3. Finally, the Superior conference. We are decidedly opposed to any participation of our group in this conference, just as we are opposed to participating in the formation and promotion of the new paper and "the movement" rising out of it. Our position must be stated categorically and without concealment, so that this agglomeration of opportunists is prevented from carrying out its negotiations and dickering behind the scenes. What unity could we possibly expect to establish there? The conference is the second inauspicious star of this new "movement". Our position is not determined geographically, and we do not condemn a unity or bloc with the Right wing in Germany, or in New York, only to accept it in Wisconsin. It is proposed to unite all the Communists "not under the organizational whip of Stalin". But being in that state is no particular virtue in itself? At Superior it is proposed that the variegated elements represented there should form a "Communist" nucleus, a "caucus" to represent Communist policies and interests in a "broader Left wing conference". What sort of Communist policies will be represented by a caucus embracing the Lovestone liquidators, the Superior business cooperators (we reiterate the appellation, because it is entirely true), the two

Marine Workers' Rank and File Revolts

AN APPEAL OF THE MEMBERS OF THE MARINE WORKERS INDUSTRIAL UNION

For some time conditions in the Marine Workers Industrial Union have been very bad. They are going from bad to worse all the time. It is necessary to look into these conditions, to find out what's been happening and why it's been happening—and to find a way out of the crisis in which our union finds itself. It is the duty of every member of our union to face the facts squarely and to make proposals for improving the situation and really building our organization into a genuine militant union.

It is in this fight that we present the following criticisms, suggestions, and recommendations. We hope that the fellow-workers will see it this way and will rally to our support, back up this appeal and fight for the proposals we are making.

OUR AIM

1. Our aim is to build one powerful industrial union uniting all the marine transport workers in the country.

2. Any worker in the marine transport industry regardless of race, creed, color or political opinion, should be eligible for membership in our union.

3. The purpose of the union must be to fight for the bettering of the conditions of the marine workers, to raise wages, shorten hours, improve living conditions, fight against the speed-up, for bigger gangs on the docks and bigger crews on the ships and lighter draughts on the docks for longshoremen, for better food, etc.

4. We are against the whole capitalist system which is responsible for the misery of the workers in all industries. We are unalterably opposed to all imperialist wars. We believe in the international solidarity and militant action of the marine workers to insure better conditions, to fight against imperialist wars, and for the defense of the Soviet Union, today the only workers Republic in the world. We are for a workers Republic in the United States.

5. At this time the most serious problem facing the marine workers is unemployment. There are more than 250,000 marine workers (longshoremen, harbor workers, etc.) jobless and hungry. The economic crisis and the speed-up system are continually increasing the army of unemployed by leaps and bounds. That is why all our activities in building up our union must today center around the fight against unemployment. While fighting for unemployment insurance we must not forget that we must get immediately for ourselves food and shelter—actual instant relief.

TACTICS

6. We must mobilize the workers first of all for the struggle for our immediate needs, for the improvement of our working and living conditions. Only in this way can we get the greatest number of workers into the fight against the bosses. In rallying workers to struggle we must resort to education, organization of our ranks, strikes, organization for the unemployed, organization of the unorganized, and similar tactics to build our union.

7. We must work to build a powerful Left wing movement in all other organizations of the marine workers, thus making possible their unification into one industrial union in the industry. In the craft and conservative unions there are thousands of workers whom we must win over to our program for militant industrial unionism.

If the marine workers are to wage a successful struggle against the ship owners, we must have unity in our ranks. The sectarian policy now being pursued by the Marine Workers Industrial Union only results in segregating the class conscious workers from the masses of less advanced workers, leaving them to be used by the reactionary officials of the conservative unions against a revolutionary class struggle program.

The rank and file members of the International Seamen's Union must be won over to a class struggle program for their union and for waging a relentless struggle against the reactionary leadership (Furuseh, Olander) and to replace them by class-conscious workers from the rank and file.

The workers' opposition in the International Longshoremen's Association must be supported in their fight to oust the reactionary leaders (Joe Ryan) from their union and an educational campaign must be carried on within their ranks to win them over for the cause of the revolutionary class struggle.

The membership of the Associated Marine Workers who are already in rebellion against their reactionary leadership (Captain Maer) must be won over to our cause and a vigorous campaign must be made to unite these key men with workers on the ships and the docks in one great and powerful industrial union so that a more effective fight can be made against the ship-owners for our immediate demands and to hasten the day of complete emancipation for the working class.

8. Name calling and abuse are not the methods for winning over workers to our class struggle. Only by patient hard work in the fight for the every-day needs of the working men can we win their confidence and bring them around to our viewpoint.

9. All strikes must be prepared in advance and properly organized. The workers should first be convinced to strike. Strikes, in order to be genuine, must come through a demand of the workers themselves and not mechanically declared or forced upon the workers.

10. A union in order to be alive must consist of active members. Everything must be done to develop self-confidence to appeal to the unemployed. Although revolutionary, a program incorporating more concrete demands is necessary if the unemployed army is to be marshalled for the class struggle. . . .

We herewith present the following facts from the life and experiences of our union which entirely substantiate our criticism and which prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that only by following the constructive program we have outlined can our union become a real mass union and fight effectively for the interests of the marine workers.

BACKGROUND OF THE WRONG POLICIES OF THE BUREAUCRACY

Starting out as a club, functioning as a propaganda group in existing marine workers organizations, we failed to carry out the original program of the R. I. L. U.

This failure to build strong Left wing groups in the existing organizations was due primarily to the opposition of the leadership of our union to such a policy as first proposed by the R. I. L. U. This resistance to the original policy of the R. I. L. U. to build Left wing groups in

The Origin of the Document

The document which appears on these pages is the result of a struggle that has been going on for some time within the Marine Workers Industrial Union, and the Party fraction within it. The document itself is only a re-statement and elaboration of one presented by Party members to the marine workers fraction, which Mink, Johnstone and the rest of the Party and T. U. U. L. bureaucrats dealt within their characteristically contemptuous manner. The Stalinists have been pursuing a course in all the unions controlled by them which has put one after another of them on the rocks. The situation in the Textile Workers Union, the Miners' Union, the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, are only repetitions in other spheres of the crisis now rending the Marine Workers Industrial Union. The bunglers and worse who direct the destinies of these organizations, virtually all of which began with splendid prospects for growth and influence, have conducted such a policy of arbitrariness, mechanical control, alienation of Left Wing militants not members of one Party faction, bureaucracy, and radically false policies, that they have left a trail of ruin wherever they have stepped in. Testifying to the immense vitality of the "new union" movement, however, is the rank and file revolt expressed in this document. Out of the 17 signers who are the most active spirits in the M. W. I. U., 14 (all those marked with stars) are members of the Party. The Minks, Hineses and Harveys are now planning to expel these militants not only from the Party, but from the Union as well! At all costs this must be prevented. Such tactics can be safely left to Lewis, Sigman and Co. Let the workers discuss the situation objectively. They are capable of deciding and deciding correctly. They have no need at all for the Minks, Johnstones and Fosters to do their thinking for them, especially when "their thinking" is but a mental echo of their masters in the central apparatus of the Comintern and the R. I. L. U.

and initiative among the rank and file. Without genuine democracy in the union there can be no real live union. Bureaucracy has no place in a real union and only destroys all possibilities for building up the union, for making every member a conscious responsible, active member.

11. The leadership of our union cannot be won and should not be sought by mechanical, artificial, bureaucratic methods. Sound leadership can be won only through gaining the confidence of the workers by tireless activities and sacrifices in the everyday struggle. Leadership based on clique control, on favoritism, on stifling opinion or strangulating all the rights of the rank and file can only hurt our union.

BANKRUPTCY OF THE PRESENT LEADERSHIP AND ITS POLICIES

We indict the present leadership for its policies on the following grounds:

1. The present leadership pursues an adventurist, sectarian, utopian, unrealistic program.

2. Transforming the Marine Workers Industrial Union into an impotent sect instead of building a mass organization, a genuine union.

3. Following wrong and irresponsible organization methods.

4. Entirely neglecting and dropping all work for the building of a powerful Left wing movement in the craft and conservative unions. Substituting for such important work name calling and merely denouncing as social fascists, etc., all those who are today not in the Marine Workers Industrial Union.

5. A criminal bungling of strikes, following policies of pure adventurism; using the worst bureaucratic methods, actually sabotaging strikes and here and there even resorting to methods which are dangerously provocative.

6. The leadership has foisted upon the union a terribly bureaucratic regime and wiped out all semblance of democracy, of rank and file control in the Marine Workers Industrial Union.

7. The program for the unemployed, formulated by the T. U. U. L. and adopted by the unemployed convention at Chicago, July 4th, has proven to be too abstract the existence marine workers organizations resulted in the unconscious sabotage of the slogan "A Seaman's Club in Every Port." . . .

Upon the returning of the T. U. E. L. representative, (comrade Mink) from Moscow, he made his report with the recommendation that a new industrial union of the marine workers be formed, but comrade Foster suggested a transitional step. During the transitional stage, "The Marine Workers Progressive League" was organized. The League members were to carry our program of class-struggle into the conservative unions and wage a fight against the reactionary leaders, and to popularize the slogan of amalgamation. Comrade Foster also laid particular stress on those points of our policy which dealt with work in the existing unions, and that this work should be intensified.

Despite the fact that "The International Seamen's Club" had a considerable membership, the name of Mink was never submitted to the club members before he was sent to the R. I. L. U. Conference by the T. U. E. L. In a like manner, Foster gave the club members the "decision" that Comrade Mink was to be head of all Marine organizational activities for the T. U. E. L. This so-called "decision" was a piece of highhanded, bureaucratic conning of Foster upon which the club members were not even allowed to discuss. Who made the decision? Where did it come from? Why was it made? Why weren't the members considered or consulted?

Our activity in the existing marine workers organizations was discouraged by the leadership which told the membership of the League that membership in the existing marine workers organization was not necessary. Not only did the leadership say that it was unnecessary to belong to and carry on work in the existing unions but it even ordered all those who were members of these unions to withdraw from membership. The opposition objected to this wrong arbitrary move of the bureaucracy on the ground that the Left wing group in the Marine Firemen's Union International Seamen's Union) was in a favorable position to oust the reactionary leaders of this union and to replace them with class conscious workers from the rank and file. Mink's only answer to the opposition was:

"The quicker you comrades are expelled from them phoney unions, the quicker we'll build the League and the better I like it." . . .

INCOMPETENCE AND IRRESPONSIBILITY OF THE BUREAUCRACY

The opposition had put forward the program of spreading out in the port of Greater New York and opening up halls in other ports as rapidly as possible. Under the pressure of the opposition composed of comrades Morgan, Golden, Anderson, Shelligan, Horn, Russell, Fanning, Peltzer, Aaronson, Haigney, McGrath, and others, the leadership was forced to consent to the opening up of a hall in Baltimore. Accordingly comrade Morgan, Port Delegate for New York, equipped comrade Peltzer with a credential and supplies. Comrade Peltzer under very great difficulties and after making many sacrifices succeeded in carrying on propaganda and work for some months without receiving any financial assistance from the T. U. U. L. Despite the opposition of the leadership, comrade Morgan and Aaronson were sent by the rank and file to help comrade Peltzer in the organization work in Baltimore. After having been ousted from Anchorage Seamen's Institute) and having been set upon by the B. & O. bulls, and prevented from boarding the ships it was decided that comrade Morgan should proceed to New York and force the leadership to consent to open a hall as a base for operations, as a rallying center for organizational work.

After comrade Morgan made his report to the League meeting, the members decided in defiance of the leadership over the protest of the bureaucracy, to open a hall in Baltimore. But when the hall was finally opened the rank and file members who carried on the work without any financial assistance from the leadership were recalled. Then Hines was chosen by the bureaucracy to replace the active rank and file workers. . . . Though receiving a subsidy for seven months Hines departed from Baltimore and left nothing but an empty hall on which the rent was due. Whatever progress had been made was completely destroyed by the bureaucrats who instructed Hines to take over the New York Club as soon as he returned from Baltimore.

THE BUREAUCRATS HOLD MASSES IN CONTEMPT

The leadership of our union has nothing but contempt for the great mass of marine workers. This bureaucracy has not shown any real interest in the actual struggle of the marine workers, and has thrown away many good chances which these struggles afforded us for building up the Marine Workers Industrial Union. This contempt for the marine worker masses is shown in part by the following facts:

The leadership failed to take advantage of the opportunity to make contact with members of the Associated Marine Workers before the expiration of their agreement with the Tugboat Owners. This lack of interest shown by the bureaucrats in the struggle of these workers against their reactionary officials and the bosses really lost these workers for the cause of militant unionism.

The leadership neglected for two and a half months after the convention which launched the union, to issue any membership books or publish the "Marine Workers' Voice," our most effective means with which to acquaint the workers with what happened at the Convention. . . .

After the launching of the Union the rank and file made considerable progress among the longshoremen of Baltimore. We held a meeting in front of the I. L. A. halls. But the bureaucracy pursuing a disruptive line of tactics destroyed all our work—destroyed everything which was accomplished. Comrade Harvey acting more like a disrupter than a union organizer antagonized the longshoremen instead of trying to win them over to the cause of militant unionism. This criminal action destroyed all the progress that we had made. It broke up all the contacts which we had made with the rank and file members of the International Longshoremen's Association.

The same contemptuous attitude towards the workers was shown by Mink in New Orleans. The silly and childlike action of comrade Mink in showing off in braggadoccio manner donation checks to workers whom we were just drawing in as new members of our union in New Orleans went a long way to demoralize these workers. Comrade Mink showed off his extravagance by staying at a swell hotel while in New Orleans, while the active organizers slept on deck of the union hall and went hungry while they were doing organizing work on ships and docks. This caused many workers to raise embarrassing questions to the organizers who had to sleep on the decks. When comrade Morgan and others asked Mink why this extravagance—Mink could offer no other answer than the excuse that it was orders from the Communist Party. Another case showing the neglect of the workers by the bureaucracy, is to be found in the Independent Tide Water Boatmen's Union which has a membership of 1250 workers. It can conduct activities among 15,000 workers in the Harbor. Comrade Golden informed Mink and Hines of the League about the reported vote of the I. T. B. U. to affiliate with the Marine Workers League. But Mink and Hines just neglected to do anything about it. They even refused to get in touch with the I. T. B. U. or make any effort at all to win over workers in this organization. Thus the bureaucrats threw away another fine opportunity for winning workers to our ranks. Their contempt for the workers again showed itself. In fact this leadership even went so far as expelling members for going into the I. T. B. U., for example, Willy Lang. . . .

THE "LEADERSHIP" RUINS STRIKES

In June the opposition proposed that our union should make preparations to lead a strike of 16,000 longshoremen and seamen in the port of New Orleans in the fall of the year which is the busy season. The board of the union adopted this proposal. Comrades Morgan, Haigeny, Golden, Seaganik and Evans, were chosen to proceed to the New Orleans Port immediately. However, no funds were provided for these comrades and no support whatever was given them in order to enable them to carry out the decisions.

Despite the fact that these comrades had made many contacts in the port of New Orleans and were familiar with the situation, two other comrades totally unfamiliar with the situation in New Orleans were provided with ample funds and rushed down to New Orleans to replace the above comrades originally chosen. Under orders from the bureaucratic leadership of Hines, Harvey and Johnstone, these two members proceeded shortly after their arrival in New Orleans to call a premature strike for which no preparation whatsoever had been made. The result of this strike was to discredit the union in the eyes of the marine workers in that port. Harvey's circulation of a false news release to the effect that a 20% increase in wages was won, only further discredited our organization with the longshoremen. . . .

Yet, this fiasco which the bureaucratic leadership performed in New Orleans was advertised at the last Fifth R. I. L. U. Congress as one of the big achievements of our union. Such bluff is very costly and only hurts the best interests of the marine workers.

Exactly the same bureaucratic adventurist sabotaging policy was followed by the leadership in the recent Philadelphia strike. The night before the Atlantic District United Front Conference in Philadelphia, Sep. 20, 21, there was held a Bureau meeting of the union. Gardos, the District Organizer of the Communist Party of Philadelphia, was present. Comrade Hines was present also. Here it was decided that we should go to this united conference to propose active preparations for a strike. The workers were to go back to their jobs and set up their dock committees and take all the necessary steps for a strike.

Right after the conference there was held in Philadelphia a bureau meeting of the marine workers. There were present at this meeting in addition to the eight National Bureau members of the marine workers seven representatives of the Communist Party. Among these special representatives were Gardos, T. U. U. L. representative, etc. Gardos immediately proposed the withdrawal of the organizers from the Philadelphia field. These workers were Soderburg and Johansen. But the Bureau members protested against this proposal of Gardos. A hot discussion followed. Hudson supported Gardos by making his motion for the withdrawal of the organizers from Philadelphia field. Comrade Hoben amended this motion to the effect that the organizers should stay.

There soon followed bitter fights as to who is and who is not a bureau member. Gardos gave himself a vote. Hines and Hudson voted with him. But that was all the votes that Gardos's proposal could muster. The rank and file were against Gardos and Hines. Gardos then said:

"I, as the District Organizer of the Communist Party, over-rule the decision. This is only a fraction meeting of the Communist Party."

Later the organizers were forced out by a sort of rump meeting which Gardos and Hines set up themselves. The New York members of the union protested against this action. To cover up this high-handed action and to escape the wrath of the rank and file the bureaucracy decided to call a strike in Philadelphia.

Within three days after the recall of these organizers the Party ordered the return to Philadelphia and without calling any meeting of longshoremen to agitate them and convince them for a strike, without having any strike vote of longshoremen, without setting up any strike committees, the bureaucracy issued a mimeographed leaflet calling on the workers to strike. The only meeting that was held before the strike call was issued, was a meeting of about 10 Communist Party members who were seamen and voted for the longshoremen to go out on strike. When these comrades went down to the docks to call the strike the longshoremen bitterly resented it and beat them up. Furthermore, instead of going to the docks of the coast-wise shipping where we had some strength, these comrades went first to the I. L. A. piers, where we had no strength. Without any previous preparations they notified the longshoremen that there was to be a strike.

This outrageous bureaucratic procedure in our union, this utter disregard of the most elementary rights of democracy in our union destroyed all the sentiment which we had succeeded in building up for our union, wiping out all our gains which we had won only through many months of very hard work. All the results which we had previously achieved by our great sacrifices were destroyed by this adventurist policy.

BUREAUCRACY CRIPPLES OUR UNION

The situation in our union is intolerable. Things simply can't go on the way they are now going. Anybody who criticizes Mink, or even raises a question to him is immediately picked out as a target. A whispering campaign is opened against him in the fraction of the Communist Party and in the Union.

Altho comrade Morgan was elected to the National Committee of the Union by the rank and file delegates of the Convention and the National Committee elected him to the Executive board, yet, the bureaucracy didn't even think it necessary to call an executive board meeting when they decided to expell him from the Executive Board of the Union in June, 1930. Not only was comrade Morgan removed from the Executive Board of the Union but he was removed from all leading committees and not even allowed to function in the capacity of organizer, Morgan's spotless record as an organizer notwithstanding. Mink made the slanderous accusation against comrade Morgan charging him with refusal to go to the Gulf and with drunkenness. Comrade Harvey even proposed in the Bureau of the Union to expel comrade Morgan from the Party and the Union. Johansen seconded this motion. Hines proposed in the Bureau of the union that this question be referred to the Party and the T. U. U. L. Morgan tried to appeal against this. But he failed. The ridiculous and outrageous character of the charges against Morgan is shown by such indisputable facts as Morgan's being arrested more than one dozen times in New York, Houston (unemployment demonstration), New Orleans, etc., for his activities in trying to build up the Marine Workers Industrial Union. But Harvey found nothing but ridicule for these arrests. Comrade Morand without keeping any accounts. . . .

But the Communist Party leadership chose a handpicked committee and after some delay only whitewashed Mink and Hines and company of the charge of running the lunch counter as a private affair.

How the bureaucracy tried to terrorize workers is clearly shown by their tactics towards comrade McGrath. Comrade McGrath who is a good worker and who mobilized the Philadelphia delegation for the National Office was asked to give a statement endorsing the leadership of the union. This statement was to be printed in all the Party papers. But comrade McGrath refused. Steps were then immediately taken to kill him politically. He was removed from all leading committees. He was shelved. Comrade McGrath became disgusted, naturally so.

The various organs and departments of our union don't function. They are dead. The committees don't meet. Insufficient and even false information is sent out. Altho the Executive Board has held meeting after meeting, the membership has never been acquainted with the proceedings or has had a chance to consult the minutes of these meetings. Nor are minutes from other ports available to us. Members are kept in ignorance about the activities of other ports. The bureaucracy prohibits the discussion of the activities of other branches.

OUT WITH THE DESTRUCTIVE BUREAUCRACY — FOR CORRECT CONSTRUCTIVE POLICIES TO BUILD THE MARINE WORKERS INDUSTRIAL UNION.

It is because of these wrong policies, it is because of this denial of democracy in the union, it is because of this terrible bureaucracy, that no new members are being gotten into our union and old members are not paying dues. Today our union gets no response from longshoremen or seamen.

Highhanded political conniving can only hurt our union as it has already done. It must be stopped. We are against such arbitrary ways of working as was done in the setting up of a special bureau to control the convention. There must be an end to the sectarianism in our policies which has caused the marine workers to speak of our union hall merely as: "Communist hall." This tends to narrow our base of activities amongst the marine workers. There must be put an end to the bureaucratic incompetence which showed itself in the failure to do anything at all to provide adequate defense and attention for Ralph Duncan, the literature agent of our union after his arrest on September 20 in union hall. This is an example of the disregard of our incompetent leadership for the welfare of our union and its membership.

We, members and active workers in the union demand an end of this state of affairs. We demand a thorough-going house cleaning. We demand that our union should begin to consider national affairs. We demand that our union should take steps to strengthen itself, to build its ranks, to wipe out bureaucracy, to establish rank and file control, to have democracy in our union. We demand correct policies. We demand an end to adventurism in the conduct of strikes. We demand responsibility in handling organization questions. We demand the removal from leadership of the present bureaucracy—Hines, Mink, Harvey. We demand that the rank and file should be given a chance to discuss the policies of our union, to adopt correct policies and to elect a new leadership which will have the confidence of our rank and file and will be able to lead in the building up of the Marine Workers Industrial Union into a mass militant union.

It is only by making such a thorough-going house cleaning, by facing and examining the facts frankly, by merciless self-criticism and correction that we can unite our forces, strengthen our organization and succeed in our aim which is the building of a powerful industrial union uniting all the marine transport workers in the country.

The Outlook for the New Movement

What are the prospects for the movement in the marine workers' Left wing which is expressed in the document we publish here? The outlook for growth, influence and prestige is unusually excellent—providing the movement remains on the path of the revolutionary class struggle. No greater harm, nor swifter decline and degeneration, can threaten this splendid rank and file revolt than to have it turn into an anti-Communist, or anti-Communist Party movement, especially when it occurs under the outworn or hypocritical slogan of "away with the politicians" or "we want to build a trade union movement" or "this is not a party fight." The bulk of the active workers in this movement are Communists or workers wanting to be Communists. They are being and will constantly be provoked by the Stalinist bureaucracy in the hopes that they react towards an indefensible position. That cheap game of the Minks and Johnstones can be fought by persistently maintaining a revolutionary class position, by working to win the whole Left wing movement (not only the marine workers) to the cause of the rank and file opposition, by refusing to be cut loose from this Left wing for the sake of some fantastic and futile ends. That is what the Party bureaucrats are after—to isolate this promising movement, which they fear immensely, from the general Left wing and to provoke it into an anti-Communist movement. Giving aid and comfort (whether they realize it or not) to the Party bureaucrats is a small group of syndicalists who are hoping to re-create a second edition of the I. W. . . . The Left wing as a whole has learned from the rich experiences of the I. W. W., but these neo-syndicalists apparently have not. Away from the Communist movement, away from the Left wing, towards a second (and miniature) edition of syndicalism—this road is sure to lead the rank and file opposition group to a futile existence, ever-diminishing, and easy marks for the blows of the Stalinists. Those who advocate this road, and they are the ones also who have back of their minds the idea of "playing with Lovestone" and other shady liquidationist elements, are helping to weaken and nullify the new movement. There are unfortunately a few of this element in the new movement. An intelligent policy by the Communist forces will not make it difficult to deal with this danger, which has been manufactured by the criminal policies of Stalinism bureaucracy, but which can be successfully eliminated by an honest revolutionary course. This obstacle overcome, and the movement will triumph irresistibly over the little Minks as well as the "bigger" Minks who give them their brief moment of power.

gan was conducting his work under very severe difficulties. For instance, in Houston, comrade Mink collected more than $200 in cash but he left Morgan penniless in the field. Yet within two months comrade Morgan succeeded in opening up a hall and in electing a delegation to the National Convention of the Marine Workers Industrial Union consisting of six Negroes and five whites. This was the only bona-fide delegation of longshoremen elected to the convention besides Philadelphia. All other longshoremen delegates were not elected but were handpicked.

For six months Hines was the New York organizer, got the full support, moral, financial, from the union bureaucracy. Yet he couldn't manage to get a single longshoremen delegate for the conference (April 1930). This mess made by Hines in New York came upon the heels of his staying in Baltimore for seven months and doing exactly nothing. Hines, Mink and Harvey have made it a practice to slander individual members when they are not around.

As soon as a member raises his voice in criticism he is immediately made a scapegoat for everything bad that happens. No organization reports, no financial reports, no records of the membership, no activity reports are ever given and to ask for them and press for them means to face a barrage of abuse and attacks.

THE IRRESPONSIBLE METHODS OF WORK AND ORGANIZATION

The criminal bungling and the mismanagement of the organization, the general irresponsibility of the bureaucracy are disrupting our union. For instance, after the club did away with the lunch counter in the headquarters because it attracted very many bad elements to the hall then Mink on his own hook reopened it in defiance of the club members' decision. He conducted it as a private enterprise

A Concrete Program on the Unemployed

In the proletarian quarter alone can be affected the widest mobilization of the unemployed and of the workers generally. Here is the place where the poorer sections of the petty-bourgeoisie can be neutralized and in part won over. Here is the place where the relatives of the unemployed who may be working elsewhere can be drawn into the movement. Since the proletarian quarters usually surround large factories whose workers live in the neighborhood, here is where a living unity between employed and unemployed can be consummated and strikes of all the factories in the quarters most easily affected. Finally here is where the police are weakest and the workers strongest!

4. The fourth difference is that such a method as the proposed insures the development of leadership from among the workers and the activation of the non-Communist council members. In this respect the Party can show no worthwhile results whatever. But since large sections of workers, with the exception of those not yet expelled by the Party are "fascists", "social-fascists" or worse, what can be expected? Under the plan proposed, however, this will be changed through the small block unemployment council. Real business will be conducted by the members themselves, their own officers and executives will be elected, small dues will be paid, meetings will be held regularly, responsible work will be assigned to all, delegates will be elected to higher bodies, reports will be regularly made, policies will be initiated and understood by the rank and file, the terror of the police will be minimized, the leaders tested. In short the unemployment group becomes the real leader of its block.

We come now to the question: how is it that these simple considerations never entered the heads of the Party officials, that no such work was ever done? The answer is clear. The leaders of the Party are amateurs and worse. They never won their spurs of leadership through doing mass work in a Communist way. The few who tried mass work (like Foster et al.) did so as so-called "fascists", that is as CONSCIOUS AND LOYAL agents of the Gompers in the American Federation of Labor. The Party has never really chosen its leaders. Foreign federationism, factionalism, and the C.I., saw to that. Finally, the Party never was and never developed into a real Communist Party in the United States. Under the able "leadership" of past and present "leaders" such a development was impossible.

III

The unemployment movement must have a comprehensive and concrete program of activity, far different from that of the faker-leaders of the party, a program that will answer the question of the workers: "What are we to do when we are hungry, are being evicted from our homes, are out of a job?" How indeed shall the hungry be fed and evictions stopped? The Party shouts "Work or Wages" or "the Insurance Bill" reminding one sometimes of the English Chartists, who, misguided by the English bourgeoisie in 1832 used to shout for "The Bill! the Bill! Nothing but the Bill!"

First a few words on the slogan "Work or Wages." Since when do Communists demand "work" from the capitalists? The "Right to Work" was never a Marxist slogan. After the proletarian revolution, the dictatorship makes it plain that every person had the DUTY to work, but before the proletarian revolution, while work means work under capitalism. work that strengthens capitalism, only A. F. of L. fakers, opportunist socialists, or worse, demand for labor "the Right to Work." But perhaps the Party is only supplementing the "theory" in Browder's pamphlet "Out of a Job" that if the capitalists recognize Russia, there will be work. "Recognize Soviet Russia and get a job goes hand in hand with the slogan "we want work!"

The new slogan "Social Insurance Bill" is a clumsy method of correcting the error in "Work or Wages" so as to throw the weight of the demand not on "work" but on "wages".

Spreading Parliamentary Illusions

It is plain to all conscious workers that the Party's social insurance bill can never be carried out in America without a proletarian revolution. This is not made clear by the Party. The Party, by making the campaign in the way it is doing, is helping only to spread opportunist and parliamentary illusions. Besides while the workers must raise the question of social insurance in the sharpest manner, making it also a slogan for building a labor party) a social insurance bill proposition can not give bread to the starving nor shelter to the evicted. How can we answer the question of the hungry and evicted jobless? ONLY BY ANSWERING: SELF HELP WILL GIVE YOU BREAD AND SHELTER! The proletarian revolution will do so permanently, seizure of food and shelter will do so immediately.

We must boldly say to the starving and destitute poor that the whole immediate objective of the unemployment movement is to seize the things necessary to live. The careful organization work in the proletarian quarters, the carefully prepared street demonstrations must all be with the thought firmly in mind of leading to that situation where the workers are enabled to help themselves of the things they need!

If the immediate major objective of the unemployment movement is the seizure of the necessities of life, the entire program of the unemployed movement must be based on getting food and shelter for the jobless. The formation of Tenant League must be started by the unemployment movement on a large scale. Desperate resistance of every kind must be put up to every eviction that takes place. Here we can learn a great deal from the tactics used in the Passaic, New Bedford and Gastonia strikes. The widest movement of resistance, including making it unprofitable for landlords to evict, the boycott, picketing mass resistance street demonstrations and strikes can be aroused on the question of evictions and non-payment of rent. Such movements are the best teachers for the revolution.

Hand in hand with the formation of Tenant Leagues should go the formation of cooperative restaurants—we hasten to add, not like those of the "Proletcos" in Union Square, or of the "co-operative houses" in the Bronx, and not like the "soup kitchens" proposed by Party members—but real workers co-operative restaurants that will cost but very little to establish that will sell a few simple dishes at cost (and thus help those who while not destitute have but very little money), that will help compel "contributions" from other stores and restaurants, that will help to support a movement for the extension of credit by storekeepers to workers families out of work, that will wipe out the color line most effectively etc.

The question of food and shelter involves the question of wages. The unemployment movement must be closely bound up with the movement for resistance to wage cuts and worsened conditions. The unemployment movement must help in the organization of the unorganized and in the creation of a strong Left wing to win the workers in the reactionary unions to a militant policy.

The immediate program of non-payment of rent, resistance to evictions reduction of the cost of living extension of credits, seizure of food etc. as well as the fight for social insurance can be enforced only by means of street demonstrations. It is to this important question that we now turn.

Street Demonstrations

Street demonstrations and street fighting in America have an extraordinary significance. Especially at the present time, "food riots" breaking out in New York City, Chicago, Detroit, or the other large cities of the United States would be of truly enormous international importance.

This puts upon the Communists in these cities an extraordinary responsibility to prepare and to organize these demonstrations. Nothing more exposes the phrase-mongering of the Party bureaucrats than their "demonstrations". In phrase—"Fight the Police", in practice—put the workers in such a position that they could not fight. In phrase—"Seize the Streets", in practice—hold a meeting in a business district in an open square, get a lot of pictures taken buy a lot of ice-cream cones and candy sold by street vendors peddling in the very midst of the crowd all through the meeting and call it a "demonstration", etc. In New York City all main demonstrations have been held in Union Square. In Newark and most other cities they are staged before the city halls. "This politicizes it don't you know."

The Party wants to fight the police. Good. But then why not think HOW to fight the police? Do the fools leading the Party ever think of this? Let us analyze the meetings at Union Square, New York City, or City Hall Newark. 1. It is in a commercial neighborhood. 2. It is a huge open square. 3. It is far from the big factories. 4. It is far from workers' neighborhoods. 5. The police entirely surround the meeting. Can you imagine a general calling on his troops to fight, who isolates his vanguard from his reserves and places them in a regular police trap? Maybe this was the way Browder fought Chiang Kai-Shek. eh? Poor Chiang Kai-Shek! If the leaders of the Party were stool-pigeons—to use the favorite expression of Browder—they could not betray a fighting movement better.

How then, should street demonstrations be organized. a. Mainly, through the block groups in proletarian neighborhoods. Here, the streets are often more narrow. Here, if fighting takes place, the workers have a chance. The buildings can be used advantageously. Here the fight can spread. The police can not easily surround it. The widest masses, wives, families, storekeepers, students, clerks, employed workers, etc. can be drawn in. Shops and factories can be pulled on strike and swept into the battle. In short, here the police are weakest and the workers strongest. Through the fighting squads organized by the block groups, a whole section of the city could be held.

b. Demonstrations should be held not merely on "ritual days" mechanically set by Moscow for the whole world, but at times when there are burning local issues to meet. The evictions of families, or a local strike, or the picketing of shops that have raised prices or a similar event, can very well become the starting point.

c. But besides that general huge demonstrations should be held so arranged that they can result in the workers helping themselves to food! This is of paramount importance, a fact that the lovers of Union Squares and City Hall Parks entirely fail to see. Such demonstrations must be most carefully prepared.

d. Marches from the proletarian quarter in mighty disciplined formations marks naturally the highest stake of the struggle to a central point or to the City Hall and should be held when the movement is widespread and well organized and when there is the greatest determination to meet the stiffest police attack. Under some circumstances, in some countries such a stage of the struggle may very well mean the beginning of the issuance of the slogan for Workers Control of the factories, etc.

The organization of such a movement can not be done without the creation of the widest united front of the workers. Of this the Party "leaders" with their theories of "Fascism" and "Social Fascism" are incapable. But it must be done. This is a test also for the Communist Opposition groups. Come, when will you mobilize your forces? When will you join hands on this issue? When will you issue a broad united front call? When will you begin the work the Party criminals can not do?

Urgent Appeal!

As our readers will note by the date of the present issue, we were compelled to skip publication of the October 15th number. The omission was caused by the bad financial situation of the Militant which forced us last summer to go back from weekly to semi-monthly publication. To skip even a single issue of the paper now is a heavy blow to us. It means that the many of the problems with which the Militant deals regularly, the questions it takes up, the information it presents that is contained in no other revolutionary paper in this country must be neglected.

The need the Militant fills in the movement is being understood by an ever-increasing circle of workers. The Militant is more and more becoming the organ of the most conscious and thinking section of the Communist and Left wing movement. In the marine industry, in the coal miners' struggle in Illinois, in the needle trades, in the reviving Left wing in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America—in a dozen other situations, the Militant is doing pioneer work of immense significance. It is not only a semi-monthly that is required: we must have a weekly as soon as possible!

The temporary setback in regular publication which we have suffered does not at all correspond with our growth in influence and membership. On the contrary. Our ranks and influence are growing. Our activities are multiplying. BUT OUR COMRADES AND SYMPATHIZERS HAVE NOT YET REALIZED THE FINANCIAL BURDEN THAT MUST BE CARRIED. The omission of the last number must serve to remind them sharply of this problem that must be solved by all. We can and must rely only upon our members and friends. It is they who must relieve the pressure of the financial difficulties that prevents us from executing many of the tasks that confront us so imperatively.

These of our supporters who are working must give doubly. Those of them who are out of work must give their aid by soliciting donations from other workers and friends. UNLESS WE RECEIVE SUBSTANTIAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND HAVE OUR REGULAR INCOME INCREASED IMMEDIATELY, THE EXISTENCE OF THE MILITANT IS DIRECTLY THREATENED.

We need five hundred dollars right away! It is not a large sum, but it will enable us to push ahead with our work. Every comrade and friend must aid—generously, swiftly, with a realization of the burning need. Check up on all unpaid bills! Make a substantial donation by mail immediately! Collect contributions from your fellow workers! Get subscriptions for the paper! Bear in mind that the Militant is in serious danger!

OUR STUDY CLASSES

Two successful classes have already been organized by the New York branch of the Communist League of America, each with an average of 25 worker-students. One is conducted by James P. Cannon, on "A History of the American Labor Movement" and the other by Albert Weisbord, on "Marxian Economics". More students have registered for the Weisbord class than there was room for, and others who registered cannot attend on Friday night which is when the class meets. To accommodate them, another class has been opened for them on Thursday nights with comrade Weisbord as director. This class begins on Thursday, November 13. Workers who have not yet registered for this course can do so by getting in touch immediately with the Militant office, at 25 Third Avenue, Room 4, New York, N. Y. The classes meet at the Labor Temple, 14th Street and 2nd Avenue: Weisbord's every Friday and Thursday, Cannon's every second Wednesday. The tuition fee is purely nominal. Make registrations immediately.

Where Is Thaelmann Leading the German Party?

By KURT LANDAU

BERLIN—

On September 14 1930. the German working class suffered a serious defeat, whose lessons must be soberly drawn.

At the elections in May 1928, 9,150,000 votes were given to the Socialists and 3,263,000 to the Communists out of a total vote of 30,000,000; altogether 12,413,000 votes were given for Communism and reformism. It is clear that the millions of workers who follow reformism do not do it because of Noske and Scheidemann, but in spite of them, for they have not yet grasped the bourgeois character of the S.P.G., the reactionary character of reformism.

Altogether, the C. P. G. and S. P. G. received 40.4 percent of the voters in the elections.

On September 14, 1930, the number of votes cast rose from 30,700,000 to 34,942,854. The C. P. G. got 4,587,807 votes, the S. P. G. only 8,572,000; together, it is about 13,150,000 votes out of the total of 35,000,000, which is only 37.5 percent. that is, a decline of 3 percent. or expressed in numbers, about one million votes! The question as to who benefitted by this decline is the decisive question we pose, for it signals the most serious dangers, it shows just the thing that the C.P.G. leadership as well as the S.P.G. conceals: That Fascism succeeded to penetrate into the proletariat.

Our Party gained about 1,300,000 votes. Since the electorate was larger. and the total number of votes rose about 15 percent, then about 500,000 votes must be taken off the 1,300,000 which are to be reckoned to the increased participation in the election. The actual increase of the Party then amounts to 800,000 votes.

(The S.P.G. compared to 1928, lost 600,000 votes, that is about the same amount as the increase of the C.P.G. Did our Party then collect the loss of the S. P. G.? That is just what is not the case in large measure!

Out of the 30,700,000 votes in 1928, the S.P.G. got 9,100,000. To remain relatively as strong, it would have had to get about 15 percent more votes—in view of the increased electorate of 3,500,000—or, in round numbers 1,400,000. Its total loss therefore amounts to 2,000,000 votes, it having declined from 29.8 percent of the total to 24.7 percent. Out of these 2,000,000, the C.P.G. got only 800,000. Sixty percent, that is 1,200,000, fell to Fascism! This may be drastically demonstrated in a series of instances. In Berlin, for instance, the S.P.G. lost 38,100 votes in the Friedrichshagen, Kreuzberg, Tiergarten, Schoenberg districts—despite the increased electorate—and the C.P.G. gained 29,250 votes in the same districts. About 10,000 votes, and new voters at that, were lost to the Fascists. In the country as a whole, this inroad of the Fascists into the workers' camp comes to light even more plainly. In the Breslau election district, for example, the S.P.G. lost more than 50,000 votes compared with 1928, the C.P.G. gained 40,000; 10,000 votes, plus the increased voting, that is, about 50,000 votes, went to Fascism, which swung from 9,262 to—259,225 and became the second largest party. In the proletarian section of Merseburg, the S.P.G. held fairly to its 1928 position. The C.P.G. won more than 40,000 votes through the increased voting, but the Fascists rose from 40,693 to 243,896, and pulled to themselves the share of the S.P.G. in the increased voting, that is, proletarian votes. In the North Westphalian election district, the Fascists rose from 12,118 to 161,723. The S.P.G. lost about 30,000 votes as against 1928, which the C.P.G. absorbed. The increase in votes came to the good of the Fascists exclusively.

An exact analysis of the election results confirms the fact that Fascism won far more than 1,000,000 proletarian votes which it cornered for itself and did not take from the reservoir of the bourgeois parties.

That the Fascists have become the heirs to the bourgeois parties requires no special evidence, that is demonstrable immediately by the figures themselves. The German National Party, which split up a few months ago, lost about one million votes, after counting off what was taken by the People's Conservatives Christian Nationals, etc. The German People's Party lost more than a million as against 19.8. These 2,000,000, plus the 15 percent increase in votes, which corresponds to almost another million, fell to the Fascists.

To this must be added about a million votes they took away from the bourgeois "splinter" parties. then the 1,250,000 proletarian votes gained, and the 800,000 which the Fascists got in 1928. These are the factors that make up — according to an approximate and schematic survey — the election figure of the Fascists (6,401,210). The Fascists became the strongest bourgeois party—as we foresaw it. Besides them, there is only one other bourgeois party the Center (Catholics) that remained stable and with a gain of 500,000 votes and 7 mandates retained its share of the increased electoral figure.

In East Prussia (235,463), the Fascists became the strongest party in the election districts of Breslau, Liegnitz, Magdeburg, Merseburg, Thuringia, Schleswig-Holstein. Weser-Ems, East Hanover, Brunswick, Hessen-Naunau, Cologne, Aachen, Coblenz-Trier, Palatinate, Dresden, Bautzen, Chemnitz-Zwickau, Baden. Hessen-Darstadt, Hamburg and Mecklenburg, that is, in far more than half the election districts, they became the second strongest party. They outstripped the C.P.G. (135,210) in Hamburg with 144,584 votes, the same in Chemnitz-Zwickau, etc.

It is the greatest self-deception to believe that the 4,500,000 Communist votes are already won for the revolutionary class struggle. To educate them to this—there lies one of the principal tasks of our Party. Today a large part of our electorate is composed of the despairing and discontented and there are doubtlessly hundreds of thousands among them who, gained in a purely parliamentary election campaign, expect an immediate improvement of their condition from the simple electoral success of the C.P.G.

The S.P.G. suffered a heavy reversal. But it would be wrong to speak of its "annihilating defeat" (see Rote Fahne) or to contend that it is "the beginning of the end" of the S.P.G. (Brandler's Arbeiterpolitik.)

In many places, the S.P.G. showed itself to be relatively able to offer resistance, as in Saxony, where it gained 120,000 votes in comparison to the Landtag elections in June, in South Germany, etc. The foundations of the S.P.G. were not shattered by the heavy reversal.

Just as wrong is the hope that Fascism will break up of itself, of its internal contradictions. When the Rote Fahne writes on September 15: "Yesterday was Herr Hitler's 'greatest day,' but the so-called election victory of the National Socialists is the beginning of their end," then this is an all too cheap consolation which is only exceeded by the sagacious prophecy on September 16: "September 14 was the high point of the National Socialist movement in Germany. What comes after can only be decline and ebb."

Whether that is how things will turn out, or Fascism will succeed in taking over the political power in the state, will not depend upon the prophecies of the Rote Fahne, but upon the policy that our Party adopts in the class struggle. The hopes placed upon the self-disintegration of Fascism is as deceptive as it is reformistic, for it overlooks the decisive factor in political development: the policy of the revolutionary party.

We warned against illusions when the Party leadership declared the splitting away of the petty-bourgeois group of ideologists around Otto Strasser to be the beginning of the collapse of Fascism. We came out against the naive idea that Frick's participation in the Thuringian government would by itself rapidly expose Fascism. Such hopes and illusions are unworthy of a Communist.

The general crisis of capitalism is being accentuated in Germany by the Young Plan. It was the most ruinous mistake of our Party leadership that it did not understand in the summer of 1929 to develop a genuine revolutionary mass movement against the Young Plan. In our appeal to the Saxony elections, we wrote (June 1930):

"The Party leadership does not recognize that the central aim of the class struggle in Germany is the organization of mass resistance to the Young Plan; to the extent that the masses of Germany enter this struggle, they overcome their illusion and recognize from their own experiences that there is no other way of eliminating this intolerable slave pact than the revolutionary way: the overthrow of capitalism itself."

This failure of the Party permitted Fascism to organize a mass movement against the Young Plan as a counter-revolutionary, chauvinistic action, with the aim of leading the masses in this way for an active imperialistic war policy for the new German imperialism. When the Party leadership—after Fascism had already begun its victorious march through Germany—recognized this ruinous negligence, it leaped to the opposite extreme, as its nationalistic programmatic declaration shows: it entangled itself in nationalistic phrases and high-sounding promises.

The struggle against the Young Plan and in the final analysis against Versailles, can only be conducted by the collaboration of the international proletariat. The Thaelmanns, who in 1929 "forgot" to fight against the Young Plan, and now roar hysterically and nationalistically against it when they see the growth of Fascism as a result of this "forgetting", are no less guilty than the Stalins, Molotovs, and Manuilskeys, who have shown themselves incompetent to see the problems of the international class struggle at all, and to organize the joint struggle of the German, French, English and Polish Communists, of the whole Comintern, against the Young Plan.

Our Party has strengthened its influence in the working class in spite of the destructive mistakes of the leadership. The elemental discontentment of the workers with the brutal dictatorship regime, the general capitalist process of dissolution which is taking place before our very eyes, the hatred against the treasonable policy of reformism, brought us new masses. But that Fascism succeeded to grow at an incomparably swifter tempo—and not least of all among the proletarian youth—must be an alarm signal for our Party.

Only when the Party executes a genuinely serious turn, will it be in a position to repel the Fascist wave, to lead the masses forward in bitter mass actions, to put the proletarian, revolutionary, solution of the crisis on the order of the day.

Thaelmann—that is not a person, but a personification of the political regime in our Party: vacillating, reeling from illusion to illusion, fulminating phrases for the masses, impotent in the struggle against the capitalist offensive and Fascism, powerful and self-conscious within the Party when it is necessary to trample serious proletarian criticism under the iron heel of the apparatus. This political and inner-Party regime is now getting drunk on the election success. The intoxication is brief, the awakening inevitable. It will soon be seen how far the power of action of the Party exists in the coming strike struggles. In the struggle for the jobless, in the struggle against Fascism.

To call a halt to the stormy Fascist tide, to repulse it, requires: Swiftest consolidation of the ideological foundation of the Party, which is being destroyed by national-Bolshevik phrases and theories on "social-fascism." The Party must adjust its internationalist, class front, every Party member must recognize that we must win the social democratic worker in tenacious struggle in order to erect together with him the class front.

All illusions must be given up, things must be seen as they are in all their seriousness. It is not yet too late. The social democratic workers are beginning to think. The threatening Fascist danger is strengthening the urge to unity in the working class. A correct Leninist policy must lead to united revolutionary fighting front between the C.P.G. and S.P.G. workers. A correct policy, that is, one that understands precisely now how to burst the contradiction, by means of the united front tactic, between the social democratic workers who want to fight and the counter-revolutionary leaders.

The election victory will enormously increase the impact of Fascism. In the factories, on the streets, its hordes will advance against the proletarian mass organizations. The more it shows itself to be incapable of fighting for work or bread for the deceived masses, the more it will drive them forward against the class conscious workers. In the blood of the proletarian vanguard it seeks to benumb the hunger of the backward sections of the proletariat.

The most decisive weapon in the struggle of the working class is the revolutionary party. The mistakes of our leadership will be paid for by the working class with just as many victims as the betrayal of the reformists.

The responsibility that lies upon us is growing. Our struggle has not become lighter, but heavier. We exerted our efforts to assist the Party to success. The cadres of the Left Opposition who worked in every part of Germany side by side with the Party comrades, have every reason to be joyous at the success attained by our Party. But they renounce hymns of victory, they see the threatening dangers, and they will have to increase their efforts tenfold in order to help the Party, which has not yet grasped the whole import of the situation, to fulfill its duty, to organize the proletarian revolution in Germany.

On Saturday October 11th a conference of young needle trades workers was held in New York by the Youth Section of the N. T. W. I. U. The latter, after having carried on no real activity since its organization, suddenly decided to organize the mass of needle trades youth. This was to be one of the accomplishments of the Y. C. L. leadership under its "shock plan."

Preparation for such an affair is of utmost importance. Since no previous work had been carried on among the youth, because of the general weakness of the N. T. W. I. U.; the fact that the mass of the youth in the industry have never been in any union; these are some of the conditions which necessitate well organized, persistent, conscientious preparatory activity. However the "shock plan" had (!) to be carried out; another "youth conference" had to be added to the record; an almost countless number of conferences of young workers in the various industries were to be held before September 30.

The Needle Trade Youth Conference was therefore originally called for September 21. Two or three afternoon open air meetings were held, a leaflet or two issued, the Shop Delegates Council of the N. T. W. I. U. was notified and preparations were completed! But when the hour for the opening of the Conference arrived, even the official leadership could not go through with it. The handful of delegates who assembled were told that the Conference had been postponed until October 11.

However, very little additional agitation had been carried on. A few more afternoon meetings were held, a notice now and then in the Daily Worker and little more. At an open air meeting held a day before the Conference in front of the International Tailoring Corporation, at Fourth Ave., and Twelve Street, no leaflets were issued; the youth speakers did not even know the hour that the Conference was to be held. This in spite of the fact that the head of the National Youth Dept. of the N. T. W. I. U. was present! An otherwise good meeting ended with no organizational results. We do not know whether this is a typical case, but the showing at the October 11th Conference seems to indicate as much.

Of the fifty or so delegates present, the overwhelming majority were from Left wing controlled shops or were previous members of the Union. An insignificant handful were new delegates from completely unorganized places, or obtained during the campaign (?) for the Conference. There were apparently no representatives of large shops.

Called for 2:30, the Conference opened after 4. Most of the time was taken up with talk. Not the kind which would make the delegates feel that they were running the Conference, deciding on policies, etc., but on the contrary, orders were given, telling what should be done, how to do it, how not to function. This was followed by the chairman asking the young workers present to join in the discussion. The delegates were naturally reluctant. Several of the more experienced rank and filers spoke.

The tone of the reports and comments by the so-called leaders of the Conference was: the youth should be in the leadership of the movement; the young needle workers are the most militant section in the industry; the Youth Dept. of the N. T. W. I. U. is making great efforts to win over the youth; the young workers will be especially needed in the front ranks of the coming dress strike.

The fact that the youth is the most militant, the most active section of the industry has much truth in it, but whether it should lead the struggle is highly questionable. Especially in a class-struggle union, it should be the most experienced, the most theoretically advanced who should lead. And this is usually found among the adults rather than the youth.

Then the time came for a report and discussion on the Program (the draft of which was distributed to the delegates) the chairman was notified by the janitor that the room had to be vacated—the rental time had already expired. The Program Committee report took up a few minutes: It suggested that the Draft be accepted subject to minor changes to be made by the incoming Executive. With no discussion, the report was accepted including a "Plan of Action," (where have we heard this before?) The latter consisted of eight tasks such as the establishment of a functioning Youth Committee of the Union, and a Youth Delegates' Council; the organization of four functioning youth sections of buildings in various crafts of the industry; formation of four shop committees in large places employing young workers by December 15; establishment of training school; support of clothing workers' sports club; of Needle Worker; founding of a bi-weekly Youth Bulletin by Nov. 15th, etc. In a word a general plan, which is not very difficult to put on paper, but even if good, required correct strategic and tactical policies to put in practice as well as correct leadership.

After the acceptance of the Program, several of the delegates pledged specific sums of money for the coming dress strike. Motions suddenly came from the floor on Greetings to Minor, then one to Foster, Amter, Raymond; suddenly some one rebuked the Conference for forgetting Harry Eisman the young Pioneer serving at Hawthorne.

A motion was then carried endorsing the Communist Party in the election campaign. The next and final point was the election of a Youth Executive. The main business of the conference squeezed into about ten minutes; the delegates listened; the "leader laid down the line." No genuine steps forward had been taken by the Conference.—J. F.

(The next issue of the Young Vanguard will carry a criticism of the Program and the Plan of Action accepted at the Conference).

class party people from Montant, A. C. Miller who still sees nothing wrong with running in the Republican Party primaries—and the Left Opposition? It is not difficult to decide.

We would go there only in order to tell them that we shall have nothing to do with their movement—and for no other conceivable purpose. Whom would our agitation and point of view concert in this quiet, confidential conference? Workers, or their rank and file representatives? They will not be present. Or do we expect to convert to a Marxian position the Lovestoneites who seek to liquidate the Communist movement, who feel like fish in water when they are toying with "mass" petty bourgeois movements? Or the Finnish leaders who knowing better, raised their hands to the skies in the Party to expel us, and only broke with the Party when the latter's leaders—under pressure of the Left sentiment in the Party—began in their characteristically clumsy, stupid and ineffectual manner, it is true to deal with the opportunist corrosion eating into the vitals of the Finnish Communist movement in the Northwest. Let the Finnish business men seeking political cover for their opportunism and the corrupt adventurers in the Lovestone camp who are violating every Communist principle once respected in the movement—go their way. We will build seriously and substantially on the foundation of the class struggle.

4. It is asked: What role have we to play in this "movement"? That was the question put by the great strategists of the Pepper-Lovestone-Bedacht school in relation to the LaFollette movement. Only with the aid of the Comintern, at that time under the direct pressure of the Russian Opposition, was the correct answer given. We can give the same reply now. Our role is to disclose the character of this movement publicly to the workers, to reveal its adventurist and opportunist nature to fight intransigently against its deceptions. If Pepperism in 1924 was a tragedy, this pitiful caricature of 1930 will undoubtedly be and is, a farce. We want nothing to do with it.

Our moment, which arose and is developing in the merciless struggle against the revisionism of Marxism in the revolution and its twin adventurism, against all varieties of fakery, exaggeration, of inflated, boosted and "promoted" movements which collapse of their own emptiness can only gain from adopting such an attitude. We are confident that our Minneapolis comrades will concur in our point of view which is dedicated solely by concern over the interests and future not only of our group in particular but the working class movement as a whole.

The Civil War in Brazil

Brazil is the fourth South American country to overthrow the government in the course of the last three months.

In Bolivia and Peru, with the sympathy of the great masses, the liberal bourgeoisie staged triumphant movements, and supported by British imperialism managed to defeat the feudal elements which for years, while in power, had worked hand in hand with Wall Street financial interests.

In Argentina the pro-British government of Hipolito Irigoyen was turned out by a military coup of the big bourgeoisie supported by American imperialism. A virtual reign of terror was then instituted against the proletarian organizations. The Communist and anarchist press has been suppressed and several anarchist and anarcho-syndicalist leaders have been executed.

The Brazilian revolt, however, is in reality a much more complex affair than either of the other three countries mentioned. Brazil is in area the largest country in the Western Hemisphere and has a population of 39 million, concentrated principally in different parts of the east and the south. Throughout this immense area the industries and agricultural products are quite diversified and the local governments which have a surprisingly great amount of local autonomy, even to the point of having their own armies) represent generally speaking the respective interests of the local exploiters. The principal crop in the country is coffee, with rubber as an important second and cacao, livestock, grain, mining, etc., also quite important in their respective regions.

The deposed Brazilian government was above all a representative of the coffee interests as was quite natural with coffee as the outstanding commercial product. Brazil produces the bulk of the world's coffee. During the period of crisis which, especially inasmuch as coffee is concerned, has been very long, the government of Washington Luiz has attempted all sorts of schemes to protect, by artificial means, the interests of coffee growers. First came the valorization plan by which the surplus product was stored to force a rise in prices on the market. After the failure of this scheme, loans were secured in BOTH Great Britain and the United States for the protection of these coffee raisers and to relieve the crisis in the industry. The liberal bourgeoisie whose interests conflict violently with those of the semi-feudal coffee producers protested energetically against these extensive foreign loans which benefited the coffee industries alone.

The recent rebellion was brought about by a combination of all the opposition forces, especially those of the petty bourgeoisie, and representing generally the interests of most of the secondary industries of the country. Counting on a wide mass support, which was natural as a result of the years of dictatorial rule under the Washington Luiz regime, the rebellion was initiated by the action of several states and after some fighting was enabled within a few weeks to dominate the country. As the ship was sinking, the army, (whether acting for the coffee growers or not still remains to be seen) threw the president overboard and attempted a compromise with the rebels. The compromise being rejected, the army officers, glad to have saved their own brave hides, were obliged to cede to the demands of the new regime.

A False Analysis of the Situation

The Communist Party of Brazil, and in imitation of it, the American Party also, have continually painted the Washington Luiz government as being pro-British, picturing the interests of the semi-feudal coffee interests as identical with those of British imperialism. Although they quite correctly point out that British investments in Brazil are double those of the U. S., they fail to consider that the enormous majority of the Brazilian coffee crop is marketed in New York. This is an entirely false and over-simple analysis of the real case, as both imperialisms are deeply interested in Brazilian coffee, while the secondary industries are controlled some by one imperialism and some of the other. Inasmuch as the rubber industry is concerned, the Washington Luiz regime has shown decided favoritism to the Ford interests as against their British rivals.

Our comrades of the Leninist Left Opposition in Brazil, through their monthly organ A Luta de Classe have demonstrated clearly the incorrectness of the official Party's analysis, and have further pointed out that in Brazil, due to the complexities of the economic structure, with the existing diversification of products, each region having its staple, and a mutual though conflicting interest on part of both imperialisms as regards the most important product (coffee), it is impossible to say that either of the two leading imperialist powers actually supported, in the true sense of the word, either one of the two Brazilian parties. Both imperialisms made pacts and agreements with both groups as the particular situation required.

The action of the Wall Street government in rushing to the aid of the old Brazilian regime on the eve of its collapse, undoubtedly induced to lend its support in exchange for promises of future juicy concessions, demonstrates the falsity of the C. P.'s analysis and goes a long way towards confirming that of the Brazilian Left Opposition. Only acrobats can believe the analysis which declares, in the October 21 issue of the Daily Worker, that Wall Street, after having supported the rebellion, turned a triple somersault and flew to the aid of the regime that had already been fatally weakened through its own efforts. The Wall Street millionaire are shrewder politicians than certain of the Daily Worker's star reporters and are certainly not fools enough to do that.

The official press of the American Communist party has dealt very absurdly with the whole problem from the outset. Until the appearance of the aforementioned article the Worker and the other Party organs, shouted loudly that the rebellion was supported by Wall Street. The most ludicrous instance of bureaucratic stupidity of the really naive kind to be found in this already too-much-abused "Third Period" appeared in the Freiheit (Oct. 11, 1930), in an article informing us that a "Mass Communist Uprising Captures the Third Largest City in Brazil." Nothing was said in the Daily Worker concerning an event, which were it true, would have been of enormous revolutionary significance. In reality all that happened (we were forced to find out through the New York Times), was that during a street demonstration of workers in Bahia, several plate glass windows were smashed and a few street cars were overturned. (We will be called counter-revolutionists for saying this, as we are almost every other time that we tell the truth).

The Party Putsch

In Rio de Janeiro however, it seems that the party comrades, staged a melee, in an attempt to "capture power" . . . and were suppressed with numerous casualties, after a couple of hours by the troops and police. The Daily Worker commenting on this last isolated outbreak, which bears all the ear marks of a suicidal putsch, says in its issue of October 28, "The fight of the workers under the leadership of the Communist Party of Brazil shows the deep going radicalization of the masses and the fact that the workers and poor peasants are beginning to put forward their independent demands against their own bourgeoisie as well as against all imperialist forces."

The C. P. of Brazil has, unfortunately, already discredited itself before the masses because of its "anti-imperialist" adventures and its election fizzle with the "Workers and Peasants Block." It is incapable with its many opportunist and ultra-Left defects of leading the masses effectively in struggle.

Our small Left Opposition group in Brazil has already in its ranks a number of serious revolutionary fighters expelled from the Party for their consistent struggle against the opportunism of the leadership. The Bolshevik-Leninists of Brazil have before them the task of rallying about themselves the best proletarian elements of the Party in order to reconstitute and build the Brazilian Communist movement, for the organization of the working class and the struggle for Communism in Brazil.

The Plot Against the Soviets

Stalin Imprisoned the Opposition Bolsheviks and Allowed the Counter-Revolutionists to Get Into Positions of Power

Every worker conscious of his class interests must be profoundly alarmed at the exposure just made of the international conspiracy to overthrow the Soviet government. With a dramatic sharpness, it snatches out of the realm of abstraction the cold facts of the inexorable hostility of the capitalist world to the workers' republic. It makes real and living the fact of the permanent state of war—open or concealed—that exists between the power of the proletariat and the power of the bourgeoisie. Contrary to the soothing theories which have been expressed even in the ranks of the Communist movement, the Soviet state cannot live peacefully by the side of the imperialist states: either the one or the other must be overthrown.

The "Denials" of the Plotters

The statements made by the Soviets, charging the existence of an international plot that involves the imperialist masters of half a dozen countries and hundreds of counter-revolutionary elements in the Soviet Union, cannot be taken lightly, or considered as a passing sensation. Only those completely out of their senses would make such charges involving such "respectable" names as Poincare, Briand, Churchill, Deterding, and the rulers of Poland, Finland and Roumania unless there were substantial evidence to prove them.

We do not, of course, give a fig for the "indignant denials" of these imperialist bandits. Have not a Churchill, Lloyd George, Poincare, Pilsudski, and all the others, spent millions upon millions of dollars, and thousands of working class lives, in previous attempts to overthrow the workers' republic by armed force? Can anybody, except one without a memory, forget the military intervention in Russia of all the imperialist powers after the end of the world war, an intervention conducted on a dozen fronts? Can anybody forget the millions given to the Georgian Mensheviks, to Denikin, Wrangel, Yudenitch, Tchaikovsky, Koltchak, to the Social Revolutionists, to monarchists?

Why should any sane man put any credence in the "denials" of the conspirators? There is no reason at all. It may be that this or that individual named in the charges—based on the confessions of arrested Russian conspirators—cannot have his connection proved, but the fact remains that international capitalism is constantly seeking to overthrow the Soviet government and to support those elements within the Soviet Union who represent the interests of the capitalist class.

The conspiracy has no accidental or passing significance. It is a symptom of a deeply-rooted evolution in the relationship of forces in the Soviet Union. How does it happen that thirteen years after the establishment of the Soviet power, there should be uncovered a well-knit counter-revolutionary organization of some 2,000 people, many, if not most of them, of prominence? They are people who did not become counter-revolutionists yesterday. Many of them have been in the Soviet apparatus for years. Their origin was known, their past recorded: ex-tsarist officers, technicians, manufacturers, nobles, Mensheviks, Cadets, etc., etc. How were these types able to reach such high posts in the Soviet apparatus, and perfect a centralized organization which converted into an actuality the possibility of a counter-revolutionary overthrow of the workers' dictatorship? They could not have started yesterday—such an organization must have required a few years; where was the G. P. U. in the past, where was the proletariat's secret service to unearth these people and bring them to proletarian justice?

It was too busy framing up Left Oppositionists with the aid of provocateurs and "Wrangel officers"—as may yet be done in the present case—to pay attention to the growing danger of counter-revolutionary gangs.

We must answer flatly and openly: The responsibility for this development lies principally upon the present Stalin regime in the Communist Party and upon the Stalin-Bucharin regime that preceded it! The credit for exposing these counter-revolutionary nests lies principally with the Left Opposition, the Bolshevik-Leninists!

The Opposition's Warning

For years past, the Opposition raised the cry of warning against the "Thermidorian danger," that is, the dangerous growth of those capitalist elements in the country, who were even pressing down upon the party, and whose aim was to undermine the proletarian dictatorship—in other words, the counter-revolutionary danger embodied in the kulaks, the Nepman, the bourgeois "specialists", the concessionary, and the Right wing inside the Communist Party. For this warning, the Stalinists and the Bucharinists slandered the Opposition. They denied the Thermidorian danger. They shouted down the Opposition as "alarmists" and people who "speculate on the overthrow of the dictatorship." The Fosters and Lovestones in this and every other country still attack the Opposition for its warning against the Thermidorian threat to Russia. While these epigones centered their attack upon the Left flank of the movement, the Right flank, the counter-revolution took the opportunity to perfect its sinister plans.

The strategy of the counter-revolution was and is: First, we crush the Left Opposition, the proletarian heart of the dictatorship—then comes our day. The club with which to do the crushing was the usurpatory faction of Stalin-Bucharin. A thousand facts prove this.

Among the main leaders of the conspiracy is the chief of the so-called Peasants' Party, Kondratiev, now imprisoned. Almost three years to the day before his arrest by the G. P. U. comrade Trotsky spoke before the Party Central Committee (October 23, 1927) on the proposal by Stalin-Bucharin-and-Co. to exclude him from that body:

"... The thoroughly opportunist faction which has dragged behind it in recent years and still drags behind it the Chiang Kai-Sheks, the Feng Yuhsiangs, the Wang Chin Weis, the Purcells, the Hickses, the Ben Tillets, the Martinovs, the KONDRATIEVS and the Ustrilovs, this faction cannot tolerate us in the Central Committee, not even one month before the Congress. We know why."

In a dozen other speeches and articles, Trotsky warned against the Kondratievs by name and by species. The Kondratievs were kept in the apparatus where they plotted the overthrow of the dictatorship; the Oppositionists who fought them were sent to prison or exile.

Among others arrested in the plot are people like Ramzin, who was nothing less than Fuel Power Director, and Kalinnikov, a commander of the Central Military Academy. How did these two, and countless others reach these high posts, of such immense strategical value to the Soviet power? What Oppositionist was removed, expelled, imprisoned, exiled or killed, in order to make room for the Ramzins and the Kalinnikovs? Did the latter take the places of comrades Ochotnikov, Kuzmitchev, Broldta and Capel, to mention only a few of the Oppositionists—valorous fighters in the civil war and some decorated with the Order of the Red Flag—who were expelled from the Military Academy and the Academy of Aviation?

It is an incontestable fact, which all the rabid howls of the Stalinist penman will not succeed in shouting down, that the ruling clique in the Party was too busy hounding the Opposition to notice the silent advance of the counter-revolution:

For a Genuine United Front of the Millinery Workers

On Saturday, November 8, the Communist Party leaders gained another one of their customary "victories" in what was a horrible example of how a united front should be organized. The weeks of hard work by leading Left wing militants in the millinery industry in New York, who sought to find a common working basis in one of the most advantageous situations the Left wing has had for a long time, were nullified by the Party strategists with the mechanical, wrecking policies for which they have become notorious.

The Origin of the Movement

A few weeks ago, a group of operators, members of Local 24 of the A. F. of L. millinery union, who had found it impossible for the last few years to be part of the official Left wing in view of the prevailing Party policies, decided that the situation created by the threatened imposition of a "collective agreement" necessitated finding a working basis.

The millinery workers recall what the workings of a collective agreement mean to their standards. Up to a few years ago, such an agreement prevailed in the trade and all the workers remember its effects well. Now it is being proposed again. Zaritsky and the other Right wing union bureaucrats have been peddling about this proposal for a collective agreement as a means of "stabilizing the trade." They have pointed out to the manufacturers that it would put to a stop to the "hold-up tactics" of Local 42, the blockers, which has succeeded in raising working standards and wages to a fair extent. To accept the agreement would mean a general cutting of wages, a re-introduction and extension of piece work among the operators, the eventual increasing of working hours, and above all, the weakening of the safeguard of job control by "reorganization," which really means to furnish the bureaucrats and manufacturers with a weapon for discrimination.

Naturally, this situation aroused the spirit of the operators and blockers immediately. Resistance to the impending agreement was shown right away. It was expressed by the awakening of a movement among the operators, whose leading and most militant section organized as a Left wing group. This group approached and collaborated with the Left wing group that had already been working and fighting in Blockers' Local 42 for some time in the past.

Then the group proceeded to negotiate with the official Left wing in the Industrial Union, which in essence means the Party. Endless discussion meetings were held, with the basis for discussion furnished by the need of working within the existing unions. After a number of deliberations, it was finally decided to call a joint meeting, consisting of all Left wing millinery workers, and the headgear department of the Needle Trades Workers I. U., to open up the question. The fact that the Stalinists consented to meet with militants in the old unions (who are theoretically "social fascists") is an indication of how the facts of the struggle compelled them to retreat from their untenable position.

The joint meeting, held three weeks ago, had a discussion of seven long hours during the Party's trade union position was riddled with holes. The "company union" theory and the rest of the stock in trade of the "third period" were conclusively revealed as false and unreal. The idea of coming before the 40 percent of the workers organized in the A. F. of L. union with the cry that the union they built up by struggle is a "company union", which must be left immediately—leaving the mass of the workers at the mercy of the bureaucracy—was shown to be quite untenable.

The Committee of Seven

After a series of maneuvers, a committee of seven was finally elected from the floor. It was shown that a really democratic committee selection was impossible at this meeting, composed of about 150 workers, 75-80 of whom were Party members, representing only themselves, and bound in advance by decisions they had little part in making, while the others represented the overwhelming sentiment of the union under the stress of an impending collective agreement and a lockout.

The lockout threatened by the bosses for November 15, and the need of crystallizing the resistance of the workers, made it necessary for this committee to meet immediately to decide on a course of action. But there was a delay of almost two weeks, caused by the fact that the broad Left wing group had been meeting regularly and formulated the proposal to issue a program and call a meeting at a certain date regardless of the Party's stand. One day later, a meeting was called of the enlarged committee together with the trade committee of the Industrial Union, where, after another exhaustive discussion, the resolution submitted by the broad Left wing was accepted by the Party to be presented at an enlarged meeting on November 8.

The long-delayed meeting finally opened on that day. It appeared as if it were possible finally to create a unified basis for work in the reactionary unions, with the joint efforts of all Left wing militants, regardless of their political or factional affiliations. The resolution was presented, it having been understood that it was to be the only matter discussed. Suddenly Sonia Croll, organizer of the headgear department of the N. T. W. I. U., came forward, made a long, puerile analysis of the trade (an insult to a worker's intelligence), and re-stated the catechism: the existing unions are company unions; they must be smashed; the collective agreement will be put over anyway; that will convince the millinery workers of the futility of Continued on page 2

Are Walker and Lewis Going to Unite?

ILLINOIS MINERS

Howat and the Rank and File Movement

SPRINGFIELD—

Besides injunctions and more injunctions, court-room battles, street bouts, gun duels, slugging one another and local strikes among the Illinois miners, the most striking development is the various maneuvers of John Walker, the secretary-treasurer of the re-organized Miners Union. Like all self-seeking labor fakers, but more notoriously, Walker is dabbling and kowtowing with the most anti-union element of Illinois. Whether it is an American Legion banquet, a Chamber of Commerce meeting, Rotary Club dinner or some boss' political rally Walker is always conspicuous with his two large feet telling them what a great "labor leader" he is and how he has sacrificed and sacrificed and sacrificed for the Miners Union. The Miners call him "Weeping Jack." But there is a reason behind all of Walker's weeping. Walker has played the labor politician's game all his life and he still hopes to become a national figure.

It is only a few days ago that John Walker issued a statement to the American Federation of Labor convention at Boston, which read in part as follows:

"We will be glad to have the American Federation of Labor take any action that has for its purpose the bringing about a conference of the officials of both organizations to arrange for calling of a convention." (My emphasis).

Had the miners who are footing up the bills for the injunctions, lawyers and court costs anything to say about this statement? Is there any provision in the statement to have rank and file represented at the conference? Not at all. Everything is to be done by the officials of both organizations who have been hiring gunmen, fists and throwing verbal dynamite at each other for the last two years.

The Bureaucrats Unite

But Walker's statement is not the first time that this unity proposition sprouted out. During the recent Illinois Federation of Labor convention at Springfield, there were several locals of the re-organized Miners Union that sent delegates. When the question of seating these delegates came on the floor of the convention, Secretary Olander made the following announcement: "We came to an agreement with all parties involved not to seat the delegates from the re-organized locals of the Miners Union. We have done it so as not to create any bad feelings among those concerned. Because we hope to have both factions back with us in the near future." This was accepted by the delegates and even such "dead warriors" like John Hindmarsh who was a delegate from the re-organized union did not make a protest. Walker still had support in the Illinois Federation of Labor convention after the unseating of the miners delegates and if he were sincere in exposing John L. Lewis, this would have been a good time and place to do it. But, no, this could not be done or as Olander said, there had been an agreement reached.

Walker reads the handwriting on the wall. And that is why he is so active at the present time. He is playing a triple game. First, in case the miners put the boot to him, he will readily find a soft spot to land in the camp of the bosses. Second, trying in spite of everything, to become the outstanding miners leader and an "angel of peace" with the hope of becoming international president in place of Lewis and Howat at the fakers' unity convention. Third, he is running for the presidency of Illinois district, for which he not only has his flunkies busy working trying to capture the majority of the nominations to get at the head of the ballot, but also has the support of the Peabody Coal Co. mine guards: As for instance, in the Taylorville district where a Peabody mine guard walked into the local union meeting, put his gun on the table and told the members to nominate Walker for district president.

In the Miners' Rank and File

Will the rank and file miners agree to unity with the two sets of labor fakers or have John Walker for president of the re-organized Miners Union? The answer lies in which way the rank and file is moving and the situation on the Illinois mining fields.

In the Duquoin district the miners are working under the protection of mine guards, deputies and State Police. There one faction is trying to prevent the other faction from working. In Danville a similar situation prevails. Are the miners really doing this because they think that one faction is better than another? Not exactly. It is true that there are several local leaders that are bought and bribed by the one or the other faction and these flunkies are doing the bidding of their pay-masters. The rank and file miners see no hope in either faction and at the present time they are supporting the lesser of the two evils and wait for the opportune moment to rid themselves of both evils.

By JOSEPH ANGELO

In the meantime the coal operators are reaping the harvest. Speed-ups, loading-machines, wages-cuts and worsening of conditions are the order of the day. In the Taylorville district, the Peabody mines are being guarded day and night by a herd of company gunmen, machine gun are being brought to the mine property and each miner is carefully scrutinized as he comes to work every day. (That is, every day the mine works, which is very few). There is no strike here, all belong to one faction. The coal-operators here are preparing more wage-cuts, because they think that they can use one faction against the other when the time comes.

Can Walker and Lewis unite the division in camp by any of their methods? The struggle has gone too far and the wounds too deep and now the whole struggle has simmered down to a fight against both officialdoms and only the rank and file movement can heal the wounds and unite the union.

The Position of Howat

What is the position of Alex Howat in regards to the present struggle? The Fishwick-Walkers and the remnants of Farrington are in complete control of the re-organized Miners Union at the present time. Due to the international constitution adopted at the Springfield convention the whole power of the international executive board lies in the hand of the district presidents. That is, the district presidents have one vote for each two thousands members. Thus, altho Fishwick is district president and Howat international president, Fishwick has twenty votes, to Howat's one. Howat still has the respect and confidence of the rank and file. The mass meetings of Howat's are attended by thousands of miners. At these meetings Howat has urged the necessity of militant policies, the election of rank and file officials, the reinstatement of all those expelled, unemployment insurance and a Labor Party.

At the Mt. Olive memorial meeting on October 11th, Howat replied to the unity compromise of Walker's by saying, "The re-organized Miners Union is more determined than ever to continue its fight against Lewis and his organization. The Lewis wing is a company union and a tool of the coal operators. If the coal operators asked Lewis for anything, they usually got it. Instead of begging from the bosses, the miners must organize a strong militant union." And in reply to one of Fishwick's attorneys that spoke at the meeting who told of what great suffering and sacrifices that Walker, Fishwick and Nesbit went thru, Howat said, "that it was not the officials that did the suffering and sacrificing. They were well paid for what they did. But it was the rank and file that did all the suffering and sacrificing and paying." The coming few months will again test Howat. The crack in the policies will either widen or close. Howat will either have to support the policy of the rank and file in deeds and not words, or the present officialdom. Howat must choose: either the Left wing miners and an open, clear fight on their side; or drifting along at the tail end of the Fishwick kite, and serving to cover up the faults of the "new union's" reactionary leadership. But regardless of where Howat chooses to go, the Left wing must rely on the miner's ranks.

In this whole struggle there is one hopeful spark and that is the development of the rank and file "educational bodies." The first educational body was formed at Staunton. Since then it has spread to Herrin, Pana and Springfield. They have adopted a broad militant policy, uniting the progressive miners in both the Lewis and Fishwick union and carrying on educational work in both of the unions. Walker and Fishwick have already declared this a dual movement. These bodies are a healthy sign and they can be looked upon to play a big role in the future affairs of the Miners Union. They have already an important power, which is increasing right along. These rank and file movements are the cause of Walker and Lewis losing sleep and holding secret unity conferences. Will history repeat itself and Lewis and Walker unite as Lewis and Farrington did several years ago? The rank and file has other plans—plans which will put the fighting within the existing union!

The representatives of the broad Left wing group were once more compelled to speak. For hours they again argued against the false analysis and conclusions of the Industrial Union leaders on the subject of the so-called "company unions." But all to no avail. The Party decision had already been made. A phoney resolution was presented by the Party spokesman, and before any discussion could be had, it was jammed through with the aid of the Party's "packing." The resolution called for a committee to determine (after the weeks of discussion and work!) the nature of our work. The Left wing militants, not under Party discipline, refused to participate in this burlesque of a united front, and one by one declined membership on the committee. Thirteen Party and I. U. members were chosen, and thus ended the "united front" which is now being so widely advertised. No "social fascists," Lovestoneites, Trotskyites, or other non-kosher elements are to "contaminate" the committee.

Party's Arbitrariness

The whole situation spoke loudly of the fact that there is enormous vitality for the Left wing movement, and opportunities for real work. The Left wing workers in the main, understand the need of working unitedly with the whole Left wing movement and with the Party. They made every effort to work together so that prestige and strength would accrue to the Left wing and Communist movement. It was they who approached the Party, and sought united action. All the Party saw in this was a chance to "put something over."

The views of these militants, with years of experience in Left wing struggles, many of them former members of the T. U. E. L., men with standing among the workers, were coolly disregarded by the Party leaders, who thought to "rope them in," so to speak, by the cheap method of getting a mechanical majority in a packed meeting. The weeks of hard work merely demonstrated that the Party leaders will not yield from their untenable position, no matter what the requirements of the situation may be. "Either our line, or nothing."

Nevertheless, it would be a big mistake to stop the work begun by these militants, which was temporarily sidetracked by Party tactics. The position they took at the beginning remains sound: Work in the existing unions, collaborate with the organized Left wing, for unity of all the militants. The attempts by certain Lovestoneite elements to find an "easy road" for this movement by cutting it away from the official Left wing, have met with healthy and justified resistance from these militants who will not fight against the Communist movement but will help to redress its line and the line of the Left wing.

These workers are not taken in by the "simplified" Party theory of "company unions, which breeds passivity, sectarianism and defeatism. They are for a Left wing policy that will win the workers.

Organize the Left Wing!

The alternatives are not limited to either subjugation to the Party's false line, or no Left wing work at all. The Communist movement can and does transcend the stifling bounds of the Stalinist bureaucracy and Left wing militants can organize their work, and fight, without this bureaucracy if needs be, so long as they retain Walkers, Lewises and others that go along with them where they rightfully belong.

In this whole gigantic struggle, where is the Stalinist Communist Party leadership? After all their glittering schemes, grand programs without ways and means for their accomplishment and wild plunges into ill-considered efforts, the "third period" chiefs enthusiastically greeted the miners by their absence. To-day, there is not a single Party unit functioning and Diogenes would need to look with a powerful microscope to find an active Stalinist.

It is due to the program and sober tactics of the Left Opposition that there is an awakening among the militant miners and a realization of the need for careful and substantial organizing of the Left wing in both of the Lewis and Fishwick unions and cutting a direct road past both officialdoms.

their contract with the bulk of the Left wing movement. The work of Left wing blockers in Local 42 amply illustrates that real work can be carried on in spite of Party muddling.

The urgent need now is that, on the basis of these experiences, there should be crystallized a broad Left wing movement, including all the militants in the industry for a struggle against the union bureaucracy, their capitalist masters, their class collaboration practises and theories, and for a class struggle policy and the unification of all the millinery workers. The immensity of the task demands bold and determined action.

New Seamen's «International»

HAMBURG—

There has just been held here a supposed International Seamen's and Dockers' Conference, and we are told that delegates present represented nearly half a million workers. After a lot of revolutionary talk it was decided to set up a revolutionary international of seamen and dockers.

Now we will all agree that such an international is wanted, but any one in close touch with the above conference will have arrived at only one conclusion, and that is, a real international of seamen and dockers can only be brought about by a conference of representatives from bona fide seamen and dockers organizations and not by a meeting of a few paid functionaries of the Communist Party, seamen's clubs and dockers' group.

At the above conference it was claimed that representatives were present from Germany, Britain, France, U. S. A., China, South America, etc., etc. One seemed to find it difficult, however, to discover what organizations they represented. Why all this mystery when five hundred thousand workers were represented, I don't know.

The star turn at the conference was the notorious George Hardy, who long ago became a back number in the States. We next hear of him as a big noise in the Minority Movement in Britain, but he ultimately suffered the same fate there. During the 1925 seamen's strike, Hardy tried to call it off in London while the seamen were still on strike in Australia. And it's a good job for George, but a bad job for the movement, that the seaman didn't get hold of him, otherwise they would have dumped him in the dock.

Another interesting chapter in Hardy's history is his connection with the general strike in England. During the whole period of this strike, although he was the organizing secretary of the Minority Movement, George couldn't be found. (He was probably too busy fraternizing with Messrs. Purcell, Swales and Co. in the Anglo-Russian "Unity" Committee!—Ed.)

It was following this episode that Hardy was given the order of the boot. He now turns up here in Hamburg as the president of the seamen's and Dockers' International. As delegates were present at this conference from the U. S. A., it would be interesting to learn what seamen's and dockers' organization they represented and what voting power they carried numerically.

The Benefits of Hillmanism

By ALBERT ORLAND

Since the Amalgamated Clothing Workers embarked on the policy of class collaboration, a great change has taken place in the organizational and social outlook of that once radical labor union. From an organization whose chief concern was the well-being of its membership and whose social guide was the principle of the solidarity of labor, the A. C. W. has been transformed into an agency for the promotion of rationalization in the clothing industry, with the workers being the victims of all the concomitants of capitalist rationalization.

Militant Collaboration

The leadership of the Amalgamated has been selling this sort of unionism to all: manufacturers, workers and the "public." All are welcome to share in its benefits, and, we are assured, all are anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity wherever it has been given them by the generous hand of the A. C. W. leadership. Those who oppose the protection and the benefits of Amalgamated control, as we are enlightened, are either stupid or incorrigible fanatics and dogmatists. Not only have Hillman and his associates displayed sufficient courage and aggressiveness in following the line of class collaboration policy, but they have given it widespread publication as the last word in trade unionism. The A. C. W. has for years promulgated this policy in its official organs, giving numerous demonstrations of its workings and even taking pride in its achievements.

What is the essence of this Amalgamated "new unionism"? Who has benefited by it, and what are the real conditions of the Amalgamated members in the shops and out of the shops, as a result of the application of the new policy? Let us analyze this policy and look into the facts.

The principle of union-employers cooperation is not new. It has been advocated and practiced by all reformist unions. It consists of the recognition of the common interests of capital and labor and of the necessity of cooperation for the common benefit of both.

The A. C. W. leadership has not introduced any new elements into this conception to justify its claims to being the most "advanced" trade union in the labor movement. It has, however, proved able to camouflage this policy of class collaboration with such names as the "new strategy", "militant unionism", realistic militant unionism, etc., and for that it certainly deserves credit and admiration as no other trade union in the country.

In practice, the A. C. W. policy expresses itself in the following manner: The union and the employers cooperate in reducing labor costs by increasing production, eliminating waste, applying efficient methods, eliminating strikes and promoting peaceful relations between both parties. The workers are to receive the benefits of increased production in the form of union wages and hours.

What the Bosses Want

Any clear-minded person will easily understand that employers do not need the cooperation of a labor union in the rationalization of their enterprises, that technical management can be procured outside of trade union offices and that non-union shops are no less concerned about efficient methods of production than union shops. What an employer can, however, expect from a labor union is cooperation in eliminating strikes and securing uninterrupted production.

The A. C. W. entered the field of rendering that kind of service to the clothing manufacturers and has proved able to measure up to its task. It has even gone further than that. It has offered them the services of all the resources of the organization, cooperation in the shops by efficiency experts it maintains, credits from its banks in addition to guarantees of peace and uninterrupted production. The A. C. W. boastfully claims to have put the union shops in an advantageous position in comparison with non-union shops in regard to competition, that it has actually made the open shop a non-paying proposition for employers.

Hillman, surely, cannot be denied recognition for accomplishing these ends. In fact, he has been compensated for his achievements by high praise from all sorts of patriotic and reformist quarters and was even accorded medals for his contributions to the cause of social peace. But what benefits have the workers in the clothing industry received in return for their cooperation? What has rationalization given them and what are their prospects?

Thousands of Amalgamated members have been thrown out into the streets, replaced by machinery or eliminated as "waste in industry" by A. C. W. efficiency experts. They are doomed to starvation, victims of Hillman's "militant efficiency unionism."

Is the A.C.W. officialdom aware of these facts? What are its answers to them? In Advance, official organ of the A. C. W., of March 14, 1930, we read from a speech delivered by an A. C. W. organizer at a conference of the Railway Clerks, the following reference to these facts:

"The policy of cooperation for efficiency meant the gradual elimination of the inefficient shops and with the dying out of these shops a good many people lost their employment temporarily. We were compelled to face that, and in the working out of the process the temporary hardships of the displacements have been compensated for a hundred fold in the tremendous improvements in wages and conditions that have been made possible in a more efficient industry."

Here is an open admission that the policy of cooperation is responsible for the great unemployment existing in the clothing industry. But the Amalgamated bureaucrat sidetracks this question by inserting the meaningless "temporarily" and making references to "tremendous improvements," apparently hoping in this manner to knock any possible critic off his feet.

What "Temporary" Means in the A. C. W.

But what has become of the "good many people who have lost their employment temporarily?" Have they been put back into the industry? Or were they eliminated "temporarily" until forced to drift into other occupations, or died of starvation? There was a case a few years ago with 150 cutters of the Chicago organization who were eliminated by the joint decision of the union and Hart, Schnaffner and Marx for a compensation of $500 a piece, and eliminated permanently with admonitions never to come back because the industry did not need them any more. And the cutters were the aristocrats in the industry. This case can be characterized as the siren of "efficiency unionism." For what happened to the Chicago cutters a few years ago has since become a daily occurrence and a matter of routine in the clothing shops under Amalgamated control. Hundreds of cutters and thousands of workers from other branches have been eliminated without any compensation to face starvation and misery. There are today hundreds of "aristocrats" permanently unemployed in the New York market, members of the once powerful Cutters Local 4. The membership of this local has dwindled from 4,000 to 2,000, with more than one-third permanently unemployed.

Now how about the "tremendous improvements" in wages and conditions referred to by the A. C. W. organizer in his speech? Have the wage standards been raised or lowered as a result of the increased production? Are there any wage standards at all in A. C. W. shops outside of these fixed by the employers and sanctioned by the officials of the Amalgamated? Are there any price committees in the shops? And, by the way, why was it necessary to abolish the week-work system which has been so fiercely resisted by the workers and forced on them by the Beckermans and other agents of Hillman?

That the piece-work system has been forced on the workers as a scheme to increase the speed up and reduce wages is given testimony by the officialdom recently on the occasion of the introduction of piece-work in the Montreal market. In Advance, July 11, 1930, under the caption "News from Montreal" the following explanation is given by the Montreal officialdom:

"It has become increasingly important to give the manufacturers who are willing to stand by the union a fair chance to do business in competition with the 'illegitimate' (meaning the non-union) manufacturers. The prevailing system of week-work in the Montreal market has placed the inside bona-fide manufacturers at a disadvantage in comparison with the 'illegitimate'."

Hillman Gives the Bosses a Break!

The manufacturers are given a fair chance through the piece-work system to cut the wages to the level of the non-union workers in order to be able to compete with non-union shops. The increase in efficiency does not seem, at least in this case, to warrant any "tremendous improvements" in wages. One can even conclude from the above explanation that this "efficiency" is produced by the speed-up forced on the Amalgamated members by piece work and other schemes.

And how about the hours of work? Has the A. C. W. made any attempt to shorten the hours, a reform so imperative at the present tie and surely warranted by an efficient industry? Except for adopting resolutions at conventions, nothing has been attempted in that direction.

The "new, militant, realistic unionism" of the Amalgamated, when stripped of its attractive coverings, emerges as a genuine reactionary kind of union-employer cooperation, a boomerang to the workers. This "militant" unionism has in a few years wiped out all the gains the clothing workers had enjoyed in past years as a result of their struggles, it has ruined their lives and hopes. This "unionism" can only be maintained by force and deceit. Such a regime has been established and perfected by the Amalgamated bureaucracy.

Hillman boasts of his banks, cooperative apartment houses, and office buildings. The workers know that all these have been built on their sweat and blood, and enjoyed by manufacturers and union bureaucrats, while they suffer and starve. The day is not far off when the clothing workers will arise to action and radically change the leadership and the policies of the Amalgamated.

Rose Karsner Bus. Manager

At a recent meeting of the national committee of the League, comrade Rose Karsner was appointed to take over the business and financial management of the Militant. Comrade Karsner has had a wealth of experience in the movement and her work will be of great assistance to the stabilizing of our paper. Plans are already under way for conducting a campaign to insure the Militant and make it possible to return to a weekly status. As a first step in this work, an appeal has just been made to the branches to raise a small quota for an emergency. The response to the appeal—which is only little over a week—has been good: The Minneapolis comrades sent in $20.00; New York, $22.00; Toronto, $37.00; Chicago, $23.00; Boston, $5.00, and the others still to be heard from. We urge all our comrades and supporters to give the new manager the measure of cooperation that will make our further work secure.

"The Draft Program of the Communist International" by L. D. Trotsky is a thorough analysis of the principal theories animating the course pursued by the leadership of the International since 1923—the theory of socialism in one country and the question of the character of the revolution in the colonial and semi-colonial countries. comrade Trotsky's secretary, Georgi Butov, to death, while Stalin's secretary was enabled to go abroad and turn White Guard.

The Stalinist regime stood comrade Jakob Blumkin against the wall and shot him—a dastardly crime they have never dared to defend publicly. Then Stalin appointed Mr. Agabekov to Blumkin's post. Agabekov went abroad to join the army of the counter-revolution!

An accusation is now made against Briand, and justly. But in 1927, when the Briands demanded the withdrawal of comrade Christian Rakovsky as Soviet ambassador to France, because he had signed the Platform of the Opposition, Stalin and Bucharin withdrew Rakovsky. Who replaced the Rakovskys? Bessedovsky, who helped to expel Rakovsky in the Party nucleus! Bessedovsky, who fled through the back window of the Soviet Embassy in Paris to join the ranks of the enemies of the proletarian dictatorship!

In the United States, Serebriakov, (who later capitulated) was taken out of the Amtorg. His place was taken by the Delgasses. Delgass has now joined the counter-revolutionary hue and cry against the Soviets; he has become the darling of the New York White Guards.

The charges name Lord Churchill. They might have added the name of his colleague Chamberlain, who said England would recognize Russia only when Trotsky is stood against the wall and shot. Is there any difference in essence between that command, and the reality—the fact that comrade Trotsky was finally deported to Turkey; the fact that comrade Rakovsky is in mortal danger in Barnaul, threatened with death by Stalin's refusal to transfer him to another climate; that Muralov, ex-military head of the Moscow district (what Kalinnikov took his place?), is desperately ill in Siberian deportation; that comrade Zinzadze wracked by tuberculosis, is kept in solitary exile; that hundreds and thousands of others are suffering the same fate?

We repeat that the Stalinist regime, with the whole state and party apparatus at its command, was so occupied with hounding and suppressing the Bolshevik Opposition as "agents of world imperialism", that the real agents of counter-revolution were enabled to mobilize the strength they have now been shown to have.

Stalin and the Right Wing

The Stalinist clique, which now admits that the conspirators were staking their cards on the victory of the Right wing (Bucharin-Rykov-Tomsky), was the intimate partner of this very same Right wing in the campaign to strangle the Bolshevik-Leninists. To the extent that this campaign was successful, it was a victory, not for the proletariat, but for the Kondratievs, the Ramzins, the Ustariakovs, the Chamberlains and world imperialism as a whole.

* * *

The capitalist press is making a sickly effort to minimize the whole plot. Naturally. They wish to lull the workers into a false security. But the vanguard will not be deceived. The Thermidorian danger, the danger of the growth of the counter-revolutionary forces, is a real one in the Soviet Union. Soviet Russia, isolated from the capitalist world, encircled by the might of world imperialism, still has a strong base for capitalist elements and capitalist restoration. The advances of the Soviet Union, while it liquidates some of these elements, sharpen the contradictions inherent in an isolated proletarian state and bring the restorationist dangers to a head. The Stalinist regime accentuates these dangers.

Oscillating between a proletarian line and a petty bourgeois line, Stalinism is unable to mobilize properly the international revolutionary resistance of the workers. This task, now more imperative than ever in the face of the recent exposures, requires a Leninist course, a Leninist regime in the Party, a Leninist policy towards the proletariat at home and towards the international movement. It requires a Leninist leadership. This leadership is dispersed, in prison and exile. It must be recalled and reinstated.

The counter-revolution has raised its ominous head. The Bolsheviks, the fighters and leaders of the October revolution, are needed in the Party to crush the threat to the Soviet Union and the international revolution.

The A. F. of L. Convention and the November Election

By MAX SHACHTMAN

Two recent events, separated by less than a month, furnish us with aspects in different fields of the position of the American working class. They are the "golden jubilee" convention of the American Federation of Labor in Boston and the national elections just concluded.

The A. F. of L. Convention

It has become a commonplace to say of the former that it was "one of the most reactionary assemblages in its history." That trait, indeed, has come to be taken with an almost fatalistic certainty. The Boston convention did not seem to be illuminated with the faintest ray of light. The petty bourgeoisie and big bourgeoisie that dominated the A. F. of L. and its convention, its spokesmen who ranged from the principal executive of the American capitalist class, Hoover, to its scarcely concealed agent, Green, ruled the convention in dead-black serenity. The burning problems of the working class, crying out for solution, were either entirely ignored or else treated with a cold, dead hand.

Less than three out of the approximately forty millions of workers are organized into the A. F. of L. It is to the direct interests of the organized workers, and corresponds to the desire of the more conscious among them, to draw the other millions into the trade union movement, so that—even from the narrow standpoint of the trade unionist—the "bargaining power" of labor is increased. Two years ago, the New Orleans convention of the A. F. of L., walled in between the demand for organizing the unorganized that proceeded from within the unions and the work that was begun independently by the Left wing from the outside, issued the slogan of "double the membership," just as the Detroit convention before it issued the slogan of organizing the automobile industry. The history of this "campaign" is completed in two sentences: The Toronto convention repeated the "double the membership" slogan. The Boston convention tacitly attended the funeral where even its name was not mentioned. In place of the new forces from the immense reservoir of unorganized that has only to be tapped in order to flow torrentially, the convention had a new decline in membership to record.

Increasing millions of workers are unemployed in the country, suffering intense misery, starving in the golden storehouse of the world like Tantalus, surrounded by food and unable to avail himself of it. The debates on the subject of unemployment and relief were like the droning of monks cut off from the real world without. The only loud voices raised were those of the reactionaries who, like Green, considered it preferable for the workers to starve in the streets, than for them to want even that pitiful, bureaucratic social insurance that the liberals advocate as a sedative for social unrest. Thoughtful members of the capitalist class—more concerned with their own interests, to be sure, than with relieving working class misery—are looking with approval at some mild form of insurance, but not the hierarchy of the A. F. of L. Like the servile footman, the Greens are more concerned for the interests of their master than the master himself.

To bring out more distinctly the reactionary pall hanging over the convention, the "progressives" can be mentioned. Timid and pitiful though their bleating protests may have been—and they were worse than that—the manner in which even their supplicating and thoroughly respectful speeches and proposals were received (they might have been made in the arid deserts of Africa for all the attention they got in Boston) only emphasized the iron rule of the Greens, Lewises, Wolls and Hutchesons. And why should the barons of the A. F. of L. treat these people with less contempt? They occupy a miserable post akin to the Russian czar's "official Jew", the hof Jude who was kept at court to show that the emperor was not an anti-semiter.

What the whole situation demanded from one with the pretentious title of "progressive" was a vigorous denunciation of the whole bureaucracy and its system i. e., of capitalism and those who serve it in the labor movement. But when the "progressives" bear names like Zaritsky, whose claim to trade union leadership rest principally upon collaboration with the hat manufacturers and persecution of the Left wing minorities in his union, it would be asking for too much.

Despite all these features, which combine to produce the even monotony of constantly deepening reaction at every year's convention, there are valuable aspects to this convention which crown the period that preceded it.

Labor's Dissatisfaction

A restlessness and discontentment is permeating the American working class. It is beginning to awaken from the luxurious dream of the prosperity days. It is not only feeling the scourge of unemployment, but the radical lowering of its living standards in a dozen different forms: wage cuts, lengthening of the working day, intensification of labor, "stagger systems" and the like. Directing the hostility at the boss, it also commences to discern behind the capitalist government the hazy figure of the capitalist class. In a word, the premises are present for the development of a clear class consciousness among the workers.

The bureaucracy of the A. F. of L., and its whole conservative machinery, are pillars of American imperialism—more visible today than ever. Without them, the security of the ruling class would be considerably diminished. The function of the bureaucracy is to prevent the workers from understanding the class nature of the government. That this function is being exercised by Green and Co. with more energy today than for many years past, speaks loudly for their fear of an imminent awakening of the American workers as a class, the consummation of which would be a landmark in revolutionary progress.

Thirteen years ago, the capitalist class required the solid support of the working class for the imperialist slaughter. It needed the official labor movement as a bulwark against the Red menace presented by the militant socialist and I. W. W. opposition to the war. It therefore took the unusual step of sending Woodrow Wilson to an A. F. of L. convention to enlist labor. In 1930, it needs its docile acquiescence because the crisis is to be "solved" at the expense of the workers. It needs the A. F. of L. more than ever as a barricade against the new Red menace of the Communist movement. It therefore recurs to the unusual step of sending a president to give a public demonstration of the unity of the official labor movement and the capitalist government. Hoover's speaking at the Boston meeting was not a sign of the confidence the capitalist class feels, but of its uneasiness.

The A. F. of L. Decline

There is an even more interesting phase of the A. F. of L.'s development, which is quite without precedent. Since it was organized in 1881, it has reflected, with greater or lesser accuracy, the alternating periods of boom and crisis. With virtually no deviation, it increased its membership with every economic rise (1889, 1899-1903, 1905-1908, 1911, 1913, 1915-1920) and declined precipitately with every depression or crisis. The depression commencing in 1920, found it at its un-repeated height: 4,078,740 members. With the crisis it declined to 2,865,799 in 1924. But the period of prosperity that followed, absolutely unprecedented in modern times, far from resulting in a growth of membership, actually shows a persistent decline that has continued to this moment—throughout the prosperity, down to the present crisis! The decline continued at the Boston convention, for while a formal increase of 27,000 members was recorded, both this "increase" and the real loss are accounted for by the calm report of the U. M. W. A., made by Lewis without batting an eyelash in which 400,000 members were claimed (when there are actually less than 100,000 miners in the Lewis union).

How is this record, which breaks with previous, allegedly "historical" precedents, to be explained?

American imperialism emerged from the war, from the post-war domestic crisis and the revolutionary crises of Europe, not only as a first-rate world power, but as the first world power. Its frenzied expansion after 1924 was an expansion beyond its boundaries. Its wealth and power rested, and still rests upon its dominant position in world economy. One may say that the relationship of the international working class was to the American working class as a whole what the relationship of the unskilled American worker is to the American labor aristocrat. American imperialism was enabled—for the first time on such a scale—to sustain a broad labor aristocracy. The rise in the standard of living of this section of the workers, which counted millions in its ranks, was, so to speak, "granted without a struggle" by a bloated capitalist class. Unlike previous periods, labor's economic improvements were not squeezed out through the intermediary of the trade unions. With a "satisfied" working class at home, the fabulous super-profits extorted by American imperialism from the rest of the world, not only made these improvements possible but even profitable.

The Fall of the Strike Curve

This view is confirmed by the index of strike activities. Previous periods of prosperity and trade union growth have almost always been characterized by an increase in the number of strikes and strikers. The last period of prosperity and of improved workers' economic conditions showed a directly opposite process: strikes and strikers have been almost uninterruptedly on the decline not only from 1920 but from 1924. To use the figures of the U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, repeated recently by the Standard American Corporation, we get the following table (Strike column includes lookouts):

Year	Strikes	Involved
1919	3,630	4,160,348
1920	3,411	1,463,054
1921	2,385	1,099,247
1922	1,112	1,612,562
1923	1,553	756,584
1924	1,249	654,641
1925	1,301	428,416
1926	1,035	329,592
1927	734	349,434
1928	629	357,145
1929	903	230,463

The current year shows a still further decline (about 40 percent less than the 1929 figure for the same months). And the tremendous unemployment attendant upon the present crisis does not indicate any increase in strike activity for the period immediately ahead.

From all that has been said above, it does not at all follow that the outlook for the American working class is so uniformly dark. It is an established fact that, especially in our time, apparently fixed precedents are broken, that the slow arithmetical progression of the working class is frequently interrupted either by abrupt geometric leaps or by a retrogression. So far as the radicalization of the working class is concerned, the last half a decade has shown a retrogression on the whole. But this very past has prepared the grounds for a penetration of the revolutionary idea into the consciousness of the proletariat.

There is an enormous working class discontentment in the country. Thus far it is blind and mirdirected, that is, politically, it is safely canalized into the bourgeois parties this time the Democrats. The bulk of the working class voted against Hoover and his administration as the embodiment of the crisis and the unemployment. So rapidly do profound changes in economic and political life take place in our epoch, that it required only a brief two years to secure a repudiation of a government swept into power with the biggest vote on record. From 1928 to 1930, the turnover of votes amounted to upwards of 8,000,000 (the total of the Republican plurality in 1928 plus the Democratic plurality this year). Neither the Wilson administration but the disreputable Harding regime suffered so humiliating and rapid a defeat as did Hoover.

What About Radicalization

But this discontentment is not yet a radicalization of the working class. So far as the latter was expressed politically, it was done largely through the tiny vote of the Communist Party (a bare doubling of the still smaller "prosperity" vote in 1928), to which should be added, of course, many thousands of disfranchised workers. But the results of the elections, plus the statistics of strike struggle—the two principal indices of working class radicalization—are a smashing blow at the monstrously exaggerated analyses of the Stalinists. Their contentions concerning the "mass upsurge of the American workers", the "widespread radicalization of the masses", "the workers following the Communist Party"—all these fall to the ground before the facts. To a moderate extent, the Left Opposition shared his error in the past. That is, it proceeded from the indisputable fact that the premises exist for a deep-going radicalization of the workers and drew the conclusions that the process was well under way. Closer examination and recent developments indicate that the pre-conditions for radicalization are even increasing, but the process is only at its elementary stage of development.

At what tempo will it proceed? What will be the extent of its sweep? Where will it end? That depends not only a series of economic factors, but in larger degree than is usually conceived, upon the ability of the revolutionists to take advantage of the premises in order to accelerate the process of radicalization.

There is no law compelling the working class of America to repeat the experiences of its own past or those of the European working class, at any rate, not for the same length of time. We live, as we have remarked, in an epoch of convulsions, developing jerkily and unevenly, replete with the breaking of precedents. All "precedent" showed that in this election there should have a large "third party" which, like the Greenbackers, the People's Party, the Progressive Party and the Labor Party movement of seven-eight years ago, would arise fatally on the basis of an economic crisis. But this "law" was violated: there was no real sign of a "third party" in the present elections. The dissatisfaction of the masses was almost wholly absorbed by the Democratic Party.

For many historical reasons, the American working class is a very violent one, and at the same time the least class conscious. With the whole atmosphere favorable for a swift development of this consciousness, what is mainly needed to achieve it is a Communist Party capable of seeing at what turn we find ourselves, and steering for the right road. But the Party leaders, who are really only approaching this road, conduct the Party and its policies as though the road were not only reached but already half-way travelled over. That is why we have one smash-up after another under the leadership of the "third period" specialists who cannot distinguish tomorrow from yesterday or today, and take the beginning of a process for its conclusion.

What is needed is a bold leadership, not a foolhardy or foolish one, with policies based on realities and not fantasies. Such a leadership could liquidate the liquidators of the Right wing without great difficulties, for it would oppose to the latter's policies those Bolshevik policies that produce successes and not the defeats that the Right wing feeds upon. The Lovestone group, recovering from its grudging and pallid support to the program of organizing the unorganized into industrial unions under the leadership of the Left wing, has become bold enough to raise the slogan "back to the A. F. of L."—its "clever" way of proposing an end to this "foolish business" of the new unions. Without wasting time arguing with the Right wing over the need of winning—from within—the A. F. of L. workers (a need which we, at least, take for granted), the Communist movement must proceed with the consolidation of the new unions, which have a tremendous future and great vitality, and all the conditions for which still exist. It is hardly necessary to emphasize here that we do not withdraw a syllable of our criticism of the Stalinists who, by their conduct in the Left wing unions, have done incalculable harm to the new movement. But even they have been unable to destroy it or its possibilities.

The Place of the Left Opposition

What is needed is a leadership capable of strengthening the Party, not keeping it stagnant or weakening it. What the present Party leadership does is to broaden the base for reformism and not for revolution: that is, its policies help to alienate the awakening workers from Communism and to drive them into the socialist or syndicalist camp. Out of the present Party leadership, which is thoroughly corrupted by Stalinism, no fundamental progress can be expected. That must proceed from the ranks of the Party and the Left wing around it, a process that the Left Opposition is helping to accelerate by building its own ranks and organizing the Bolshevik faction within the Party itself. Our struggle is inextricably bound up with the whole question of the path of the American working class, the question raised anew by the two events we have discussed: the revolutionary road or the reformist. Our victory is one guarantee that it will tread the former.

How Stalin-Bucharin Destroyed the Chinese Revolution

Dear Comrades!

Since I followed our comrades to found the Chinese Communist Party, I sincerely executed the policy of opportunism of the international leaders, Stalin, Zinoviev, Bucharin and others making the Chinese revolution suffer a shameful and sad failure. Though I have worked night and day, yet my demerits exceed my merits. Of course, I should not imitate the hypocritical confessions of some of the ancient Chinese emperors: "I, one person, am responsible for all the sins of the people," take upon my own shoulders all the mistakes that caused the failure. Nevertheless I feel ashamed to adopt the attitude of some responsible comrades at times—only criticizing the past mistakes of opportunism and excluding oneself. Whenever my comrades have pointed out my past opportunist errors, I earnestly acknowledged them. I am absolutely unwilling to ignore the experiences of the Chinese revolution obtained at the highest price paid by proletarians in the past (from the "August 7" conference to the present time, I not only did not reject proper criticism against me, but I even kept silent about the exaggerated accusations against me.)

Not only am I willing to acknowledge my past errors, but now or in the future, if I have or should have any opportunist errors in thought or action; likewise, I expect comrades to criticize me mercilessly with theoretical argument and fact. I humbly accept or shall accept all criticism but not rumors and false accusations. I cannot have such self-confidence as Chi-Chiu Bai and Lee Li San. I clearly recognize that it is never an easy thing for anybody or any party to avoid the errors of opportunism. Even such veteran Marxists as Kautsky and Plechanov committed unpardonable opportunism when they were old; those who followed Lenin for a long time like Stalin and Bucharin, are now also committing shameful opportunism; how can superficial Marxists like us be self-satisfied? Whenever a man is self-satisfied, he prevents himself from making progress.

Even the banner of the Opposition is not the incantation of the "Heavenly Teacher" Chang (the head of the Taoist religion who has the "power" of driving out devils). If those who have not fundamentally cleared out the ideology of the petty bourgeoisie, plainly understood the system of past opportunism and decisively participated in struggles, merely stand under the banner of the Opposition to revile the opportunism of Stalin and Lee Li San, and then think that the opportunist devils will never approach they are under an illusion. The only way of avoiding the errors of opportunism is continually and humbly to learn from the teachings of Marx and Lenin in the struggles of the proletarian masses and in the mutual criticism of comrades.

I decisively recognize that the objective cause of the failure of the last Chinese revolution is second in importance, and that the chief point is that the error of opportunism is the error of our policy in dealing with the bourgeois Kuo Min Tang*. All the responsible comrades of the Central Committee at that time, especially myself, should openly and courageously recognize that this policy was undoubtedly wrong.

* Stalin said: "Was the policy of the Bolsheviks in 1905 correct? Yes it was correct. But why did there exist Soviets and the correct policy of the Bolsheviks, but yet the 1905 revolution could not succeed? This was because the power of the feudal relics and the despotic government was stronger than that of the revolutionary movement. Cannot we say that the policy of the Chinese Communist Party has not improved the fighting power of the proletariat, made the relations between the proletariat and the broad masses more intimate, and increased the prestige of the proletariat among the masses? Very evidently, we cannot say so." The correct policy, of course, is not the only guarantee of success but erroneous policy is the chief guarantee of failure. If we think that the power of the enemy is stronger though there is a correct policy, and yet the revolution cannot succeed, then the failure of the Russian revolution in 1905 and the failure of the Chinese revolution in 1927 and all other failures of the workers' revolutionary movement, are pre-destined. I do not want to have Stalin defend the Chinese Party like this, and am even more unwilling to defend myself with Stalin's words.

A LETTER BY TCHEN DU HSIU

But it is not enough merely to recognize the error. We must sincerely and thoroughly acknowledge that the past error was the internal content of the policy of opportunism, what were the causes and results of that policy, and reveal them clearly. Then we can hope to stop continuing the errors of the past, and the repetition of former opportunism in the next revolution. When our Party was first founded, though it was quite young, yet, under the guidance of the Leninist International, we did not commit any great mistakes. For instance, we decisively led the struggle of the workers and recognized the class nature of the Kuo Min Tang. In 1921, our Party induced the delegates of the Kuo Min Tang and other social organizations to participate in the Far Eastern Workers' Conference, which was called by the Third International. The resolutions of the conference was that in the colonial countries of the East, the struggle for the democratic revolution must be carried out, and that in this

Soviet Russia stands on the side of the C.P.C. I shall oppose Soviet Russia at once."

At this period the Chinese Communists were not very much tainted with opportunism so that we could conduct the strike of the railroad workers on February 7, 1923, and the "May 30th" movement of 1925, since we were not hindered by the policy of the K.M.T. and at times severely criticized the compromising policy of the K.M.T. As soon as the proletariat raised its head in the "May 30th" movement, the bourgeoisie was immediately aroused.

At the enlarged conference of the Central Committee of the C.P., held in Peking in October of the same year, I submitted the following proposal to the Political Resolution Committee; Tai Chi Sao's pamphlets were not accidental but the indication that the bourgeoisie attempted to strengthen its own power for the purpose of checking the proletariat and going over to the counter-revolution. We should be ready

The following document, originally entitled "Appeal to all the Comrades of the Chinese Communist Party", is of enormous importance to every revolutionary worker throughout the world. That is why the Militant has decided to publish it in full despite its length. The Stalin-Bucharin apparatus has for years suppressed the point of view of the Bolshevik Opposition on the Chinese revolution. With equal ruthlessness, it has sought to prevent the movement from knowing just how it destroyed the Chinese revolution with its Menshevik policies. The document by comrade Tchen is a contribution of primary importance towards clarifying the concealed points. It is interesting to observe that comrade Tchen was not only the founder and leader of the Chinese Party for years, but its secretary at the time of the 1925-27 revolution. As he relates he carried out the Stalin-Bucharin policies faithfully, and earned some very sharply critical remarks from Trotsky at that time. All the more significant now is his acknowledgement of the correctness of comrade Trotsky's viewpoint and criticism. The Chinese, the Indian—in fact, all the colonial and semi-colonial—revolutions cannot be understood today, or the correct policies adopted for their victory without understanding the yesterday. The Stalinists—for cause!—sought and still seek to conceal their disgraceful record of yesterday, and thus prevent progress for today and tomorrow. Comrade Tchen's document, on the contrary, helps make possible tomorrow's success. We urge all readers to follow it closely.—Ed.

revolution peasant Soviets should be organized.

In 1922, at the second conference of the Chinese Party the policy of the joint front in the democratic revolution was adopted, and based upon this we expressed our attitude towards the political situation. At the same time, the representative of the Young Communist International, Dalin, came to China and suggested to the Kuo Min Tang the policy of a joint front of the revolutionary groups. The head of the Kuo Min Tang, Sun Yat Sen rigidly refused it only allowing the members of the Chinese Communist Party and the Youth League to join the Kuo Min Tang and obey it, denying any union beyond the Party.

Soon after the adjournment of our Party conference the Communist International sent its delegate, Maring, to China inviting all the members of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party to hold a meeting at the West Lake of Hangchow, in Chekiang Province, at which he suggested to the Chinese Party that it join the Kuo Min Tang organization. He strongly contended that the Kuo Min Tang was not a party of the bourgeoisie, but the joint party of various classes and that the proletarian party should join it in order to improve this party and advance the revolution.

At that time, all the five members of the Central Committee of the Chinese C.P.—Lee-Shu Chang, Chang Teh Li, Tsai Ho Sung, Kan Chiun Yu and I—unanimously opposed the proposal. The chief reason was: To join the Kuo Min Tang was to confuse the class organizations and curb our independent policy. Finally, the delegate of the Third International asked if the Chinese Party would obey the decision of the International.

Thereupon, for the sake of respecting international discipline the Central Committee of the C.P.C. could not but accept the proposal of the III International and agree to join the Kuo Min Tang. After this, the international delegate and the representatives of the Chinese Party spent nearly a year to carry on the reorganization movement of the Kuo Min Tang. But from the very outset the Kuo Min Tang entirely neglected and refused it. Many times Sun Yat Sen said to the delegate of the International: "So far the Chinese C.P. has joined the Kuo Min Tang; it should obey the discipline of the K.M.T. and should not openly criticize it. If the Communists do not obey the Kuo Min Tang I shall expel them from it; if immediately to withdraw from the Kuo Min Tang. We should maintain our political countenance, lead the masses and not be checked by the policy of the Kuo Min Tang. At that time both the delegate of the III International and the responsible comrades of the Central Committee unanimously opposed my suggestion, saying that it was to propose to the comrades and the masses to take the path of opposing the Kuo Min Tang. I, who had no decisiveness of character, could not insistently maintain my proposal and respect international discipline and the opinion of the majority of the Central Committee.

Chiang Kai-Shek's coup d'Etat on March 20, 1926 was made to carry out Tai Chi Sao's principles. Having arrested the Communists in large numbers, disarmed the guards of the strike committees of Canton and Hong Kong of the visiting Soviet Russian group (most of the members of this group were members of the Central Committee of the U.S.S.R.) and of the Soviet advisors, the Central Committee of the Kuo Min Tang decided that all Communist elements retire from the supreme party headquarters of the K.M.T., that criticism of Sun Yat Senism by Communists be prohibited, and that the list of the names of the members of the Communist Party and of the League, who joined the K.M.T. be handed over to the latter. All these we accepted.

At the same time we resolved to prepare our independent military forces in order to be equal to the forces of Chiang Kai-Shek. Comrade Peng Shu Chih was sent to Canton as representative of the Central Committee of the Chinese Party to consult the International delegate about our plan. But the latter did not agree with us, and endeavored his best constantly to enforce Chiang Kai-Shek. He rigidly advocated that we exhaust all our strength to support the military dictatorship of Chiang Kai-Shek, to strengthen the Canton government, and to carry on the Northern Expedition. We demanded that he take 5,000 rifles out of those given to Chiang Kai Shek and Lee Chi Shing, so that we might arm the peasants of Kwantung province. He refused, saying: "The armed peasants cannot fight with the forces of Chen Chuin Ming nor take part in the Northern Expedition, but they can incur the suspicion of the Kuo Min Tang and make the peasants oppose it."

This was a most critical period. Concretely speaking, it was the period when the bourgeois K.M.T. openly compelled the proletariat to follow its guidance and direction, that the proletariat was formally declared by us to surrender to the bourgeoisie, to follow it, and be willing to be subordinates of the bourgeoisie. (The international delegate said openly: "The present period is a period in which the Communists should do the coolie service for the Kuo Min Tang.") By this time, the Party was already not the party of the proletariat, having become completely the extreme Left wing of the bourgeoisie, and beginning to fall into the deep pit of opportunism.

After the coup of March 20, I stated in a report to the III International my personal opinion that cooperation with the Kuo Min Tang by means of joint work within it should be changed to cooperation outside the K.M.T. Otherwise, we would be unable to carry out our own independent policy or secure the confidence of the masses. After having read my report, the international put an article by Bucharin in Pravda, severely criticizing the Chinese Party on withdrawing from the Kuo Min Tang, saying: "There have been two mistakes: the advocacy of withdrawal from the yellow trade unions and from the Anglo-Russian Trade Union Committee; now the third mistake has been produced: the Chinese Party advocates withdrawal from the Kuo Min Tang." At the same time, the head of the Far Eastern Bureau, Wu Ting Kong was sent to China to correct our tendency to withdraw from the K.M.T. At that time, I again failed to maintain my proposal strongly, for the sake of honoring the discipline of the International and the opinion of the majority of the members of the Central Committee.

Later on, the Northern Expedition Army set out. We were very much persecuted by the K.M.T. because in The Guide we criticized the curbing of the labor movement in the rear, and the compulsory collection of the military fund from the peasants for the use of the Northern Expedition. In the meantime the workers in Shanghai were about to rise up to oust the Chihli-Shantung troops. If the uprising were successful, the problem of the ruling power would be posed. At that time, in the minutes of the political resolution of the Enlarged Conference of the Central Committee, I suggested:

The Chinese revolution has two roads: One is that it be led by the proletariat, then we can reach the goal of the revolution; the other is that it be led by the bourgeoisie, and thus the latter must betray the revolution on the road. And though we may cooperate with the bourgeoisie at the present we must nevertheless seize the leading power. However, all the members of the Far Eastern Bureau of the III International residing in Shanghai unanimously opposed my opinion, saying that such an opinion would influence our comrades to oppose the bourgeoisie too early. Further, they declared, if the Shanghai uprising succeeds the ruling power should belong to the bourgeoisie and that it was unnecessary to have any delegates of the workers to participate. At that time, I again could not maintain my opinion because of their criticism.

A PILLAR OF STALINISM

One of the principal points of support of Stalinism in Czecho-Slovakia has been "comrade" Julo Vercik. He was a member of the Central Committee of the Party, Communist International and in that capacity one of the most fearless and consistent knights in the struggle against "counter-revolutionary Trotskyism," against Left dangers and Right dangers, or any other danger his employer told him to fight. His vigor in fighting against deviations from Stalinism was hardly exceeded by that of Browder or Harrison George. Now he has found a new master. The pillar of Stalinism has just shifted his membership to the . . . Social Democratic party of Czecho-Slovakia. If it isn't Besedovsky, it's sure to be Vercik.

Molotov's Prosperity in Knowledge

Among other pearls presented by Molotov to the Sixteenth Congress, there is the following thought, nay, a whole web of thoughts:

"It is worth recalling in this connection some of Trotsky's declarations made several years ago. Trotsky contended more than once, that 'since the imperialist war in Europe no development of the productive forces has been possible! (L. Trotsky, Europe and America, 1926), that to Europe's share remains only 'absolute stagnation and dismemberment' (L. Trotsky, Five Years of the Comintern). This did not prevent (!) the 'Left' Trotsky from becoming later on (!) the bard of American prosperity. In reality, his speeches about the fact that America would put Europe on 'rations' were a peculiar re-singing (?) of the theory of 'exceptionalism' which afterward (!) became the fundamental basis of the Right wing renegades in the American Communist Party. In this instance, too, Trotsky, under 'Left' phrases, dragged a thoroughly Right opportunist line hostile to the Comintern." (Pravda, July 8, 1930).

Please note the tenor of Molotov's thoughts. Trotsky contended several years ago that Europe is confronted with stagnation and decline. "This did not prevent the 'Left' Trotsky from becoming later on the bard of American prosperity." Why should this particularly have "prevented Trotsky?" Does Europe's stagnation exclude the development of America? On the contrary, it was precisely the growing might of the United States that I connected with Europe's stagnation. In one of the reports on this subject, I said:

"The unparalleled economic superiority of the United States, even independent of the conscious policy of the American bourgeoisie, will not permit the rise of European capitalism. American capitalism, driving Europe ever further into an impasse, will automatically drive it to the road of revolution. This contains the most important key to the world situation." (L. Trotsky, Europe and America, page 64).

What is the meaning of the so-called contradiction of which Molotov attempts to accuse me? It means that our accidental theoretician is always disposed to "enter with both feet" into some kind of a periodical mess.

Insofar as Europe is concerned, I was not alone in saying after the war that all the roads of development are closed to European capitalism—this same thought is expressed in all the basis document of the Comintern: in the manifesto of the Second Congress, in the programmatic thesis on tactics of the Third Congress, in the resolution of the Fourth Congress, and repeated by the Fifth Congress (when in some respects it was already incomplete). In the broad historical sense, this contention is true even today. If Europe's production is now about 113 percent of the pre-war figure, it means that the per-capita income of the adult population did not grow in the sixteen years, and for the toilers—it decreased. In the report to which Molotov refers, I said: "European capitalism has become reactionary in the absolute sense of the word, that is, not only does it not lead the nation forward but it is even incapable of retaining for it the standard of living it reached the past. This is the economic basis of the present revolutionary epoch. Political ebb and flow develop on this basis but do not change it." (Europe and America, page 72).

Or perhaps Molotov disputes this thought?

It is doubtless that Europe rose out of the destruction and decline of the first post-war years, and for the second time straightened out after the convulsions of the Ruhr occupation. This became possible, however, only because of the continuous chain of defeats of the European proletariat and the colonial movements. When, a day after the war, or in 1925, in foreseeing great social struggles in England or a revolutionary situation in China, we spoke of the inextricable position of European imperialism, we naturally made the point of departure in our calculations the victory of the proletariat, and not its defeat. At that time we did not really foresee the exploits of Stalin-Molotov in England, China, as well as in other countries. At any rate, not to their full extent. And there is no doubt—this is in no way a paradox—that Stalin and Molotov did more than all the statesmen of Europe to preserve and stabilize, to save European capitalism. Naturally, against their own will.

But this does not improve matters.

What does it mean to be the "bard" of American prosperity? America has the advantage over Europe which a big monopoly trust has ever dispersed, middle and small enterprises competing among themselves. To point out this advantage and to reveal its tendencies, does not mean to become a "bard" of trusts. By the way, the petty bourgeois dough-heads more than once called the Marxists the "bards" of big capitalist enterprise.

Molotov, however, forgets that the Fifth Congress of the Comintern simply overlooked America, while the Sixth Congress included in the program a note on this same correlation of America and Europe which Stalin attempted so helplessly to deny. Molotov recalls the rations. Even this prognosis is borne out at every step. What is the Young plan if not a financial ration? And didn't America put the British Navy on a ration? This is only a beginning.

Molotov himself finally came to the thought, (or maybe he was prompted) that "by the Kellogg Pact, she (America) strives to make the decision of the question of the future imperialist war dependent upon its will." Even though not an original admission, nevertheless a valuable one. But this means precisely that America is striving (and in part succeeds) to put European imperialism on rations. By the way: if this is the objective significance of the Kellogg Pact—and this is just what it is—how it is that Stalin and Molotov dared to adhere to it?

In 1924, in the report on "Europe and America" (this is just the report Molotov has in mind) we said, in connection with the naval rivalry between the United States and Great Britain: "But we must add: when England's position becomes such that it must openly accept the American ration, it will not be done directly by Lord Curzon—he will not do, he is too proud—no, this will be entrusted to MacDonald . . . Here the pious eloquence of MacDonald, Henderson, the Fabians, will be required in order to press on the English bourgeoisie and persuade the English workers, 'What, then, shall we go to war with America? No, we are for peace, for agreement.' And what does agreement with Uncle Sam mean? To go on rations—this is the only agreement, there is no other. And if you do not want to—then prepare for war." (L. Trotsky, Europe and America, page 30-31).

It so happens that in politics, no matter how artful, some things can be foreseen. Molotov very deeply despises such an occupation. He prefers not to see even what is happening before his very nose.

Further: why did Molotov drag in "prosperity"? In order to reveal his own education? We readily believe that after the designation of Molotov to the post of leader of the Comintern, tongues of flame came down to him, as happened at one time to the apostles, after which he immediately began to talk in unknown languages. But "prosperity" is nevertheless irrelevant. Prosperity has a conjunctural significance and means flourishing, in the sense of a commercial-industrial ascent. But my comparison of America and Europe was based upon fundamental economic indices (national wealth, income, mechanical power, coal, oil, metal, etc.) and not on the conjunctural fluctuations of those indices. Molotov evidently wants to say: Trotsky glorified the might of America, and yet, look, the United States is going through the most acute crisis. But does a crisis deny capitalist might? Didn't England, in the epoch of its world hegemony, know crises? Is capitalist development in general conceivable without crises? Here is what we said on this score in the Criticism of the Program of the Comintern:

"We cannot enter into a consideration of the problem of the time of the American crisis and its possible depth. This is not a question of program but of conjuncture. For us, of course, the inevitability of a crisis is absolutely unquestionable and, considering the present world expansion of American capitalism, its great depth and sharpness is not excluded. But the efforts to minimize or weaken the importance of North American hegemony on this ground is not justified by anything, and can only lead to most profound errors of a strategic character. On the contrary, in a critical epoch the hegemony of the United States will prove even more complete, more open, more ruthless, than in the period of boom. The United States will try to overcome and get out of its difficulties and helplessness primarily at the expense of Europe. . . ." (Page 10, American Edition).

Further on, we expressed regret that "this trend of thought has found absolutely no expression in the draft program of the Comintern" (Page 11).

It so happens that in economics as well as in politics—even to a greater extent than in politics—some things can be foreseen. But we already know: Molotov does not care for this frivolous occupation.

A few words remain to be said on the concluding part of the web of Molotov's thoughts: Trotsky's views in regard to America's placing Europe on rations were, don't you see, a "peculiar re-singing (?) of the theory of exceptionalism which afterwards (!) became the fundamental basis of the Right wing renegades in the American Communist Party." (What kind of a re-singing is that which comes before the melody itself? But let us not be severe with Molotov the orator and author: we are occupied here with the thinker).

The "Right wing renegades"—are Lovestone and Co., who, back, in 1924 were already tired of criticizing my views on the inter-relationships of America and Europe. Here Molotov has actually given us nothing but a re-singing. The theory of exceptionalism, or peculiarities, was really given its most consummate and reactionary expression by Stalin and Molotov who, in 1924, announced to the whole of humanity that in contrast to all the other countries of the world, the U. S. S. R. has the possibility of constructing socialism within its national boundaries. If we take into consideration that the whole historical mission of our Party is the construction of socialism, it may be said that from the viewpoint of this task the exceptionalism of the U. S. S. R. has according to Stalin, an absolute character. No matter what exceptionism was sought for the United States by Lovestone and Co., it could not be higher than the one Stalin secured for the U. S. S. R. by the decrees of the Comintern.

Further: Didn't the program of the Comintern nevertheless recognize the world capitalist hegemony of the United States? Neither Greece nor Belgium nor a number of other countries possess this "small" peculiarity. Aren't we therefore correct in saying that the world hegemony of the United States represents its exceptional peculiarity? Or perhaps Molotov has arrived at a refutation of the program of the Comintern which was written by Bucharin several months before he was declared a bourgeois liberal?

"Trotsky drags an opportunist line under Left phrases." In what sense is the statement of the world domination of the United States a "phrase" and just why is it a "Left" phrase? It is quite impossible to understand anything. Instead of thoughts,—a sort of rotted chaff. No matter what you touch, it crumbles.

But the whole point is that after the Soviet Union is abstracted theoretically from the rest of humanity, Molotov demands that all the rest of the countries should give up pretensions at peculiarities, and even more, at exceptionism. And indeed, would it be easy to direct half a hundred Communist Parties if, relying upon peculiarities, they would refuse to step forward simultaneously with the Left foot at Molotov's command? After all, one must sympathize with a leader. . . .

In the article "Two Conceptions" (see The Militant, Vol III, No. 19 and 20), we showed in detail the whole inconsistency of Stalin's (and that means Molotov also) understanding of internationalism. The opportunism of Lovestone, Brandler and their partisans lies in the fact that they demand the recognition for themselves of those national socialist rights which Stalin considers a monopoly of the U. S. S. R. It is not for nothing that these gentlemen carried through the whole campaign against "Trotskyism" shoulder to shoulder with Molotov. And this campaign embraced, more or less, all the questions of Communist world outlook. Even now, Lovestone declares that what divides him from the Comintern leadership are tactical differences, but from the Left Opposition—besides tactical—also programmatic and theoretical differences. And this is absolutely true.

That America's position is exceptional will not be denied even by the valorous Czech soldier, Schwejk who, it is said, has become a fellow champion of Smeral. But Lovestone's national opportunism does not in the least flow from this exceptionalism. The basis of this opportunism is the program of the Comintern which speaks of the world hegemony of the United States, that is, of its exceptionalism, but does not draw any revolutionary conclusions because it does not speak of the inseparable bond between American "exceptionalism" and the "exceptionalism" of the other parts of the world. Here is what our criticism of the program says on this score:

"On the other hand, it has been left entirely unmentioned—and this is not the least important phase of the same world problem—that it is precisely the international strength of the United States and its unbridled expansion resulting from it, that compels it to include powder magazines throughout the world among the foundations of its structure—the antagonisms between the east and west, the class struggle in old Europe, uprisings of the colonial masses, wars and revolutions. This on the one hand transforms United States capitalism into the basis counter-revolutionary force in the present epoch, becoming constantly more interested in the maintenance of order in every corner of the globe, and on the other hand prepares the ground for a gigantic revolutionary explosion of this already dominant and still increasing world imperialist power." (Page 9, American edition).

If Molotov does not agree with this, let him object. We are ready to learn. But instead of analytical objections, he presents us with his own declaration of his prosperity in knowledge, which has not, however, been proved as yet. And in general, it occurs to us that it is in vain that Molotov mortifies the flesh with knowledge. Even Ecclesiastes said: "He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." —T.

STALIN AS A THEORETICIAN

Ground Rent, or, Stalin Deepens Marx and Engels

In the beginning of his struggle against the "general secretary," Bucharin declared in some connection that Stalin's chief ambition is to compel his recognition as a "theoretician." Bucharin knows Stalin well enough, on the one hand, and the A B C of Communism, on the other, to understand the whole tragedy of this pretension. It was in the role of a theoretician that Stalin appeared at the conference of the Marxian agronomists. Among other things, ground rent did not come out unscathed.

Only very recently (1925) Stalin judged that it was necessary to strengthen the peasant holdings for scores of years, that is, the actual and juridical liquidation of the nationalization of the land. The People's Commissar of Agriculture of Georgia, not without the knowledge of Stalin, it is understood, at that time introduced a legislative project for the direct abolition of the nationalization. The Russian Commissar of Agriculture worked in the same spirit. The Opposition sounded the alarm. In its platform, it wrote: "The Party must give a crushing rebuff to all the tendencies directed towards the abolition or undermining of the nationalization of land, one of the pillars of the dictatorship of the proletariat." Just as in 1922 Stalin had to give up his attempts on the monopoly of foreign trade, in 1926 he had to give up the attempt on the nationalization of land, declaring that "he was not correctly understood."

After the proclamation of the Left course, Stalin not only became the defender of the nationalization of land, but he immediately accused the Opposition of not understanding the significance of this whole institution. Yesterday's nihilism towards nationalization was immediately converted into a fetishism. Marx's theory of ground rent was given a new administrative task: To justify Stalin's complete collectivization.

Here we must make a brief reference to theory. In his unfinished analysis on ground rent, Marx divides it into absolute and differential. Since the same human labor applied to different sections of the land yields different results, the surplus yield of the more fertile section will naturally be retained by the owner of the land. This is differential rent. But not one of the owners will give to a tenant free of charge even the worst section as long as there is a demand for it. In other words, from private ownership of land necessarily flows a certain minimum of ground rent, independent of the quality of the soil. This is what is called absolute rent. In conformity with this theory, the liquidation of private ownership of land leads to the liquidation of absolute ground rent. Only that rent remains which is determined by the quality of the land itself, or, to state it more correctly, by the application of human labor to land of different quality. There is no need to elucidate that differential rent is not a relationship fixed by the section itself, but changes with the method of exploiting the land. These brief reminders are needed by us in order to reveal the whole paltriness of Stalin's excursion into the realm of the theory of the nationalization of land.

Stalin begins by correcting and deepening Engels. This is not the first time with him. In 1926, Stalin explained to us that to Engels as well as to Marx the A B C law of the unequal development of capitalism was unknown, and precisely because of this they both rejected the theory of socialism in one country which, in opposition to them, was defended by Vollmar, the theoretical forerunner of Stalin.

The question of the nationalization of the land, more correctly, the insufficient understanding of this problem by the old man Engels, is apparently approached by Stalin with greater caution. But in reality — just as lightly. He quotes from Engels' work on the peasant question the famous phrase that we will in no way violate the will of the small peasant; on the contrary, we will in every way help him "in order to facilitate his transition into associations," that is, to collectivized agriculture. "We will try to give him as much time as possible to consider it on his own piece of land." These excellent words, known to every literate Marxist, give a clear and simple formula for the relation of the proletariat to the peasantry.

Confronted with the necessity of justifying complete collectivization on a frenzied scale, Stalin underlines the exceptional, the even, "at first glance, exaggerated" caution of Engels with regard to conducting the small peasant on the road of socialist agricultural economy. What was Engels guided by in his "exaggerated" caution? Stalin replies thus: "It is evident that his point of departure was the existence of private ownership of land, the fact that the peasant has his piece of land from which he, the peasant, will be parted with difficulty. Such is the peasantry in capitalist countries, where private ownership in land exists. It is understood that here (?) great caution is needed. Can it be said that here in the U. S. S. R. there is such a situation? No, it cannot be said. It cannot, because we have no private ownership of land which binds the peasant to his individual economy." Such are Stalin's observations. Can it be said that in these observations there is even a grain of sense? No, it cannot be said. Engels, it appears, had to be "cautious" because in the bourgeois countries private ownership of land exists. But Stalin needs no caution because we have established the nationalization of land. But did there not exist in bourgeois Russia private ownership of land alongside of the more archaic communal ownership? We did not acquire the nationalization of land ready made, we established it after the seizure of power. But Engels speaks about the policy the proletarian party will put into effect precisely after the seizure of power. What sense is there to Stalin's condescending explanation of Engels' indecision: The old man had to act in bourgeois countries where private ownership of land exists, while we were wise enough to abolish private ownership. But Engels recommends caution precisely after the seizure of power by the proletariat, consequently, after the abolition of private ownership of the means of production.

By contrasting the Soviet peasant policy with Engels' advice, Stalin confuses the question in the most ridiculous manner. Engels promised to give the small peasant time to think on his own piece of land before he decides to enter the collective. In this transitional period of the peasant's "deliberations," the workers' state, according to Engels, must separate the small peasant from the usurers, the tradesmen, etc., that is, to limit the exploiting tendencies of the Kulak. The Soviet policy in relation to the main, that is, the non-exploiting, mass of all the peasantry, had precisely this dual character in spite of all its vacillations. In spite of all the statistical clatterings the collectivization movement is now, in the thirteenth year of the seizure of power, really going through the first stages. To the overwhelming mass of the peasants, the dictatorship of the proletariat has thus given twelve years for deliberation. It is doubtful if Engels had in mind such a long period, and it is doubtful if such a long period will be needed in the advanced countries of the West where, with the high development of industry, it will be incomparably easier for the proletariat to prove to the peasant by deed all the advantages of collective agriculture. If we, only twelve years after the seizure of power by the proletariat, begin a wide movement, so far very primitive in content, and very unstable, towards collectivization, it is to be explained only by our poverty and backwardness, in spite of the fact that we have the land nationalized, which Engels presumably did not think of, or which the Western proletariat will presumably be unable to establish after the seizure of power. In this contrasting of Russia with the West, and at the same Stalin with Engels, the idolization of the national backwardness is glaringly apparent.

But Stalin does not stop at this. He immediately supplements economic incoherence with theoretical. "Why," he asks his unfortunate auditors, "do we succeed so easily (!!) in demonstrating, under the condition of nationalized land the superiority (of collectives) over the small peasant economies? This is where the tremendous revolutionary significance of the Soviet agrarian laws lies, which abolished absolute rent . . . and which established the nationalization of land." And Stalin self-contentedly, and at the same time, reproachfully, asks: "Why is not this new (!?) argument utilized sufficiently by our agrarian theoreticians in their struggle against every bourgeois theory?" And here Stalin makes reference—the Marxian agronomists are recommended not to exchange glances, nor to blow their noses in confusion, and what is more, not to hide their heads under the table—to the third volume of "Capital" and to Marx's theory of ground rent. What heights did this theoretician have to ascend before plunging into the mire with his "new argument." According to Stalin, it would appear that the Western peasant is tied down to the land by nothing else than "absolute rent." And since we "destroyed" this monster, that in itself caused to disappear the mighty "power of the land" over the peasant, so grippingly depicted by Gleb Ouspensky, and by Balzac and Zola in France.

In the very first place, let us establish that absolute rent was not abolished by us, but was nationalized, which is not one and the same thing. Newmark valued the national wealth of Russia in 1914 at 140,000,000,000 gold rubles, including in the first place the price of all the land, that is, the capitalized rent of the whole country. If we should want to establish now the specific gravity of the natural wealth of the Soviet Union within the wealth of humanity, we would of course have to include the capitalized rent, differential as well as absolute.

All economic criteria, absolute rent included, are reduced to human labor. Under the conditions of market economy, rent is determined by that quantity of products which can be extracted by the owner of the land from the products of the labor applied to it. The owner of the land in the U. S. S. R. is the state. By that itself it is the bearer of the ground rent. As to the actual liquidation of absolute rent, we will be able to speak of that only after the socialization of the land all over our planet, that is, after the victory of the world revolution. But within national limits, if one man say so without insulting Stalin, not only socialism can not be constructed, but even absolute rent cannot be abolished.

This interesting theoretical question has a practical significance. Ground rent finds its expression on the world market in the price of agriculture products. Insofar as the Soviet government is an exporter of the latter—and with the intensification of agriculture grain exports will increase greatly—to that extent, armed with the monopoly of foreign trade, the Soviet government appears on the world market as the owner of the land whose product it exports, and consequently, in the price of these products the Soviet government realizes the ground rent concentrated in its hands. If the technique of our agriculture were not inferior to that of the capitalists, and at the same time the technique of our foreign trade, then precisely with us in the U. S. S. R. absolute rent would appear in its clearest and most concentrated form. This moment will have to acquire the greatest significance in the future under the planned direction of agriculture and export. If Stalin now brags of our "abolition" of absolute rent, instead of realizing it on the world market, then a temporary right to such bragging is given him by the present weakness of our agricultural export and the irrational character of our foreign trade, in which not only is absolute ground rent sunk without a trace, but many other things as well. This side of the matter, which has no direct relation to the collectivization of peasant economy, nevertheless shows us by one more example that the idolization of economic isolation and economic backwardness is one of the basic features of our national-socialist philosophy.

Let us return to the question of collectivization. According to Stalin it would appear that the Western peasant is attached to his piece of land by the tie of absolute rent. Every peasant's hen will laugh at his "new argument." Absolute rent is a purely capitalist category. Dispersed peasant economy can have a taste of absolute rent only under episodic circumstances of an exceptionally favorable market conjuncture, as existed, for instance, at the beginning of the war. The economic dictatorship of finance capital over the diffused village is expressed on the market in unequal exchange. The peasantry generally does not issue out of the universal "scissors" regime. In the prices of grain and agricultural products in general, the overwhelming mass of the small peasantry does not realize the labor power, let alone the rent.

But if absolute rent, which Stalin so triumphantly "abolished," says decidedly nothing to the brain or heart of the small peasant, then differential rent, which Stalin so generously spared, has a great significance, precisely for the Western peasant. The tenant farmer holds on to his piece of land all the stronger the more he and his father spent strength and means to raise its fertility. This applies, by the way, and not only to the West but to the East, for instance, to China with its districts of intensified cultivation. Certain elements of the petty conservation of private ownership are inherent here, consequently, not in an abstract category of absolute rent, but in the material conditions of a higher parcelized culture. If it is comparatively easy to break the Russian peasants away from a piece of land, it is not at all because Stalin's "new argument" liberated them from absolute rent but for the very reason for which, prior to the October revolution, periodic repartition of land took place in Russia. Our Narodniki idolized these repartitions as such. Nevertheless, they were only possible because of our non-intensive economy, the three-field system, the miserable tilling of the soil, that is, once again, because of the backwardness idolized by Stalin.

Will it be more difficult for the victorious proletariat of the West to eliminate peasant conservation which flows from the greater cultivation of small holdings? By no means. For there, because of the incomparably higher state of industry and culture in general, the proletarian state will more easily be enabled to give the peasant entering collective farms an evident and genuine compensation for his loss of the "differential rent" on his piece of land. There can be no doubt that twelve years after the seizure of power the collectivization of agriculture in Germany, England or America will be immeasurably higher and firmer than ours.

Is it not strange that his "new argument" in favor of complete collectivization was discovered by Stalin twelve years after nationalization had taken place? Then why did he, in spite of the existence of nationalization in 1923-1928 so stubbornly rely upon the powerful individual producer and not upon the collectives? It is clear: Nationalization of the land is a necessary condition for socialist agriculture but it is altogether insufficient. From the narrow economic point of view, that is, the one from which Stalin tackles the question, the nationalization of land is precisely of third rate significance, because the cost of inventory required for rational, large scale economy exceeds manifold the absolute rent.

Needless to say that nationalization of land is a necessary and most important political and juridical pre-condition for socialist reconstruction of agriculture. But the direct economic significance of nationalization at any given moment is determined by the action of factors of a material-productive character.

The Struggle of the Plumbers Helpers

In 1927, while carrying on the fight for recognition and affiliation of the plumbers helpers to the United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters, a section of the A. F. of L., a fight absolutely necessary in their struggle for organization, it was well known that it was led by a militant body with a Left wing program. There is no question that the A. F. of L. bureaucrats were well aware of this. It is one of the main reasons why they did not yield when it came to the question of recognition.

The plumbers helpers as a body began to acquaint themselves with the class struggle and the Left wing movement through their own participation in the conflict, through trade union classes, and their own organ, the American Plumbers Helper.

A Militant Policy

At all the meetings, classes and in all the propaganda carried on within the organization, a definite and set policy was at all times directed towards unity with the plumbers and the rest of the building trades, and affiliation to the "mother" body of journeymen. This policy, which was and is correct, was a stepping stone of the organization.

During this period of organization which was carried on by the A. A. of P. H., much contact was established with the Left wing movement, participation as a mass organization (not as a mere group) at various conferences, not only morally assisting, but also financially at times. One can say that the organization was a militant one fighting for principles of working class unionism.

With the loss of the strike and mistakes committed by the Young Communist League, the organization began to decline. When the dwindling away of the forces of the helpers began there was absolutely nothing done to save an excellent organization from decay.

There was a great opportunity to rally the helpers to battle when the 5-day week was instituted in the building trades in August 1929, which meant that the wages of the helpers decreased from $22 to $20 a week, causing many a spontaneous strike which occurred with no effect, because there was no organization to take advantage of such struggles. Admitting that certain factors were not ripe, yet nothing was done by the Left wing group of plumbers helpers within the Y. C. L. due to a number of reasons, one of which was the fear of allowing three young Opposition sympathizers, who were active among the helpers, to gain prestige among their fellow workers.

Due to a strike on the job in January 1930, the helpers again started to organize with eight numbers at the outset. This organization, the United Association of Plumbers Helpers, has 160 members today. With the beginning of this new helpers organization, the definite aim was pushed to the foreground by the helpers who were in the last union, to organize the trade, to carry on with the slogans which these workers had learned were correct. A series of immediate demands were adopted, calling for a living wage, organization with the adult group, double time for overtime, a chance to learn the trade, etc.

The Y. C. L. "Appears"

The Y. C. L., hearing of this revival, set to work by sending in a few ex-plumber helpers to "capture" the organization and model it according to the new "period." A "trade union" fight was incorrect at this time, according to them, an Industrial Pipe League was needed; affiliation to the United Association was wrong, to the T. U. U. L. was right, etc., etc.

In 1927, the T. U. E. L. carried on much activity within Right and Left wing unions through the various industrial groups of Left wingers. There is no question that the guidance and participation of the T. U. E. L. led to many a gain and victory for the workers. Yet the T. U. E. L. was not known to the plumbers helpers, not a single mention by any of the leading members of the organization was ever made of the T. U. E. L., and in fact, it did not bother the leaders of the T. U. E. L. whether there was such an organization of 3,500 helpers fighting for a union, or not.

Today, it is just the reverse. When the helpers are beginning to organize they must be stamped all over with "T. U. U. L.", must accept as gospel truth every word of the self-appointed leaders who are giving mis-guidance to the Left wing movement, otherwise they are only "aiding the labor fakers."

Union plumbers, with whom the helpers must unite, as well as other building trades crafts, still belong to the A. F. of L. and have a craft ideology. Yet by merely saying to them, "Leave your organization and join the revolutionary unions," would have no impression whatsoever upon them.

Still, there is considerable opposition to the bureaucratic leaders of these trades unions, who should be combatted with a concentrated struggle to uphold union conditions and union traditions within the organizations.

A fight for the relief of the unemployed by shortening hours, by unemployment benefits, for 100 percent unionization of the job, amalgamation and other immediate demands, will not only bring the plumbers but also the other building workers into effective struggle for better conditions for themselves.

The plumbers helpers, if they are to organize effectively, must stress these very things, connect their struggle for organization with the every-day struggle of the building trades workers and act as pacesetters in the fight for militant unionism.

—J. SPRAGUE.

The Peasants' International and the Anti-Imperialist League

What is doing with the Peasants' International? It was created by the epigones for the special purpose of showing how people who correctly evaluate the peasantry carry on politics. From the very outset, we considered that the whole contrivance is dead and insofar as it is not dead—it is reactionary. At the Sixth Congress, Bucharin made excuses for the fact that he could not report anything (that is, anything good) about the Peasants' International. He extended an invitation to engage in "helping the Peasants' International to be transformed into a real, live organization." At the Sixteenth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Molotov, in his report, did not as much as mention the Peasants' International by a single word, just as if it had not existed. Does it mean that there was no success in transforming it into a "live organization?" But this was one of the biggest fruits of anti-Trotskyism!

The peasantry is the least international of all the classes in bourgeois society. A peasants' international is a contradiction within itself, not a dialectical but a bureaucratic one. An independent international union of the peasantry outside of the national sections of the Comintern is—we repeat again—either a dead swivel chair invention or a hothouse of bourgeois democratic careerism under camouflage. The Peasants' International should be openly liquidated, drawing from it all the necessary conclusions.

It is worth noting that under the cover of the Peasants' International, work in the village has been almost completely reduced to zero. At the Sixth Congress, Bucharin was forced to admit: "In the peasant districts our influence did not grow but rather declined, and at that, in France as well as in Germany." This took place because "we" approached the peasantry from the viewpoint of the Peasants' International, that is astronomically. In reality, it was transformed into a hunt after the petty property owner as a property owner. The farm laborer and the semi-proletarian peasant were side-tracked. As a result—the weakening of Communism in the village. Molotov, in his report, passed over the work in the village in complete silence.

The Anti-Imperialist League is only a translation of the Peasants' International into the colonial language. Its conferences and work have had a purely decorative character. Munzenberg illustrated with Bengal lights the Left careerists of the Second International and tomorrow's executioners of the toiling masses in the colonies. The Bengalese illumination cost not a little, and left behind it an acrid odor and smoke under the cover of which the careerists, adventurers and candidates for executioners were accomplishing their deeds.

Let us not forget that the friendship of the Stalinists for the Kuo Min Tang

National Youth Committee

Several weeks ago, the national committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition) elected a national youth committee to aid comrade Albert Glotzer, youth representative on N. C. to carry on youth activity. The national youth committee wherever feasible will form youth committees or youth sections of the branches of the League. Definite steps are to be taken for the organization of a functioning faction in the official Y. C. L. Wherever possible, as for example, in New York City, independent youth activity will be conducted side by side with the struggle against the false policies and leadership of the Communist Youth League. Efforts will be made to expand the Young Vanguard as the voice of the Communist Opposition Youth.

At present the committee is working on a statement which is to be issued in its name to the coming National Convention of the Y. C. L. This statement will also serve as a basis for a youth platform for the coming conference of our organization.

Branch secretaries or comrades responsible for youth work, are asked to send in reports of activities to the national youth committee (care of national office). Youth comrades should also write articles for the Young Vanguard.

A Plan

For You to Study

This announcement is not intended for a certain type of "practical people." We mean the kind who always excuse the fact that they do not read and study the problems of the working class movement with the argument that they are "too busy doing practical work." Now, practical work is the life's blood of the revolutionary movement. But unless it proceeds from a clear understanding of fundamental principles, unless it is motivated by correct theories, it is just so much barrel thumping: lots of noise but no content. It is our misfortune that this sort of "practical work" (in reality, it is highly impractical) is all too prevalent in the revolutionary movement. So if you are that kind of a "practical" person, don't listen in on this!

We started out with a plan. In our files, we had assembled a pile of material by comrade Trotsky—articles, documents, pamphlets and books—as tall as your leg. Their very publication would be one of the most smashing blows ever dealt to Stalinist opportunist and falsification. A reading of them would advance the Communist movement immeasurably, for they deal with the fundamental problems of the Russian and international revolution from the Marxist standpoint. They are documents suppressed in the literal sense of the word.

But since our paltry income hardly enables us to publish even the Militant, we could not print these works. That's where our plan came in. We believed we could get small groups of comrades to sponsor these publications. That is, a group of militants would donate the money for a special fund to print this or that work by Trotsky. And the plan has met with enthusiastic response and has already borne fruit. The pamphlet on "The Turn in the Comintern and the German Situation" was sponsored by six comrades: Harry Milton, Sol Sarachik, Sylvia Bleeker, Fred Berensmeier, Peter Keppel and Kurt Ahrens. Their donations enabled us to publish it before anyone else in the world and to publish it at a low price.

Now we have another work coming off the press (it will be ready a week after this issue of the Militant appears on the stands). Four comrades: Max Engel, Philip Shulman, Martin Abern and Morris Lewit, gave the contributions that are making it possible to publish this booklet at a popular price. It is "The Strategy of the World Revolution", a masterful analysis of the strategy and tactics of Bolshevism and a criticism of the course of the Stalin-Bucharin leadership since 1923. You will want to read this 100-page booklet, the manuscript of which had to be smuggled out of Russia, because no worker can call himself informed on the great dispute in the movement unless he has read it.

The "sponsorship plan" enables us to sell it at 25 cents a copy, and at 18 cents if you take a bundle of 5 or more (all postpaid). Our editions are limited in number, and you'd better order quickly. It's the kind of a work that shapes the movement, as it was shaped by the gifted contributions of Lenin and Trotsky in the early days of the Comintern.

And by the way, the plan is catching hold! Toronto comrades write in that they would like to be sponsors for another pamphlet, and we don't propose to turn them down. Quite the contrary: we want more. We have on hand enough pamphlets and books to keep our sponsors going for a long time. There Trotsky's pamphlet on "World Unemployment and the Five Year Plan", a section of which the Militant already printed (that was only a taste of what's to appear). Then there is his great work on "The Permanent Revolution" recently written and being translated now. You've heard Stalinists of all shades fulminate against "Trotsky's permanent revolution", but they never told you what the theory really looks like! Well, here it is—a smashing refutation of all the critics of this Marxist theory, and an eye-opening analysis of its relation to Lenin's conception of the Russian and international revolution.

If you're interested (we don't mean only groups of the Opposition, but sympathizers as well) in our plan to publish the Marxist literature of the day at popular prices, drop us a line and we'll let you know the details. But in the meantime, don't wait a minute to place your orders for flowed parallel with their intimate block with the strikebreakers of the General Council of the British Trade Unions, and that both these amities were tied into a knot with the Anti-Imperialist League.

In the beginning of 1927, Munzenberg, the impresario of all the rotten and pompous performances, called together a congress of the League at Brussels. On this occasion, the central organ of the Comintern wrote, on February 25, 1927:

"It is no accident that the most active, inspiring (!) and leading role at the congress was played by the main active factors in the Chinese revolution: the Chinese trade unions, the Kuo Min Tang and the People's-Revolutionary army—on the one hand, and the representatives of the British proletariat, to whose share fell the central role of blowing up the intervention—on the other hand." (Communist International, 1927, No. 8, page 5).

"No accident!" It is no accident that at the Brussels conference the "inspiring" role was played by Chiang Kai-Shek's Kuo Min Tang, and the dear allies of the Anglo-Russian Committee!

The Anti-Imperialist League is a reserve Kuo Min Tangism on an international scale. The liquidation of the League, as well as of the Peasants' International is an unpostponable measure of revolutionary purification.

Opposition Group in Bulgaria

The International Secretariat of the Left Opposition informs us:

On October 19, 1930, a group of former members of the Bulgarian Communist Party (legal and illegal) adopted a resolution approving a manifesto issued by a group of Bulgarian comrades recently, which gives a Marxist evaluation of the revolutionary labor movement in the country, the situation in the international Communist movement, and condemning the theory and practices of the "third period." These comrades decided, further, to "constitute themselves into a central Marxist workers' group 'Osвобождение', taking as their base the ideas of the Manifesto of the International Left Opposition."

The resolution also sends its revolutionary greetings to the victims of the bourgeois repression in Bulgaria and all other countries, and to the valiant comrades of the Bolshevik-Leninist Opposition in the Soviet Union and its leaders, comrades Trotsky and Rakovsky.

The formation of this group in Bulgaria is a step in a country where the collapse of the Centrist leadership has virtually stripped the movement of its power. The Bulgarian Opposition group is the second to be constituted in the Balkans, the first being the Left wing group in Greece. Our hearty salute and wishes for victory!

No Wage Reduction-For Social Insurance-Against the Petition Delusion-For Credits to Russia

The optimistic pledges of "recovery and stability"—the principal stock in trade of the capitalist politicians—have proved to be empty words calculated to soothe the discontentment of the workers. The crisis, instead of showing signs of let-down, is becoming deeper. It is drawing into its train ever new thousands of workers, and marches hand in hand with the winter months to spread misery, hunger and cold to every part of the land.

The Program of the Bosses

The capitalist class, and its agent Hoover, while doling out their measly charity to a few in order to allay working class resentment, retain their fundamental idea on how to solve the crisis. Their program is: "Deflate labor!" Wage-slashing, the lengthening of hours, the speeding up of labor, the "stagger plan" which means reducing the standard of living of the American workers at least half—these are the methods by which the ruling class is issuing out of its crisis at the expense solely of the workers.

It is well aware of what we have pointed out time and again. It knows that there will be no immediate recovery. Recovery is possible only by a new assault on the world market, with its attendant conflicts with other imperialist nations. A successful drive on the world market is possible, according to its program, only by cutting deeply into the standard of living attained by the working class in recent years. The Whaley-Eaton Service, a confidential bureau of American industrialists, reports in November, for instance, that "Some of the shrewdest men in Washington, therefore, while declining to say so publicly, believe

... the law of supply and demand will work in the case of labor, and wages will come down . . . It will be the spring of 1932 before conditions begin to be really satisfactory." (Our emphasis.)

No "satisfactory conditions" for eighteen months! In the meantime "wages will come down", and the unemployment army is presumably to remain unfed, unhoused and unclothed. The capitalist class, whose system produced the crisis, seeks to put the burden of it upon the working class exclusively. The job of the workers is to make the capitalist class, bloated by the billions extorted from labor, take the burden.

The frightful position of the unemployed workers must be relieved. But it is not by supplicating pleas to the bosses that relief will be attained. The latter will limit themselves to dribbling hand-outs until they are forced by the pressure of the masses to take some serious steps. The workers everywhere—working and workless—must adopt a program of action. The Communist and Left wing workers, the Unemployment Councils, must take the initiative to set a genuine mass movement into motion.

The central point in such a program must be the SIX-HOUR DAY AND THE FIVE-DAY WEEK WITH NO REDUCTION IN PAY! If the eight-hour day was a slogan of the militants fifty years ago, the thirty-hour week is an even more timely one today, in consideration of the technical advance of industry alone. American industry, given a well-ordered and just economic system, can produce more than enough to satisfy the needs of the masses

if the workers toiled less than twenty hours a week. The bureaucracy in the labor movement sometimes talks about the thirty-hour week. It is up to the militants to put the ranks of the working class into action for this demand.

Credits to the Soviet Union

The need for social insurance—not by "joint contributions" of workers and employers but by employers alone—is a burning one for labor. Social insurance will not come as a result of "promises" by capitalist politicians. It will be produced as a result of unremitting struggle by the workers, by their pressure on the capitalist class, by demonstrating their strength in a solid united front. The A. F. of L. agents of capitalism are opposed to social insurance. They must be run out of the labor movement. Their "progressive" face-savers, the Muste group is for social insurance by the "peaceful" route. They have conceived the "audacious" plan of a national petition, begging Mr. Hoover and his associated labor-haters to "do something more than talk about the question." To turn the movement for unemployment relief, which has already taken the form of mass demonstrations throughout the country, away from militant struggle and into the quiet, respectable and futile channel of "petitioning" is to strangle the movement.

That is why we also vigorously oppose the "petition campaign" of the official Communist Party. The Party is creating the most destructive reformist illusions in the working class by its liberalistic campaign. It announces that its parliamentary "bill" will be backed up—not by the mass power and struggles of the workers, but that "the Bill will be backed up by a million or more signatures of unemployed and employed workers." (Daily Worker, November 19, 1930.) What has happened to the Stalinist fulminations of the "third period", the "struggle for possession of the streets," "revolutionary mass upsurge"? They have all been submerged under the stagnant waters of a "petition campaign."

The demand for social insurance will be realized only by working class struggle, relentless and militant, and not by Musteite or Stalinist petitioning. The Left wing workers must reject the curbing of the mass movement by petition campaigns and expose their futility and illusoriness at every opportunity.

The third point in the program of action must be the demand for workers' delegations to the Soviet Union to study the Five Year Plan, and for the immediate extension of large, long-term credits to the Soviet Union which will not only aid it in its work to industrialize the country, but will be of immediate value to many of the unemployed workers who will obtain jobs by the re-opening of industries from which the Soviets purchase its machinery with the credits obtained. This demand must be raised in every trade union, in every workers' organization, and pushed through over the resistance of the bureaucrats, on the one hand, and the sectarian prejudices of the Stalinists, who oppose this demand, on the other.

General Unemployment marches now by the side of General Winter. They are ravaging the standards of the working class. Only the united front of the workers, irrespective of political or economic opinions, can put up a militant resistance to their advance. Only the unity of labor, expressed in stubborn struggle and mass action, can bring immediate relief to the suffering millions out of a job. Only their revolutionary action, leading to the overthrow of the bosses' power and the establishment of the workers' power, will bring permanent relief from unemployment, from war, from exploitation, in a word, from capitalism itself.

Mother Jones Dies

The death of Mother Jones at an age past a hundred removes one of the most picturesque figures in the labor movement of the United States for more than half a century, one whose name was associated with some of the most militant traditions of the American working class. Associated primarily with the miners' union, she led one militant movement after another until her name became anathema to the coal barons. It saddened those who had admired and loved her for her spirited and unrelenting loyalty to the militant movement to find her, towards the end, forsaking what she had stood for in the past. At the end, she became reconciled to her once mortal foe, Rockefeller, and contributed some of her last money to the professional labor skates of the Illinois "reorganized" miners' union. It is fortunate that her last actions cannot eliminate the splendid record of devotion she wrote for herself in the annals of American labor history.

Will Release Comrade Malkin December 20

We have just received the welcome news that on December 20, the gates of Comstock, N. Y., Prison will be opened to release comrade Maurice L. Malkin. Comrade Malkin, together with his fellow-prisoner Franklin who was released a number of weeks ago, was one of the victims of the Mineola frame-up a few years ago in connection with the New York fur workers' strike. One of the most active militants in the Left wing and its union, and a foundation member of the Communist Party, he was railroaded to the penitentiary by the prosecution, and began to serve his term almost two years ago.

Comrade Malkin was the first rank and file member of the Party to rally to the banner of the Opposition when the members of the Central Committee that came forward to support it were expelled from the Party. While his imprisonment was still pending, the Party bureaucrats expelled him the moment he demanded the reinstatement of the Opposition. This did not prevent Malkin from becoming one of the most active militants in our movement and remaining an Oppositionist while incarcerated at Comstock. At one time, the Party bureaucrats attempted to extort a capitulatory statement from him through the shameful process of pressure upon his family, but in the long run their efforts proved unsuccessful, and comrade Malkin again issued a declaration affirming his convictions in favor of the views of the International Left Opposition.

The news of his release has been received with enthusiasm by the New York comrades, and preparations are being made to meet him as befits a revolutionary fighter. As he comes to Grand Central Station on December 20, he will be met by a large group of his comrades and fellow-fighters in the needle trades workers' Left wing, who remember him on dozens of picket lines and everywhere else that the struggle was hottest. In addition, a New Year's entertainment is being arranged in his honor where the New York militants as a whole will have the opportunity of hearing him speak and renewing their acquaintance with a loyal fighter.

We are happy to welcome comrade Malkin back into the ranks of the active fighters for the working class and the Communist Opposition!

Christmas Time

CAN BE TURNED TO

Working Class Advantage

The bourgeoisie have psychologized the workers throughout the world into "giving" at Christmas time so as to further pile up their own profits. We cannot change this condition for years to come, but we can take advantage of the "give" spirit for working class interests. At this time of the year, when everybody loosens up, we can best collect for our cause.

The Militant is the only English paper that prints Trotsky's Marxian analyses of world events and the truth about the present situation in the Soviet Union. It also carries timely political and economic articles of special interest to the American workers.

The Railroad Brotherhoods Meet

By ARNE SWABECK

Recently two events, little known and little noticed, have rendered splendid proof of increasing unemployment pressure by the rank and file, at least within certain sections of the trade union movement, to the point where some officials have felt compelled to endeavor to get into some sort of motion so as to stave off what they consider "something worse." They have, of course, been entirely overshadowed by the din of the noisy charity campaigns to which capitalism has resorted in every city. But they grew from the same cause, the unemployment crisis, and likewise materialized because of the fear of real working class action.

The Railroad Conference

The first event was the national conference of some seven hundred general chairmen and executive officers of the five railroad transportation brotherhoods, the Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, Trainmen and Switchmen, convening in Chicago on Nov. 12 at the fashionable Palmer House, in the gorgeous main ball room, for a two weeks' session to consider the six-hour day. The second event was the meeting of the Chicago Federation of Labor, Nov. 16th, adopting a resolution for the shorter workday for all federal employees.

The Palmer House gathering had a good proportion of paid officials, though some were specially elected delegates, more than fifty per cent being actual workers. It came about entirely as a result of the growing pressure from below, from among the railroad workers for relief in the present heavy unemployment situation. At the inception, the conference selected a committee of 25, representing equally all the five trades present, to work out a program of action. This committee submitted a majority and a minority report. The majority report, which is most significant, recommended a campaign for the six-hour day, without any reduction in the day's pay, to be obtained by all organizational measures possible, the not the strike weapon. It had the backing of the Firemen, Trainmen and Switchmen. But during the days of sharp debate the representatives of the Engineers and Conductors absolutely refused to go along with this program and instead backed the minority report which provided for a request that President Hoover call the railroad executives, financiers, and bondholders together and endeavor to have them stop their present drastic retrenchment and lay-off policy.

Meanwhile, the Chicago Tribune appeared with editorials paying some pious attention to the stress of the railroad workers but admonishing them not to help tax the industry out of business and thus "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs." The railroad executives also managed, opportunely enough, to make their big splurge about an allegedly new policy of "maintaining and expanding" present employment on the roads, which will eventually turn into the opposite, like all the other "golden" promises. Evidently it helped. On the last day of the conference the five brotherhood presidents, always eager for a compromise and the eradication of class lines, threw themselves into the breach of the sharp differences, proposing that all agree to unite on first trying out the minority plan of appeal to Hoover before the majority project of eventual strike is to be further considered. It carried.

The resolution adopted by the Chicago Federation of Labor states that industry is paralyzed, commerce is bankrupt, unemployment is growing due to increased mass production, a situation which can be met only by the palliative measure of reduction of working hours without reduction in the standard of living. It calls attention to the more than one million federal employees working as high as twelve hours a day and places this as a direct government responsibility. From this it proceeds to petition the A. F. of L. to urge President Hoover to proclaim the shorter workday and shorter work week in all governmental employment, national, state and local, adding that this is not a radical measure but a "hope to inspire confidence in government, respect for law," etc.

"The Capitalist System is Shot"

The animated discussion, lasting a whole session, brought out much sharp criticism of the utter failure of the A. F. of L. executives, conservative delegates exclaiming: "The capitalist system is shot, if we don't do something, somebody else will." Others piped up: "Yes, now we are all radicals and revolutionists" but put heavy emphasis on labor party ballots. Throughout, a sharp undercurrent of pressure, with its reaction, some cunningly contemplating, others merely hesitant, some willingly, but above all a fear of real working class action.

What the actual results will be of the railroaders appeal or of an A. F. of L. request to Hoover for either proposals need not be the least in doubt. Designed purely to prevent what has been named "something worse", it will mean for those workers who may cherish hopes, only new disappointments, but also added experience. Nevertheless, these manifestations of pressure of discontent from the masses and the slight response, no matter what the motive or design of the latter, is significant. It points but further to the beginning of the upward curve of working class struggle in the United States. It also propounds again, rather forcefully, the question of just what part can and must the demand for a shorter workday without reduction in pay play in revolutionary unemployment tactics.

It is imperative that the tactics of the revolutionary forces at all times correspond closely to the level and to every stage of development of objective conditions, and be in harmony with the readings of the subjective factors, becoming sharper and bolder with the rise of the level. In this instance, it means the development of the economic crisis and the readiness for struggle of the working class in general and its unemployed section in particular. The curve has been continually downward. The crisis has moved step by step to greater severity, greater unemployment and, at the end of 1930, is still moving in that direction. Unquestionably, general discontent is spreading among the working masses suffering the wants of unemployment with wage cuts and more speed-up for those having jobs. No let up in the capitalist offensive but the workers' discontent so far expressed, in its political sense, is chiefly in the "stupendous" step from the republican to the democratic party. These demands for the shorter workday without reduction in pay are the early signs of their pressure showing concrete manifestations.

The Party's Tactics

The exact opposite of corresponding with these developments have been the unemployment tactics pursued by the Communist Party leadership. It started from the top and coming downward, not increasing in boldness or sharpening its line, but modifying it, turning to the Right and losing its revolutionary basis. The very beginning was made with the organization of unemployment councils—without preparations, without mass propaganda, without mass basis but voluminous in demands. Next came the concentration on the social insurance bill (purely a parliamentary proposal, of the kind which will most likely not even reach parliament and thus at best be able to move workers only toward a social reformist direction). The third step has now been reached in the complacent settling down to collecting signatures for this bill.

The mass propaganda, which should have preceded organization, was neglected. The councils did not grow out of a movement, did not represent the unemployed, could not gain their adherence and have remained for all practical purposes almost non-existent. The party proceeded from the premise, of a "revolutionary upsurge of the American working masses" and was stunned by the Democratic landslide. Will it now jump back and endeavor to fill the gap; when there should be a sharpening of its line and a greater balance?

Much of the necessary mass propaganda and preparation must still be done. Correct issues, demands and slogans are still to be formulated and undoubtedly the demand for the six-hour day with no reduction in pay can become a powerful lever to help set the masses into motion. A concentrated propaganda campaign now could soon lead to the organizational steps and become real preparations for the coming stage of working class offensive.

* * *

It is well, in this connection, to remember the great movement for the eight-hour day of the Eighties. Following upon a decade of unexampled growth and expansion of industry and immediately upon the heels of a severe economic crisis — very similar to the present moment—it became a sharp offensive struggle immensely advancing the working class movement of those days. The Chicago revolutionists, the Haymarket martyrs—commonly dubbed anarchists — showed their ability to turn this eight-hour day demand into something more than just a reform measure. They gave it militant content and made it an integral part of the general struggle against the capitalist system.

There is much for us to learn from this.

Lessons of the Marine Workers Union Struggle

The developments in the Marine Workers Industrial Union are an instructive lesson in the incalculable harm that can be brought upon the revolutionary trade union movement by a policy and administration of bureaucratic Centrism in the Party, which inevitably exerts its devastating influence upon the Left wing unions. These injuries react upon the Party and upon the movement as a whole. For years now the Centrists have been squandering the capital accumulated by the revolutionary leadership of the early years of the Communist International. More than that, they have been drawing heavily on the future, and even the regenerated movement, purged of the Centrist bureaucracy and its treacherous policy, will be a long time restoring its prestige and repairing the damage done.

The events in the Marine Workers Industrial Union are mainly a repetition of what took place before in other unions under Stalinist direction, with the difference that they were longer in coming to a head and therefore more violent in their explosion. They brought out into clear relief the effects implicit in the situation in all the other unions. The adherents of the Left Opposition in the M. W. I. U. sought from the very outset to keep the revolt of the rank and file militants in Communist channels, and to direct it to the advantage of the revolutionary movement undermined by the bureaucrats. The task was rendered doubly difficult by the provocations of the officialdom and the machinations of the Right wing liquidators who, here as always, fasten themselves on to the reactionary prejudices in the workers' ranks.

The Warnings of the Opposition

Almost a year ago, in writing on the bureaucratic course in the National Miners Union, we warned that one of its dangers would be a recrudescence of syndicalism. "If syndicalism (that is, anti-political party; anti-political action; belief in the labor union as the all-sufficing instrument of the working class) is the punishment meted out to the revolutionary movement for the sins of party opportunism and vulgar parliamentarism, it is also one of the ways in which workers frequently repay the workers' political party for mismanagement and for dominating the trade union with the rigidity, bureaucratic arbitrariness, mechanical and formalistic transference of the party into the union which is typical of Stalinism. We warned about such an eventuality months ago in our comments on the Belleville conference. The sudden spread of erroneous syndicalist conceptions among the Illinois miners may be put entirely at the door of the Party bureaucrats." (Militant, March 1, 1930.)

Anarcho-syndicalism, Lenin justly observed, is the twin brother of opportunism. At the same time it is the price the Communist movement must pay for opportunist policies and the abuse of Party authority. This phenomenon is revealed classically in the M. W. I. U. The danger was implicit in the whole situation, and what we wrote in the foreword to the "Rank and File Marine Workers' Statement" published a month ago in the Militant, was but a restatement of what we had said many times in conferences with the proletarian Opposition in the Union. In every discussion with them, we insisted that Stalinist Centrism cannot be answered by the reactionary and bankrupt dogmas of anarcho-syndicalism. Our aim was to drive the legitimate protest of the Communist and Left wing workers deeper into the Party and the Union. We insisted on an appeal against expulsion by the Party bureaucrats, an appeal to the Party workers, a resistance to the last of expulsion from the Union, to carry the fight to the last ditch in the organization so as to strengthen its unity on the basis of a correct policy. In short, we stood for a Communist fight against the Centrist bureaucracy.

The Reactionary Role of the Right Wing

At this point the provocations of the bureaucrats were grist to the mill of unprincipled and treacherous elements which calculated upon diverting a number of workers in the Opposition from the path of Communism into the stagnant backwaters of syndicalism. The manoeuvres of the Lovestone adventurers, also facilitated the aspirations of the reactionary syndicalist elements.

How characteristic it is that the Party and Union bureaucrats made no attempt to answer the just and legitimate criticisms and grievances of the rank and file Opposition! On the contrary, hiding their own blunders and protecting their own puppets, they launched the standardized campaign of abuse and slander against the workers.

Lenin did not fight syndicalism by venomous attacks upon the workers who had fallen victim to this inverted phase of opportunism. Instead, he hit ten times harder at the opportunists whose crimes and stupidities were responsible for the manifestations. The tactics pursued by the Party and Union bureaucracy played the game of precisely those elements who sought to alienate the Communist workers from the Communist movement and draw them into a sterile, anti-Communist sect. And who are these elements? Aping the slogans of the Gompers school, they raised the cry of "no politics in the union", meaning thereby no revolutionary politics. They are people who, aspiring to leadership themselves, raised the cry of "no leaders whatever," in order to protect themselves from competition.

But such slogans did not prevent these elements from shady dickerings with the Right wing adventurers, and even other groups less savory, and this, in turn, did not prevent Lovestone from exploiting these reactionary sentiments to combat the efforts of the Left Opposition to hold the movement to a Communist road. Like their brothers-in-arms of the French Right wing, Lovestone & Co. leaped at the opportunity of making common cause with anarcho-syndicalist elements to fight against Communism and the Communist Party.

The False Tactics of the Syndicalists

The Left Opposition was obliged to break with the elements following such a course. We are in no sense interested in forming a united front of everybody against Communism. On the contrary, we aimed to unite the revolutionary workers for a fight to regenerate the Communist and Left wing movement, and thereby to strengthen the unity and resources of the Union. We disagree profoundly and give no support whatsoever to the elements following such a course.

T.U.U.L. and Amalgamated

By ALBERT ORLAND

The policies of the Left wing in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers have gone through a zig-zag and finally entered a blind alley. With the organization of the Men's Clothing Branch under the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union and the liquidation of the T. T. U. L. group in the Amalgamated after the second convention of the N. T. W. I. U. held last June, the Left wing forces in the clothing industry have been dissipated. Only a very small fraction, consisting of the most docile elements and loyal Stalinists joined the new union. The great majority of the sympathizers and supporters of the Left wing, not in agreement with the new line, were left to shift for themselves.

The Left wing in the Amalgamated has thus completed its last cycle of the "second period." The old leadership of the Amalgamated T. U. U. L. was expelled as Right wingers for their insistence upon maintaining the Left wing in the Amalgamated and the application of the so-called "united fronts." The new union by decision of the convention, pledged itself to the adoption of a more revolutionary form and policy adapted to the "third period", namely, the organization of shop committees and the formation of the real united front from below to conduct struggles for economic conditions under the leadership of the N. T. W. I. U.

However, the work of drawing members into the new union and of organizing the shop committees soon proved too difficult for the weak forces of the Amalgamated Section and the confusion in the ranks of the Left wing and the broad masses of the clothing workers condemned all their attempts to futility from the beginning.

The Left Wing at Low Ebb

The Left wing during its entire period of existence in the A. C. W. has built itself a record of unprincipledness and incompetence through its false and confusionist policies. Its adventurist united fronts with Hillman in the years of its greatest influence in the New York organization and later on with all sorts of careerists who used the Left wing in order to climb on its back to paid offices in the A. C. W., has destroyed the confidence of the workers in it and their hope for a change in their conditions. The activity of the Left wing in the A. C. W. at the time of the organization of the Men's Clothing Section of the N. T. W. I. U. was at its lowest ebb. The new section did not come as a result of the radicalization of the clothing workers and as the culmination of their struggle with the A. C. W. leadership, but was merely an act of servility on the part of the "third period" bureaucrats to the Stalinist apparatus. Indeed, the organization of the Men's Clothing Section was rather belated. Had it not been for the Right wingers in charge of the T. U. U.

ever to those expelled to the Communist workers in the Party ranks. Likewise, we can have nothing in common with the standpoint of those who, instead of fighting in the M. W. I. U. to safeguard its unity and correct its course, yield to provocation and run away from the fight against Mink, Johnstone & Co. to form an absolutely artificial organization which has neither a basis in the class struggle nor any possibilities for extended life.

As far as the members of the Left Opposition and their collaborators are concerned, no provocation by bureaucrats can divert them from the course we mapped out long ago. We will continue to fight on the platform of Communism. Any diversion from this path plays the game of the Minks, temporarily at least, for it consolidates their position even if upon the basis of a still narrower union. Their hold, of course, remains a precarious one, for they will run their heads into the wall of their own mismanagement as before, arousing the rank and file revolt which will strengthen the influence of the revolutionary movement among the marine workers and weaken the hold of those who so systematically cast shame and discredit upon our cause. This rank and file movement, absorbing the lessons of the recent events in the M. W. I. U., we will continue to support, and assist to a triumph that is equivalent to the victory of the revolutionary cause over that of opportunist-adventurism.

L. in the Amalgamated, the Left wing would have been abandoned a year before and the Amalgamated members urged to join the new union.

Is it any wonder that under such conditions the work of the Men's Clothing Section could not make any headway in spite of its revolutionary tactics, that their talk about shop committees and united fronts from below have remained empty phrases? Having given up contact with the masses the Left wing deprived itself of the opportunity of regaining confidence among them and participating in their struggles. The few isolated shop committees of picked Left wingers do not reflect the mood of the masses in the shops and are still less capable of stimulating mass struggles.

Here is clearly demonstrated the ruinous effect of the "third period" policy in the trade union movement.

The Workers Do Not Follow

The necessity for the organization of the new unions two years ago was explained by the T. U. U. L. leadership by the readiness of the masses to leave the old unions and their fear of lagging behind the masses. But where are the masses in the clothing industry today? Has there been a sudden change in their ideology or their conditions that they have so cruelly disappointed the bureaucrats? Surely, nothing of the sort happened. Simply, they do not seem inclined to play the game of the Stalinist faction in the Communist movement in the latest change of policies and leadership.

The tactics of working within the old unions that was given expression in the organization of the T. U. E. L., a few years ago was based on the conception of the trade unions as organizations embracing the broad masses of the workers in a given industry. The conservative or reactionary character of a trade union was explained by that very fact, because the workers as a mass are not class conscious as yet. It was the duty of the Communists, as the class conscious vanguard, to penetrate these mass organizations and by participation in their struggle, gain influence and leadership there. This tactic ac-

Social Reformism in the United States

Those who hold the position that reformism must develop in the United States are wrong. Trotsky pointed out that America does not have to pass through a period of reformism but this does not mean America will not. When conditions cause a Leftward movement in America today both reform and revolution gain but the ratio depends to a large extent upon the tactics and strategy of the Communists.

Most likely a period of reform will develop but it will be distinguished from European reformism because historical conditions (decay of capitalism) will limit it to a short duration. Developing capitalism in the past could offer reforms through pressure of the workers and the reformist parties but in this period even American capitalism and its reformist parties have little of material value to offer the workers. Decadent capitalism, internationally characterized by keener competition, intensified contradictions, mass production, rationalization, organic unemployment disintegration of the skilled strata, etc., are the objective conditions which narrow the material base of social reformism. But from this we cannot conclude, as the Stalinists still say, "the 'fascization' of reformism 'socialist fascist' and that the road in America is a sharp line of demarcation of 'class against class', 'revolutionary upsurges' and the radicalization is a continuous Leftward swing.

Reform Parties and Reform

Reform parties and reforms are two different things. Reform parties grow on reforms but the former can outlive the latter just like antiquated structures of the past exist today and will be carried over in the future. Their growth and living force depends upon material conditions but structures, customs and ideologies are used by reaction after the material conditions are swept away and before new conditions and new generations move on.

When Capitalism can not rule as a bourgeois republic it uses reform (Socialist, etc.) as long as possible and when polices were applied. It was the opportunist application of the united front by the T. U. U. L. leadership of the "second period" that was responsible for the losses in the old unions, but not the idea and the united front policy as such.

The pernicious "third period" policy did not, however, fail to produce—on the other hand—some awakening in the minds of a great many Left wing workers. The Centrist leadership has already realized that its new "revolutionary" policy brought disastrous results and made a swift turn backwards into the opposite direction. This new turn has already been applied in some of the branches of the Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union and notice of it has been served upon the Men's Clothing Section.

At this writing, the full implications of this turn are not yet clear to us. It has not yet gone through the Party fractions, and is naturally causing new confusion in the ranks. Judging from the past, however, it is to be expected that this turn will be a repetition of the old zig-zag in a new cycle unless an awakening takes place in the minds of the Party members to the real problems involved in changing revolutionary tactics and the trade union movement, and they act accordingly.

The latest turn in the trade union tactics is not an isolated phenomenon in the official Communist movement. It is a reflection of the general turn in the tactics of the C. I. noticeable in all fields and organizations under its control. The "third period" ideology has given way under the stress of reality and forced the official party leadership not only to change policies but gradually to abandon the terminology and the talk about the "third period" itself. But as with all the changes made by the official leadership in the past, without a frank analysis and criticism of the mistake made.

Under such conditions it is difficult to believe that the Party membership will learn anything from their latest experience with the "third period" policies and their origin, and the official leadership will be given a new lease of life to continue on their worn-out zig-zag path that has caused so much injury to the Communist and revolutionary movements. At any rate, this will be the result unless a thorough analysis and a fundamental criticism is forced through in the ranks.

this is no longer possible, capitalism resorts to open dictatorship (Fascism). It is most likely, too, that American capitalism will try reform before using open dictatorship. In 1918, the German capitalists used the reformist parties and reforms to their advantage against the workers but in 1923 the material base for reforms in Germany was lacking and instead of reforms the workers were beaten down to a lower standard of living by a reform party without reforms. Today the new instrument of fascism is being shaped to take the helm in place of the reform party, the social Democracy, which must be discarded to fight the workers and the Communist vanguard.

In Russia in 1917 the breakdown of the economic system eliminated the material base for the reform party to carry out its reforms yet the reformist parties existed and thrived from February to October. The reformists without a material base were doing a good job for capitalism. They failed because of a Marxian party, the Bolsheviks, under the leadership of Lenin and Trotsky. Capitalist reforms as a material concession in Russia had reached an end with the breakdown of the system and these reforms could only be fulfilled through a transformation (revolution) with workers' reforms under the Soviets. The fast tempo of the Russian reformists from February to October was a reflection of the fast tempo of social changes, but nevertheless, the reformist parties played their role in spite of the death of the material base.

When the objective conditions are favorable and reform wins, as in Germany in 1923, Great Britain 1925, and in the United States today—the lack of success on the part of the workers falls on the shoulders of the party which calls itself the vanguard, the Communist. Today, with objective conditions so favorable, greater responsibility falls upon the shoulders of the Communist Party and this means primarily on the Left Opposition. We cannot skip necessary evolutionary steps toward revolution but we can, as Marxists shorten

Litvinov at Geneva

The den of thieves and pirates located at Geneva is once more bustling with "disarmament" activity. This time it is the regular meeting of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission, in which, like all its prototypes, the various imperialist powers gather in an attempt to secure by agreement a more favorable position in the armed camp presented by the capitalist world today. No simpler and more final reply to the deceit of these innumerable conferences can be made than the fact that there are more men under arms today than there were before the world war; that bourgeois statement can declare without shocking anybody that Europe is closer to "convulsions now than at any other time since 1914"; that since the above-mentioned commission was established, the five largest imperialist powers have increased their arms budgets by 27 percent.

The Soviet Delegation

At the present session of the Commission, there is a Soviet delegation with Litvinov at its head. We have had occasion in the past to point out the opportunist tenor of the whole foreign policy of the ruling faction in the Russian Communist Party. It rings out brazenly in the conference under discussion. We quote from an "irreproachable" source (Comintern cablegram to Daily Worker, November 7, 1930) the remarks made by Litvinov, which would delight the heart of a Left social democrat, or even an honest bourgeois pacifist of The Nation type, but which are repelling to a revolutionist who has learned from Lenin:

"The Soviet Union, Litvinov said, considered the war danger indissolubly connected with capitalism but believed it possible to minimize (?) the danger by real (!) disarmament, and therefore presented two proposals, one of complete disarmament, and an alternative of partial (!) disarmament."

Lenin, while not being so "clever" a statesman as Litvinov, not to speak of the latter's master, Stalin, was nevertheless content with replying to both of them in advance:

"The Kautskyan preaching of 'disarmament', which is addressed chiefly to the present governments of the imperialist great powers, is a vulgar piece of opportunism, of bourgeois pacifism, actually calculated—in spite of the good intentions of the gentle Kautskys—to divert the workers from the class struggle. For such a propaganda is calculated to inspire the workers with the thought that the present bourgeois governments of the imperialist powers are NOT bound by thousands of threads of finance capital and tens or hundreds of corresponding (i. e., predatory, greedy, preparatory to imperialistic aggression) SECRET TREATIES between themselves." (The Disarmament Cry, Sbornik Sozialdemokrata, December 1916).

The Stalinist press, in this country as elsewhere, grows positively purple with enthusiasm at the petty bourgeois conduct and policy of Litvinov-Stalin. Lenin's teachings on the reactionary-utopian slogan of "disarmament" under capitalism, have been entirely lost to the Stalinists. Like the petty bourgeois press, it helps to foster the most dangerous pacifist illusions in the minds of the workers. In "Notes on the Problems of Our Delegation at the Hague"—a document also directed at establishing the Bolshevik conception of the struggle against war—Lenin writes:

"The press of the dominating class obscures the issues by spreading lies about it in vast numbers of copies against which the weak socialist press is entirely powerless, the more so that in the time of peace they maintain a radically wrong attitude towards this very question. The Communist press in the majority of countries also disgraces itself."

The Stalinist course at Geneva, and the panegyrics of the Daily Worker do not detract from, but rather emphasize, the truth of these words, all of which, particularly the last sentence, are fresher today than ever.

their duration and even alter their quality. Since the objective conditions favor us, the battle between reform and revolution now primarily rests upon a Marxian party of dialectic revolutionists, not only to explain correctly the conditions but to present the program, and the program of action to remake them, connecting today's activity with our goal. The Communist can only be equal to this task by basing himself upon the program of the Left Opposition and we of the Left must intensify our activity and concretize our program. —OEHLER.

Stalin Grants Two Interviews

By MAX SHACHTMAN

Taking advantage of the unusual interest aroused by the rumor of his assassination, Stalin has availed himself of the columns of the capitalist press of the world to expound his viewpoint on a number of questions of the hour. More than a year ago, comrade Trotsky, placed in a somewhat similar situation by the sensation aroused by his deportation to Turkey, also made use of the capitalist press to publish the standpoint of the Communist Opposition, so as to acquaint the workers of the world with what it really stood for.

In both cases, the utilization of the enemy press was quite justified, for the dramatic interest centering around the individuals in question made it possible for them not only to give expression to the cause they defend, but virtually to compel the bourgeois press to print whatever they said. The Stalinists, at the time of Trotsky's articles in the capitalist press, pretended a virtuous indignation of which they are really incapable. We saw nothing reprehensible in the action at that time, and just as little in Stalin's today. What the revolutionist is concerned about is, WHAT is said and for what purpose, for the bourgeois press of the world is still read in preference to the strictly working class press.

What Trotsky Did

Trotsky seized the opportunity to present the revolutionary point of view to the worker-readers of the bourgeois press, to make an ardent defense of the October revolution against the onslaughts of the world bourgeoisie and the sapping work of the Thermidorians in the Soviet Union. His articles constituted a Bolshevik banner, a rallying point, a cry to awaken the world working class to the dangers menacing the proletarian dictatorship.

How do matters stand, however, with Stalin's interviews (New York Telegram, November 24, and New York Times, December 1)? Their principal virtue—perhaps their only virtue—is the fact that they are an accurate picture of Stalin, his dull empiricism, his vulgar "practicality", his ignorance and contempt of Bolshevik theory and principle. So striking are all these traits, that even the Daily Worker does not dare as much as to mention the outstanding point in his interview, while the Freiheit editors consider it either so scandalous or so insignificant, that they do not even report it by a single line! A few quotations will make clear the reason.

The International Stalinist strategy in the Communist movement centers around the slogan, theory, and agitation for the "Defense of the Soviet Union against the War Danger." The prevailing theory is that if the Soviet Union can merely prevent military intervention, then a self-sufficient socialist society can be constructed within national boundaries. The abstract cry "Defend the Soviet Union" is daily dinned into the ears of the official Communist Party press readers. Stalin—assuming that he intended to direct his remarks to the workers, and not to Messrs. Hoover, Adolph Ochs and Roy Howard—should have emphasized this danger and called upon the workers to ward it off. Instead, he said everything he could to minimize this danger, and even to eliminate it. We quote from the Duranty dispatch to the Times. (Duranty is one of the staunchest supporters of the Stalin regime and his reports may be relied upon for accuracy—insofar as he quotes Stalin, at least.)

"Too Late"

"Both of them (i. e., the so-called hot-headed bourgeois and the cautious bourgeois) would readily crush a weak enemy if it could be done with little or no risk, but for the moment no such easy and profitable adventure offers itself. They might have tried it against the U. S. S. R. five or six years ago, but they waited too long. It is now too late."

"Stalin hurled out the last words without raising his voice but with a sudden access of restrained power that had an impact like a blow."

On the same day, the printers in the Daily Worker were setting up headlines, some of which read: "Canadian Boss, Deterring and Standard Oil for War on U. S. S. R.", "Latest Steps in Anti-Soviet War Plot" (eight are listed), with a leading editorial to the same effect. But if it "is now too late," if the bourgeoisie has "waited too long" (we believe neither of these "soliciting" opines), why all the excitement about the war danger against the U.S.S.R.?

Not content with this smug assertion,

Stalin continues his remarks, and goes from bad to worse.

"Can capitalist and Communist systems co-exist peacefully," asked Lyons of the United Press.

"It is possible," Stalin replied, "and the best proof is that they have lived peacefully side by side since the conclusion of our civil war and the intervention period." (Telegram, November 24.)

To make sure of this incredible declaration, Duranty asked a few days later: "You see, then, no reason why capitalist and Communist systems should not exist side by side without fighting?"

"They have not fought for ten years," said Stalin dryly, "which means they can co-exist." (Times, December 1.)

Lenin, who lived neither in the "third period" nor in the period of Stalin's wisdom, was of a fundamentally different opinion, that is, he defended a Marxist position while Stalin defends the standpoint of blind liberalism. One can quote from his writings and speeches a thousand sentences which are a crushing refutation of Stalin's astounding remarks. We take a few at random.

"World imperialism side by side with a victorious onslaught of the social revolution cannot get along together." (Vol. 15, page 175.)

"We do not live merely in a state but in a system of states and the existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with imperialist states for any length of time is inconceivable. In the end, one or the other must triumph." (Vol. 17, page 197.)

"As long as we still have capitalism and socialism we cannot live peacefully—either one or the other will be the victor in the end. The obituary will have to be sung either over the death of world capitalism or the death of the Soviet republic. Now we have only a respite in the war." (Vol. 17, page 398.) And so on, ad infinitum.

"The Ten Years of Peace"

Stalin's ten years of "socialist-capitalist peace" cover the period of the Arcos and Peking raids, the attack on the Chinese Eastern Railway, the breaking of relations with Russia by England and France, the murder of Voikov in Poland, the permanent conspiracies of all capitalist countries against the U. S. S. R. (culminating in the very trial now going on in Moscow!), and other facts far too numerous to mention. Obviously, if this is the "peaceful co-existence," what will "war" resemble?

That is why the Daily Worker, which quoted much from Stalin's interview (November 5), did not even mention the quotation we made above. Why not? Either it is a mis-quotation, in which case it should obviously be exposed. Or else it is correctly reported, in which case it is of such tremendous importance that it should be blazoned in the headlines. Of course, the simple truth is that neither the Daily Worker nor the Freiheit dared to reprint these thoroughly reactionary words of Stalin—they were too strong for the stomach. (The Daily Worker made up for its whipped-dog silence on Stalin by publishing a hysterical column of pernicious anaemia by Browder, denouncing the Opposition as . . . counter-revolutionists and stool pigeons. And there is nothing surprising in this, for even medical science teaches us that a poisoned organism, like an attack of rabies, always brings foam to the mouth and prevents coherent speech. Browder, we therefore assume, is a subject for treatment by a science other than political, and we do not feel ourselves competent to effect any cures or give any advice in that sphere.)

We learn further from Stalin the exact reason for the disgraceful conduct of the Soviet delegation to the Geneva arms, and even for its participation.

"Stalin has no hope that anything constructive will come out of the Geneva Disarmament Conference. Nevertheless he said he felt the Soviet government could not abstain from any effort (so!), however weak, toward peace. He said Litvinov might succeed in injecting a few healthy clauses (now then!) here and there. 'Anyway,' he said, 'it can't do any harm to participate in the conference.'"

But these very same "reasons" can be advanced to justify joining the League of Nations, that is, the Black International which fathers the Disarmament Conferences. And, further, if one finally decides to participate in the "disarmament" conferences, it should not be done in the "diplomatic" manner of Litvinov and Stalin (to which we refer elsewhere in this issue) but

"It can't do any harm." No, none except to create the illusion in the minds of the workers that the League of Nations and its subsidiaries can be reformed step by step by means of "injecting a few healthy clauses here and there," which means, in reality, giving the imperialist war mongers and their machinations a convenient shield from the distrust of the world proletariat.

The Daily Worker Silent Again

Here again, the Daily Worker maintains a tight-lipped silence. Not a word of quotation or comment on Stalin's remarks about the Geneva Conference and Litvinov's participation. Isn't it pertinent to inquire about the reason for the omission? Has Stalin one theory of the revolution or working class readers who buy the capitalist press, and another theory for the readers who buy the Daily Worker? Which theory does he believe? Which shall we believe? And above all, which theory is believed or should be believed by the workers, who still read a thousand Telegrams and Timeses to one Daily Worker?

There is one more point in Stalin's interviews, the one the bourgeois press underlined: trade with the United States. "If it cannot establish political ties with the United States, the Soviet Union at least desires to strengthen its economic ties with America. And America being a great, wealthy, technically progressive and developed country, must appreciate the advantages of such economic intercourse as much as we do." (Telegram, November 24.)

Stalin Catches Up with the Opposition

As it stands, no serious person can have objection to it. But there is nevertheless a contradiction here. A number of months ago, dealing with the state of world unemployment on the one hand, and the difficulties being encountered by the Five-Year Plan on the other, comrade Trotsky advanced the idea that the Communists in the Soviet Union and the capitalist countries should elaborate an international campaign aiming at the extension of large, long-term credits to Russia for the purchase of machinery to assist the Five Year Plan, and to ameliorate to an extent the sufferings of the unemployed by the fact that certain industries would be set going through Soviet orders for machinery. Our readers are sufficiently acquainted with the proposal to obviate any elaboration of it here.

Weisbord's Proposals on Unemployment

A number of inquiries concerning our position on the articles by comrade Albert Weisbord in which he advanced "A Concrete Program on the Unemployed" have been received. The article was printed as a contribution to the discussion. It does not coincide with our point of view.

We are in agreement with those points in Weisbord's articles which deal with the concrete steps to be taken to organize the unemployed workers and their families, that is, into block committees in the proletarian quarters, into a form of tenants' leagues for the purpose of resisting evictions for non-payment of rents, etc., etc. This task has been neglected by the movement up to now and must be carried out. Our divergences with Weisbord occur chiefly at the point where he sets tasks for this movement, where he estimates—by implication at least—the period of development the movement as a whole finds itself in, and where he repeats his proposals in relation to the Party and to the Lovestone faction.

It is false to state that "the whole immediate objective of the unemployment movement is to seize things necessary to live." The acquisition of living necessities and resistance to evictions is indeed one of the principal tasks not only of the unemployed, but of their fellow-workers still at work, but not the "whole" of it. The principal problem is the mobilization of the employed and unemployed into a united movement for a struggle around three principal demands: the six-hour day and five-day week without wage reductions, social insurance, and immediate relief by the state and the employers. The so-called "food riots" are a by-product, and under certain conditions an aid, in the fight for these demands, and require a previous deep-going organization of the masses, the arousing of their sentiments for struggle, and establishment of safeguards against the degeneration of such a movement into petty-bourgeois-anarchist swamps. But they are far from the "whole immediate objective."

Matters are worse with the perspectives of struggle of this movement, which involves an estimate of its state of development. Instead of a criticism of the Party immediately met with violent resistance by the whole Stalinist apparatus. Browder and the other Jorges poured sulphur and pitch upon it. It was denounced as little, if any, better than "social-fascism." In the first place, it ran counter to the canonized theory of a self-sufficient socialist society in Russia. Secondly, it was a proposal to "help capitalism solve its unemployment crisis." Thirdly, fourthly, fifthly and tenthly, it was proposed by the Opposition which, as every member of the Political Bureau is taught in the Lenin School, is counter-revolutionary. Now the idea has been taken off the index expurgatorium and the official imprimatur affixed to it by the hand of Stalin himself. Listen to how he laughs out of court yesterday's pitiful arguments of Browder and Co.:

"They provide equipment and technical help don't they? And we pay them, don't we, for everything—pay top prices, too, as you and obey know. You might as well say that we are arming Americans and helping to maintain their capitalist system against ours. No," he continued more softly, "that is nonsense. That isn't the point at all." (Times, December 1.) (What a scathing remark to make about so loyal a servitor as Browder!)

There remains, however, a difference between Stalin's appeal for trade relations and the Opposition's. The first is not only not addressed to the workers, but it does not even mention their role in it, the manner in which the interests of unemployed and employed are so directly connected with the welfare of the Soviet Union and its economic advancement. Instead, it is addressed to the bourgeoisie. It is quite true that they must be spoken too as well, but then Stalin should at the same time apologize to the workers for having permitted Molotov and Manuilsky and their lesser lights to denounce the Opposition because we proposed—among other things—an economic collaboration between the U. S. S. R. and the Mueller government in Germany and the MacDonald regime in England. And we are still waiting for the American Party chiefs to accept the logic of Stalin's statements and the proposals of the Opposition to launch a campaign along the lines sketched in our plan. It is overdue.

or its "third period" absurdities and monstrous exaggerations in connection with the slogan for "fighting the police", Weisbord only deepens its error. The class conscious vanguard is exceedingly small today. It is confronted by a working class virtually everywhere on the defensive, and its main problem is the organization of a defensive resistance to the onslaught of the bourgeoisie. The Party mistakes this defensive for an offensive, and half its blunders are rooted in this radically false conception.

Weisbord, however, even goes further, and arrives at the extremely ultra-Leftist conception of an impending revolutionary situation in the country. No other view can explain such terms as these, in consideration of the present relation of forces in the country: "The Party wants to fight the police. Good." And further: "Here (in proletarian neighborhoods) the fight can spread. The police cannot easily surround it . . . Shops and factories can be pulled on strike and swept into battle. In short, here the police are weakest and the workers strongest. Through the fighting squads organized by the block groups, a whole section of the city could be held." Since cities, or sections of them, are not held merely for the holding, but because the question of seizure of power has been raised, Weisbord's views are not only harshly out of harmony with the views of the Opposition but also with the elementary realities of the situation. Less emphasis on "fight the police" (it is clear, the workers must defend themselves ardently against police attacks and brutalities, but certainly not in an offensive sense, with a view to "holding a whole section of the city") and more emphasis on the practical needs and interests of the movement, which correspond to its stage of development—those are urgent requirements of the moment.

Further, we disagree sharply with Weisbord's ridicule of the proposals advanced by the Left Opposition for long-term credits to the Soviet Union as a means of ameliorating the hardships of the unemployed in capitalist countries and of the Five Year Plan in Russia. Such credits will not only permit Russia to purchase

About the time the Northern Expeditionary took Shanghai in 1927, what Chiang Kai paid great attention to was the selection of the Shanghai municipal government and how to unite the petty-bourgeoisie (the middle and small traders) for opposing the big bourgeoisie; Peng Shu Chih, Lo Yih Nieng became very angry, and tore it to the Shanghai municipal government was not a central problem. The central problem was that if the proletariat did not overpower the military forces of Chiang Kai-Shek, the petty bourgeoisie would not stand for us and that Chiang Kai-Shek must, under the direction of the imperialists, massacre the masses. The Shanghai municipal government would not only be a phrase then, but a defeat throughout China would take place, for when Chiang Kai-Shek openly betrayed the revolution it would never be an individual action, but the signal for the bourgeoisie in the whole country to go over to the reactionary camp. At that time, Peng Shu Chih went to Hankow to state our opinion before the International delegate and the majority of the members of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party and to consult them on how to attack the forces of Chiang Kai-Shek. But they did not care very much about the coup of Shanghai, but telegraphed to me several times urging me to go to Wuhan, in Hupeh province. They thought that the nationalist government was at Wuhan at that time, so all important problems should be solved there. At the same time, the International telegraphed to us instructing us to hide or bury all the weapons of the workers to avoid the military conflict between the workers and Chiang Kai-Shek, in order not to disturb the occupation of Shanghai by the armed forces. Having read this telegram, Lo Yih Nung became very angry, and tore it to bits. At that time I again obeyed the order of the International and could not maintain my own opinion. Based upon the policy of the International towards the Kuo Min Tang and the imperialists, I issued a shameful manifesto with Wang Chin Wei.

The Proposal to Withdraw from the K.M.T.

In the beginning of April I went to Hankow. When I first met Wang Chin Wei I heard from him some reactionary words, far different from what he said while in Shanghai. I told this to Borodin; he said that my observations were right and that as soon as Wang Chin Wei reached Wuhan he was surrounded by Hsu Chien, Kuo Meng Yu, Chen Pung Po, Tan Yien Kai and others, and became gradually colder. After Chiang Kai-Shek and Lu Chi Shung continually massacred the workers and peasants, the Kuo Min Tang hated the power of the proletariat more every day, and the reactionary attitude of Wang Chin Wei and of the Central Committee of the Kuo Min Tang developed rapidly. At the meeting of our Political Bureau, I made a report on the status of the joint meeting of our Party and of the Kuo Min Tang: "The danger of co-operation between our Party and the Kuo Min Tang is more and more serious. What they tried to seize on seemed to be this or that small problem; what they really wanted was the whole leading power. Now there are only two roads before us: either to give up the leading power or to break with them." The attendants answered my report with silence. After the coup of May 21 at Changsha, in Huhan province, I twice suggested withdrawal from the Kuo Min Tang. Finally, I said: "The Wuhan Kuo Min Tang has followed the steps of Chiang Kai-Shek!" At that time only Yen Pih Si said: "Indeed!" and Chow Eng Lai said: "After we withdraw from the Kuo Min Tang the labor and peasant movement will be freer but the military movement will suffer too much." All the rest still answered my suggestion with the attitude of quiet. At the same time I discussed this with Chih Chiu Bai. He said: "We should let the Kuo Min Tang expel us, we cannot withdraw by ourselves." I consulted Borodin. He said: "I quite agree with your idea but I know that Moscow will never permit it." At that time I once more observed the discipline of the International and the opinion of the majority of the Central Committee and was unable to maintain my own opinion. From the beginning I could not persistly maintain my opinion; up to this time I could no longer bear it. Then, I tendered my resignation to the Central Committee. The chief reason for the resignation was: "The International wishes us to carry out our own policy, on the one hand, and does not allow us to withdraw from the Kuo Min Tang on the other. There is really no way out and I cannot continue with my work."

From the beginning to the end, the International recognized the Kuo Min Tang as the main body of the Chinese national democratic revolution. In the mouth of Stalin the words "leadership of the Kuo Min Tang" were shouted very loudly (see "The Error of the Opposition" in "Problems of the Chinese Revolution"). So it wished us throughout to surrender in the organization of the Kuo Min Tang and to lead the masses under the name and the banner of the Kuo Min Tang. Up to the time when the whole Kuo Min Tang of Feng Yu-Hsiang, Wang Chin Wei, Lang Lin Chih, Ho Chin etc., were openly reactionary and abolished the so-called three points policies: to unite with the Soviet Union, to allow the C. P., to join the Kuo Min Tang and to help the labor and peasant movement, the International instructed us by telegram: "Only withdraw from the Kuo Min Tang government not from the Kuo Min Tang." So, after the "August 7" Conference, from the Nanchang uprising to the capture of Swatow, the Communist party still hid under the blue-white banner of the Left clique of the Kuo Min Tang. Among the masses it seemed that there was trouble within the Kuo Min Tang, but nothing more." The young Chinese Communist Party, produced by the young Chinese proletariat, had not had a proper period of training in Marxism and class struggles. In the beginning of the founding of the Party, it was confronted by the great revolutionary struggle. The only hope of avoiding any very grave error was the correct guidance of the proletarian policy of the International. Under the guidance of such a continuously opportunist policy how could the Chinese proletariat and the Communist Party clearly observe their own future? and how could they have their own independent policy? They only surrendered to the bourgeoisie step by step and subordinated themselves to the bourgeoisie. So when the latter suddenly massacred us we did not know what to do about it. After the coup of May 21 at Changsha, the method given to us by the International was:

(1) Confiscate the land of the landowners from the lower strata, not to use the name of the nationalist government, but do not touch the land of military officers. (Not a single one of the bourgeoisie, landlords, tuchuns, and gentry of Hunan and Hupeh provinces but was the kinsman, relative or old friend of the officers of that time. All the landowners were directly or indirectly protected by the officers. To confiscate the land is only empty words if it is conditioned by "do not touch the land of the military officers.")

(2) Check the peasants' "over-zealous" action with the power of the Party headquarters. (We did execute this shameful policy of checking the peasants' over-zealous action; afterwards the International criticized the Chinese Party as having "often become the obstacle of the masses" and considered it as one of the greatest opportunist errors.)

(3) Destroy the present unreliable generals, arm twenty thousand Communists and select fifty thousand worker and peasant elements from Hunan and Hupeh provinces for organizing a new army. (If we could get so many rifles, why should we not directly arm the workers and peasants and why should we still enlarge the new troops of the Kuo Min Tang? Why could not we establish the Soviet of workers, peasants and soldiers? If there are neither armed workers and peasants nor soviets who and how can we destroy the said unreliable generals? I suppose that we should still pitifully beg the Central Committee of the Kuo Min Tang to discharge them. That the delegate of the International, Lois, showed Wang Chin Wei the instruction of the III International, was of course for this purpose.)

(4) Put new working and peasant elements into the Central Committee of the Kuo Min Tang to take the place of old members. (If we have power to deal freely with the old Committee and reorganize the Kuo Min Tang, why could we not organize Soviets? Why must we send our worker and peasant leaders to the bourgeois Kuo Min Tang, who have already been massacring the workers and peasants? and why should we decorate such a Kuo Min Tang with our leaders?)

A "Revolutionary" Court

(5) Organize a Revolutionary Court with a well-known member of the Kuo Min Tang as its chairman in order to judge the reactionary officers. How can the already reactionary leader of the Kuo Min Tang judge the reactionary officers in the Revolutionary Court?

Those who attempted to execute such a policy within the Kuo Min Tang were still opportunists of Left tendency. There was no change at all in the fundamental policy; it was like taking a bath in a urinal vessel! At that time, if we wanted to carry out the Left policy of revolution, the fundamental policy had to be changed. That is, the Communist Party had to withdraw from the Kuo Min Tang and be really independent. It had to arm the workers and peasants, as many as possible, establish the Soviet of workers, peasants and soldiers and seize the leading power from the Kuo Min Tang; otherwise, no matter what kind of Left policy was adopted, there was no way to realize it. At that time the Central Political Bureau wired to the Communist International to answer its instruction: we accept the instruction and will work according to its direction but it cannot be realized immediately. For all the members of the Central Committee recognized that that instruction was an impractical method. Even the participant of the meeting of the Central Committee, Fanck (it was said that he was the private deputy of Stalin) also thought that there was no possibility to carry it out. He agreed with the telegraphic answer of the Central Committee, saying: "We can only say so in our answer." After the "August 7" Conference, the Central Committee endeavored to propagate that the cause of the failure of the Chinese revolution was that the opportunists did not accept the instructions of the Communist International (of course, the instructions were the above mentioned one; besides these, there were no instructions!) to change the tactics at once; we did not know how they could change the policy within the sphere of the Kuo Min Tang and who were the so-called opportunists.

Where Responsibility Lies

As the Party has committed such a fundamental error, the other bigger and smaller subordinate errors, of course, would continually take place. I, whose perception was not clear, whose opinion was not decisive, sank deeply in the atmosphere of opportunism, sincerely carried out the opportunist policy of the Third International; I unconsciously became the tool of the narrow faction of Stalin; I could not save the Party; and the revolution. All this, both I and other comrades should be responsible for. The present Central Committee said: "You attempt to put the failure of the Chinese Revolution on the shoulders of the Third International in order that you might throw off your own responsibility!" This statement is ridiculous. Nobody can permanently withhold his right to criticize the opportunism of the Party leadership, or to return to Marxism and Leninism because he has himself committed opportunism. At the same time, nobody can take the liberty of avoiding his responsibility for executing an opportunist policy because opportunism came from high places. The source of the opportunist policy is the Third International; but why did not the leaders of the Chinese Party make a protest against the Third International, but sincerely carried out its policies? Who could remove this responsibility? We should very frankly and objectively recognize that all the past and present opportunist policies come from the Third International. The Third International should bear the responsibility. The young Chinese Party has not yet the ability of itself to invent any theories and settle any policy; but the leading organ of the Chinese Party ought to bear the responsibility for blindly executing the opportunist policy of the Third International without a little bit of judgment and protest. If we mutually excuse each other and all of us think that we have committed no mistakes, was it then the error of the masses? This is not only too ridiculous but also does not take any responsibility towards the revolution! I strongly believe that, if I, or other responsible comrades, could at that time have had a clear recognition of the falsity of the opportunist policy; a strong argument against it, even to the point of mobilizing the entire Party for an ardent discussion and debate, as comrade Trotsky has been doing, the result would inevitably have been a great help to the revolution and would not have made the revolution such a shameful failure, though I might have been expelled from the Third International and a split in the Party might have taken place. I, whose perception was not clear and opinion was not decisive, did not do so after all! If the Party were to base itself on such past mistakes of mine or on the fact that I strongly maintained the former erroneous line, in order to give me any severe punishment, I would earnestly accept it without uttering a word.

ORDER FROM THE MILITANT, 25 THIRD AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Life of the Exiled and Imprisoned Russian Opposition

By N. MARKIN

The Fifteenth Congress of the C.P.S.U. (December 1927) placed the Opposition outside of the ranks of the Party and sanctioned the state repressive measures taken against it. In the course of 1928 thousands of Oppositionists were arrested and sent into exile. Despite all that, the curve of development of the Opposition for the entire year of 1928 was vigorously on the ascendant. At the beginning of 1929 the G.P.U. ferociously ransacked the Opposition organizations all over the U.S.S.R. Simultaneously the repression not only increased in quantity but also achieved a new quality: the creation of Solitaries; depriving the deported of their work, transferring them to unhealthy places, reducing their maintenance by half; the expulsion of comrade Trotsky; general provocation and so on. In the economic and political domain, the year 1929 was characterized by the accentuation of the Left zig-zag of Centrism, necessitated by the kulak grain strikes in 1928.

The Crisis in the Opposition

The combined influence of these two factors, the ruthless repression and a certain division brought about by the Left turn of Centrism—placed the Opposition before a grave crisis in the summer of 1929. A wave of capitulation passed over the places of deportation. In August 1929 comrade Rakovsky and others made their well known declaration. This declaration was an attempt to realize a united front with the Party. It established certain modifications of the official course, and based on these, expressed anew the desire to defend and to struggle for its ideas within the frame work of the Party, underlining at the same time that the only serious guarantee for the turn was a change of regime in the Party. Rakovsky's declaration—as was evident—was rejected. This served as an additional test of the Party regime by showing the Opposition elements who were seriously doubtful, all the superficiality and the insincerity of Centrism's Leftward turn. The August declaration of Rakovsky brought into circulation extensive theses and submitted the policy of Centrism to a profound and compact criticism. The response of the apparatus to the declaration of Rakovsky forced the Opposition to declare again and precisely that it will not only continue, but enlarge and intensify its factional work.

In the same period comrades Rakovsky and Trotsky again put forth the question of the Party as the central problem of the revolution. Certain capitulators have deluded themselves (and deluded others) with pseudodialectic arguments, in the sense that the correction of the economic line will of itself entail an improvement of the regime in the Party. "It is an absurdity", comrade Trotsky wrote to the Russian comrades, "to believe that the Five Year Plan can modify automatically the regime of the Party. On the contrary, the change of regime in the Party is not only the premise of ultimate successes, but also a certain guarantee against the dangers which grow more rapidly than the successes." And on several later occasions: "The Party regime constitutes a mortal danger precisely towards economy." Rakovsky and other Russian Opposition comrades wrote in the same vein.

However, the Left course of Centrism began, toward 1930, to transform itself into an ultra-Left policy which expressed itself in the "industrialization course", and "complete collectivization." The Left Opposition did not allow itself to be carried away by the Stalinist "dizziness." On the question of our attitude towards the new ultra-Left course, it reenforced its cohesion, while holding to its previous strategy of collectivization and industrialization. The Russian Opposition launched the tactical slogan: Slow down! Retreat! This slogan was unanimously approved by the Russian Left Opposition. Later on, the new course was replaced by a still newer one, in which the elements of adventurist leaps were joined with those of panicky retreat. It is in such a situation that the Sixteenth Congress met, and brought about a new aggravation of the Party regime. "The preparation of Bonapartism insofar as it concerns the Party, has been accomplished. In the Party the plebiscitary regime has been definitely installed," comrade Trotsky wrote to the U. S. S. R.

For the Opposition, the preparation of the Congress expressed itself in a mad reenforcement of reprisals*. The Opposition presented to the Congress a declaration ("of the 7": Rakovsky, Muralov, Kossior, Kasparova, Grunstein, Zinzadze, Aussem.) All these comrades are Opposition leaders and among the oldest members of the Party. Some time before this declaration to the C.C., to the C.C.C. and to all the members of the Party, a long principle declaration called "The April declaration of the 4": Rakovsky, Kossior, Kasparova, and Muralov. Around this declaration a vast polemic developed in the deportation camps and in secret (in the U.S.S.R.)

The Ideological Life of the Opposition

It must be said that from the day of its birth, the Opposition in deportation began to live an intense ideological life. Not only are timely economic, political, tactical and strategical questions profoundly studied and heatedly discussed, but even the most abstract problems of philosophy. The Solitaries have become revolutionary universities. Numerous serious Marxist works have been produced by the pens of deported Oppositionists. The ideological level of the Russian Opposition cadres may be considered, without any exaggeration, as exceptional. In ridding themselves of the capitulatory ballast, in gaining cohesion under the fire of repression, it is the firmest and most valiant revolutionists who have remained in the deportation.

During this current year, the exchange of ideas has been rendered very difficult by an almost complete postal blockade. That is why the study of questions often does not emerge from the limits of the isolated centers of the deportation.

Certain differences—though not of principle—have been provoked by the following theses in Rakovsky's April declaration: "Before the Party is posed the question of supplying the country with food stuffs and with agricultural raw materials by reinforcing the construction of the Soviet farms, at the same time maintaining the rhythm of industrial development." Some of the comrades found a contradiction to the slogan of "retreat" in these theses. Their argument can be summed up in this: "It is our duty to subject the bureaucratic rhythms to a merciless criticism and not to maintain them. The period of ultra-Left adventurism in the Centrist policy of industrialization is not yet at an end."

On the other hand, the comrades who supported the theses of comrade Rakovsky countered with the following argument: "The period in which the articles and letters of Trotsky and Rakovsky (which called for beating a retreat and not for maintaining the rhythms) belong, is distinct from the period of the declaration . . . In the present period, after the collapse of the 'complete collectivization', it is collectivization itself which is in danger. Not only is the 'five-year plan in four years' threatened but the realization of the 'five-year plan altogether, and to support the slogan of a relaxation of the rhythm in such a situation is profoundly wrong." The Editors of the Bulletin of the Russian Opposition have not had the opportunity to express themselves fundamentally on this question, since it had not yet received the April Declaration at that time. They simply stressed that "it is of course understood that we are for the 'maximum rhythms' provided they are economically and politically possible," and that it is not this question—despite all its seriousness—which is of decisive importance at present but rather that of the "methods of economic direction and of the life of the Party with whose aid the rhythms have been elaborated, realized and checked."

The Social Nature of the State

Another question which has provoked a broad discussion is that of the social character and perspectives of the Soviet state, and the question which is bound up with this, namely, of the social essence of the Soviet bureaucracy (or of the degree of the divorce between the bureaucracy and the masses, as some of the comrades pose the question), a phenomenon hitherto unknown in history and which has consequently not been analyzed as yet by Marxist thought. To what degree can the bureaucracy be considered as a class, as an embryo of a class? Can it become a class? Such are the questions which are at the center of the analysis and discussion on the Soviet system. Evidently, it is not a question of a rigid, that is to say, of a metaphysical formula, but of the analysis of perspectives and the orientation of living processes. According to the Moscow correspondent of the Russian Bulletin, this tendency is indicated by comrade Rakovsky "as being the possible line of transformation of the proletarian state into a bureaucratic state with Communist vestiges."

* We will not stop at this question, which has been sufficiently illuminated in the Opposition publications.

"The great merit," writes the same correspondent, "of the documents written by comrade Rakovsky since 1928, is the profound penetration and entirely concrete analysis of his process. The new declaration in question, in enhancing this analysis and extending it to the new supplement of the Soviet bureaucracy—the nascent collective farm bureaucracy—interested in preserving the current state of affairs, not only establishes that bureaucratic atrophy threatens to denature the social content of the Soviet system in the U.S.S.R., but outlines in broad strokes the characteristics of the bureaucratic order which can follow the Soviet order, while remaining in the domain of real phenomena."

Concerning the bureaucracy, comrade Rakovsky writes: "Under our very eyes, there has been formed, and is still being formed, a large class of rulers which has its own interior groupings, multiplied by means of premeditated cooptation, direct or indirect (bureaucratic promotion, fictitious system of elections). The basic support of this original class is a sort, an original sort, of private property, namely, the possession of State power. The bureaucracy possess the state as private property" wrote Marx ("Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Law").

The colony of deportees at X . . . formulates the question as follows: "We are of the opinion that the bureaucracy is not a class and will never become one. We believe that the bureaucracy, the leading stratum of society, will degenerate that it is the germ of a class which will not be bureaucratic at all . . . The bureaucracy is the germ of a capitalist class which dominates the state and possesses the means of productive collectively."

The Slogan of a Coalition C. C.

Difference in tactics, and partially in principle, were evoked by another question. In one of his letters in May, Rakovsky issued the slogan of a coalition Central Committee (Left, Center and Right). Unfortunately, the inadequacy of our information does not permit us to summarize the opinions on this point. A comrade writes: "I believe that this slogan has a foundation (economy is balked, all the factions must take this fact into account and join in following a single tactical line in spite of the diversity of their strategical lines. This slogan can become popular among the masses. It is another question to know if there are any reasons for being optimistic about its possible realization. The general secretary (Stalin) will not join the coalition, and with Party opinion dispersed, it may not be able to exert enough pressure. However, these considerations are not a decisive argument against the slogan. We must work and fight for its realization. In this way we will point out the concrete road—naturally, an imperfect road, but the situation allows of no better one—for the concrete abolition of the political monopoly of the Centrists."

Let us quote an extract from the theses of an authorized comrade, now incarcerated in Solitary:

"The present state of the proletarian dictatorship can be characterized above all by the extreme nature of the bureaucratic degeneration of its apparatus and, so to speak, by the bureaucratic envelopment of the proletarian dictatorship."

The theses say that the economic organs, "seized by panic before the growing elements of catastrophe, seek to overtake this delay by incessantly exceeding the predetermined projects, above all, by excessive increase of the exploitation of the workers and the lowering of their living level. . . . As a result of the super-industrialization, the condition of the workers is worsening. The workers are obliged to adapt themselves to a reduction in real wages and the exhaustion of physical efforts."

The theses define the policy of Centrism in the country in the following manner: "The political consequences of the peasant policy conducted, can throw back the Sovietization of the country for many years and make us return to the old times of War Communism. The whole policy will be discredited, and the most irremediable discredit will affect in principle, even the policy of collectivization and industrialization, that is all the teachings of Lenin."

"The principal misfortune," the theses say finally, "consists in the fact that, while there is a possibility of a reaction, and sometimes even of a decisive influence on the direction of policy by organizing the resistance of the Opposition in the proletarian sector of the Party to the sliding of Centrism to the Right, with the existing regime this resistance cannot take a sufficiently active form to permit making a radical end to this policy of the Right and ultra-Left leaps, and to realize the reformation of the Party leadership."

The Opposition's Growth

The above-quoted theses touch the decisive problem of the Russian Opposition, consequently, the future of the proletarian dictatorship in the U.S.S.R. All the facts show the sympathy existing in the working class towards our ideas, but the weakness of the Opposition organization prevents the crystallization of these sentiments and their necessary development. "Interest towards us is undubitably growing, we are weak, although we have numerous supporters." In August, we heard from Kharkov: "One feels that a certain additional push is needed, a new experience, so that what is covered with ashes will flame up again. The work must be organized in a more regular and systematic manner, the Bulletin made to appear more regularly, and we need a well functioning internal organization. On this point, comrades in various sections believe that this push is not far off."

In one of his last letters to the Russian Oppositionists comrade Trotsky raises the question in the following way: "Since the mass of the Party is definitely dispersed, then the sole means of heightening the chances for the development of the October revolution and Lenin's Party by the Reformist road, requires the creation of a well-functioning centralized organization of the Bolshevik-Leninists, armed with sufficient technical means for reacting systematically upon the dispersed public opinion of the Party . . . A half-passive policy in the future would mean, not to mention other things, the gradual physical destruction of our best cadres."

The principal obstacle on this road is obviously the repression and above all, provocation. The G. P. U. floods not only our isolated groups of deportees but also the prisons with provocateurs. Provocation is Stalin's main weapon against the Opposition. At the same time, as we have said, the ground for the development of the Left Opposition is very favorable. Facts like the election of a worker Oppositionist as chairman of the factory council, the refusal of the workers to elect another in spite of the rabid pressure of the apparatus, and finally his arrest by the G.P.U. (Mechanical Shops, Kharhov), the successful organization of collections among the workers on the Moscow-Kazan railway, upon their own initiative, for aid to the deportees and their families, the steady torrent of new deportees, the almost daily arrests of new Oppositionists, generally still members of the Party—all this proves that the Opposition is not stifled. And in spite of the incessant arrests, the G. P. U. cannot exhaust the reserves of the Opposition, since they are steadily renewed.

New Deportations

A special and very characteristic phenomenon is the arrest of capitulators, that is, of former Oppositionists who signed the declaration of Radek or Smirnov. Capitulators imprisoned and deported a second time are not isolated cases, but constitute a large phenomenon of their type. It shows, on one hand, that among the capitulators, after the return to Moscow, there is manifested again "relapses into Trotskyism", and on the other, the great fear of the apparatus even for the cadavers of the Opposition—the capitulators.

In recent letters (October), the comrades communicate that these phenomena not only do not cease, but on the contrary increase. Capitulators are mentioned who arrived in deportation in September or October, that is, more than a year after their capitulation.

STALIN AS A THEORETICIAN

By LEON TROTSKY

(Concluded from Last issue)

This is revealed with adequate clarity in the question of the peasant's balance of the October revolution. The state as the owner of the land, concentrated in its hands the right to ground rent. Does it realize it from the present market in the prices of grain, lumber, etc.? Unfortunately, not yet. Does it realize it from the peasant? With the multiplicity of economic accounts between the state and the peasant, it is very difficult to reply to this question. It can be said—and this will by no means be a paradox—so that the “scissors” of agricultural and industrial prices contains the ground rent in a concealed form. With the concentration of land, industry and transport in the hands of the state, the question of ground rent has for the peasant, so to speak, a bookkeeping and not an economic significance. But the peasant is little occupied with precisely this bookkeeping technique. He draws a wholesale balance to his relations with the city and state.

It would be more correct to approach this question from another angle. Because of the nationalization of land, factories and mills, the liquidation of the foreign debts, and planned economy, the workers' state acquired the possibility to reach in a short period high speeds of industrial development. On this road, there was undoubtedly created one of the most important premises for collectivization. But this premise is not a juridical, but a material-productive one: it expresses itself in a definite number of plows, binders, combines, tractors, grain elevators, agronomists, etc., etc. It is precisely from these real entities that the collectivization plan should proceed. This is when the plan will be real. But to the real fruits of nationalization we cannot always add nationalization itself, like some sort of a reserve fund out of which all the excesses of the “complete” bureaucratic adventures can be covered. This would be the same as if having deposited his capital in the bank, one would want to use his capital and the interest on it at the same time.

This is the conclusion in general. But the specific, individual conclusion may be formulated more simply:

“Tomfool, Tomfool.

“It were better that you stayed in school”—than to leave for distant theoretical excursions.

The Formulae of Marx and the Audacity of Ignorance

Between the first and third volumes of “Capital”, there is a second. Our theoretician considers it his duty to commit an administrative abuse of the second volume, too. Stalin has to cover up quickly from criticism the present policy of compulsory collectivization. Since there are no necessary arguments in the material conditions of economy he looks for them in authoritative books with the result that he inevitably looks for them every time on the wrong page.

The advantages of large scale economy over small, agriculture included, are proved by all capitalistic experiences. The possible advantages of large-scale collective economy over dispersed, small economy were established even before Marx by the Utopian socialists and their arguments remain basically sound. In this sphere, the Utopians were great realists. Their Utopia began with the question of the historical road of collectivization. Here the direction was indicated by the Marxian theory of the class struggle in connection with the criticism of capitalist economy.

“Capital” gives an analysis and a synthesis of the processes of capitalist economy. The second volume examines the imminent mechanism of the growth of capitalist economy. The algebraic formulae of this volume prove how, from one and the same creative protoplasm—abstract human labor—the means of production are crystallized in the form of constant capital, wages—in the form of variable capital, and surplus value, which is afterwards transformed into a source of additional constant and variable capital. This in turn permits the acquisition of greater surplus value. Such is the spiral of extended reproduction in its most general and abstract form.

In order to prove by what process the different material elements of the economic process, commodities, find each other inside of this unregulated whole, or more precisely, by what process constant and variable capital accomplish the necessary balance in the different branches of industry with the general growth of production, and on the other—enterprises producing articles of consumption. The enterprises of the first category have to supply machines, raw materials and auxiliary materials as well as to the enterprises of the second category. In turn, the enterprises of the second category have to cover their own needs, as well as the needs of the enterprises of the first category with articles of consumption. Marx reveals the general mechanism of the accomplishment of this proportionality which creates the basis of the dynamic balance under capitalism.* The question of agriculture in its mutual relation to industry therefore rests on an altogether different plane. Stalia evidently simply confused the production of articles of consumption with agriculture. With Marx, however, enterprises of capitalist agriculture (only capitalist) producing raw materials enter automatically into the first category. In so far as agricultural production has peculiarities that contrast it to industry as a whole the analysis of these peculiarities begins in the third volume.

The Process of Extended Reproductions

Extended reproduction occurs in reality not only at the expense of surplus value created by the workers of industry itself and capitalist agriculture but also by the influx of fresh means from the outside: from the pre-capitalist village of the backward countries, colonies, etc. The acquisition of surplus values from the village and colonies is conceivable once more, either in the form of unequal exchange or compulsory expropriation (primarily through taxes, or, finally, in the credit form savings bank, loans, etc.) Historically, all these forms of exploitation combine in different proportions and play a no lesser role than the extortion of surplus value in its “pure” form; the deepening of capitalist exploitation always goes hand in hand with its broadening. But the formulae of Marx that interest us very carefully dissect the live process of economic development, clearing capitalist reproduction from all pre-capitalist elements and transitional forms which accompany it and which feed it, and at the expense of which it develops. Marx's formulae dealt with a chemically pure capitalism which never existed and does not exist anywhere now. Precisely because of this, they revealed the basic tendencies of every capitalism, but precisely of capitalism and only capitalism.

To anybody having an understanding of “Capital”, it is obvious that neither in the first, second nor third volumes can an answer be found to the question of the tempo the dictatorship of the proletariat should adopt in collectivizing peasant economy. All these questions, as well as scores of others, were not solved in any books and could not be solved because of their very essence.* In essence, Stalin in no way differs from the merchant who would seek guidance in Marx' simplest formula M-C-M (money-commodity-money), as to what and when to buy and sell to obtain a bigger profit. Stalin simply confuses theoretical generalization with practical prescription, not to speak of the fact that the theoretical generalization itself is related by Marx to a completely different problem.

Stalin Refers to Marx

Why, then, did Stalin have to refer to the formulae of extended reproduction which he evidently does not understand? The explanations of Stalin himself in regards to this are so inimitable that we are compelled to quote them literally: “The Marxist theory of reproduction teaches that contemporary (?) society cannot develop without annual accumulations, and it is impossible to accumulate without extended reproduction year in and year out. This is clear and evident.” It cannot be clearer. But this is not taught by Marxist theory, for it is the general property of bourgeois political economy, its quintessence. “Accumulation” as a condition of development “of contemporary society” is precisely the great idea which vulgar political economy cleared of the elements of the labor theory of value which had their foundation in classical political economy. The theory which Stalin so bombastically proposes “to draw out of the treasure of Marxism” is a commonplace, uniting not only Adam Smith and Bastiat but also the latter with the American president, Hoover. “Contemporary society”—not capitalist, but “contemporary”—is used with the object of extending Marxist formulae also to “contemporary” socialist society. “This is clear and evident.” Right here Stalin continues: “Our large scale centralized socialist industry develops according to the Marxist theory of extended reproduction (!) because (!!) it grows yearly in scale, has its accumulations and advances with seven league boots.” Industry develops according to the Marxist theory—an immortal formula:—in absolutely the same way as oats grow dialectically according to Hegel. To a bureaucrat, theory is the formula of administration. But the immediate essence of the matter does not lie in this. “The Marxist theory of reproduction” refers to the capitalist mode of production. But Stalin speaks of Soviet industry, which he considers socialist without any reservations. In this manner, according to Stalin, “socialist industry” develops according to the theory of capitalist reproduction. We see how incautiously Stalin slipped his hand into the “treasure of Marxism.” If two economic processes: anarchical and planned, are covered by one and the same theory of reproduction, which is built up on the laws of anarchical production, then this itself reduces to zero the planned, that is, the socialist beginning. However, these two are only the blossoms—the berries are still ahead.

The best gem extracted by Stalin from the treasure is the above-underlined little word “because”: socialist industry develops according to the theory of capitalist industry, “because it grows yearly in scale, has its accumulations and advances with seven league boots.” Poor Theory! Unfortunate treasure! Wretched Marx! Does it mean that the Marxian theory was created especially as a basis for the necessity of yearly advances and, at that, with seven league boots? But what about periods when capitalist industry develops at a “snail's pace”? For those instances, apparently, Marx' theory is rejected. But all capitalist production extends cyclically through prosperity and crises; it means that it not only does not advance with seven league, or any other boots, but marks time and retreats. It appears that Marx' schema is not suited to capitalist development, for the explanation of which it was created, but for that it completely answers the nature of the “seven league” advances of socialist industry. Aren't these miracles? Not limiting himself to the teachings of angels with regard to the nationalization of land, and occupying himself at the same time with the basic correction of Marx, Stalin at any rate marches . . . with seven league boots. In the meantime, the formulae or “Capital” crack under his hours like nuts.

But why did Stalin need all this? The puzzled reader will ask. Alas! We cannot jump over stages, especially when we can hardly keep up with our theoretician. A little patience, and all will be revealed. Immediately after the point analyzed here, Stalin continues: “But our large scale industry does not exhaust all of our national economy. On the contrary, in our national economy, small peasant holdings are still predominant. Can it be said that our small peasant holdings develop according to the principle (!) of extended reproduction? No, it cannot be said. Our small peasant holdings . . . do not always have the possibility of realizing even simple reproduction. Can we move forward with an accelerated tempo our socialized industry, having such peasant economy as a basis . . . ? No, we cannot. Further on, the conclusion follows: complete collectivization is necessary.

Stalin Discloses the Un-Marxian Village!

This point is still better than the preceding one. From the somnolent banality of exposition every now and then rockets of audacious ignorance explode. Does the peasant, that is, simple commodity economy, develop according to the laws of capitalist economy? No, our theoretician replies in terror. It is clear: the village does not live according to Marx. This matter must be corrected. Stalin attempts, in his report, to reject the petty bourgeois theories on the stability of peasant economy. However, becoming entangled in the net of Marxian formulae, he gives this theory a most generalized expression. In reality, the theory of extended reproduction, according to the idea of Marx, embraces capitalist economy as a whole not only industry but agriculture as well, only in its pure form, that is, without its pre-capitalist remnants. But Stalin, leaving aside, for some reason, handicraft and guild occupations, poses the question: “Can it be said that our small peasant holdings develop according to the principle (!) of extended production? No, he replies, “it cannot be said.” In other words Stalin, in the most generalized form, repeats the assertions of the bourgeois economists that agriculture does not develop according to the “principle” of the Marxian theory of capitalist production. Wouldn't it be better, after this, to keep still? After all, the Marxian agronomists kept still listening to his shameful abuse of the teachings of Marx. Yet, the softest of answers should have sounded thus: Get off the tribune immediately, and do not dare to deliberate on problems about which you know nothing!

But we shall not follow the example of the Marxian agronomists and keep still. Ignorance armed with power is just as dangerous as insanity armed with a razor.

The formulae of the second volume of Marx do not represent guiding “principles” of socialist construction, but objective generalizations of capitalist processes. These formulae, abstracted from the peculiarities of agriculture, not only do not contradict its development but fully embrace it as capitalist agriculture.

The only thing that can be said about agriculture in the framework of the formulae of the second volume is that the latter pre-suppose the existence of a sufficient quantity of agricultural raw materials and agricultural products for consumption, for insuring extended reproduction. But what should be the correlation between agriculture and industry: as in England? or as in America? Both these types conform equally to Marxist formulae. England imports articles for consumption and raw materials. America exports them. There is no contradiction here with the formulae of extended reproduction, which are in no way limited by national boundaries, and are not adapted either to national capitalism or, even less, to socialism in one country.

If people should arrive at synthetic feeding, and at synthetic forms of raw material, agriculture would be completely reduced to nothing, being substituted by new branches of the chemical industry. What would then become of the formulae of extended reproduction? They would retain all their validity to the extent that the capitalist form of production and distribution would remain.

Agricultural bourgeois Russia, with the tremendous predominance of the peasantry, not only covered the demands of the growing industries, but also created the possibility of large exports.

These processes were accompanied by the strengthening of the Kulak top and the weakening of the peasant bottom, their growing proletarianization. In this manner, in spite of all its peculiarities, agriculture on capitalistic foundations developed within the framework of those very formulae with which Marx embraced the whole of capitalist economy—and only capitalist economy.

Peasant Economy and “Socialist” Industry

Stalin wants to come to the conclusion that this is impossible “to base . . . socialist construction on two different foundations: on the foundation of the greatest and most consolidated socialist industry and on the foundation of the most dispersed and backward small commodity peasant economy.” In reality, he proves something directly contrary. If the formulae of extended reproduction are equally applicable to capitalist and socialist economy—to “contemporary society” generally—then it is absolutely incomprehensible why it is impossible to continue the fur-

Pollack Case: A Statement of Fact

The Daily Worker of November 15, 1930, prints a statement by the Party Control Commission which announces the expulsion of comrade Sylvan A. Pollack on the grounds that he acted as an agent for the police when, together with four other Party comrades, he was arrested for sedition in Scranton, Pa., last July. An accusation of this kind involving the integrity and membership of a comrade in the movement, must be considered and answered.

Comrade Pollack has been a supporter of the Opposition for about a year now, and a member of the New York branch of the Communist League for almost the same time. The accusation made against him, as an aftermath of the Scranton police raid, was reported to the national committee, which forthwith instructed him to demand of the Central Control Commission of the Party a hearing of the charges and an immediate decision. This was imperative in the case, since it is impossible to have such a question hanging fire for any length of time. If the individual in question is a police agent, every day of his membership is injurious to the movement; if the charge against him is false, every day that it stands without being wiped out impairs the ability of the comrade to function in the movement, and, therefore, is equally injurious to the latter.

Following the publication of the Control Commission statement, the national committee of the League once more considered the question and decided that absolutely no credence could be placed in the charges made against comrade Pollack, for the following reasons.

1. His previous record in the movement, membership in the Socialist party, foundation member of the Communist Party in 1919, active speaker, writer and organized for the Party for 11 years entrusted with numerous posts of importance and responsibility.

2. Previous arrests: during the Palmer Red Raids in 1919, during the needle trades strike in 1925, during the picketing of the Hungarian Consulate, etc., and his conduct in these arrests which was irreproachable and never met with any criticism.

3. Despite the fact that the first and second hearing of the case before the Control Commission occurred at the end of July and beginning of August, no action was taken against him until December. Since July no new material was presented to the Commission to warrant either the delay or the expulsion almost four months afterwards. The Commission, in other words, did not take the charges seriously, knowing that they were made for ulterior motives in the first place. This is demonstrated further by the fact that comrade Pollack was not only allowed to retain membership in the Party, but was permitted to occupy important and responsible posts, as editor of Solidarity, official organ of the Workers International Relief, and agit-prop director of that organization.

4. The Control Commission resurrected the Scranton charges only after comrade Pollack was accused of "Trotskyism" through the intermediary of a disreputable individual named Eisenman previously expelled from the Y. C. L. as a degenerate and a white chauvinist. The Commission immediately demanded Pollack's suspension from the post of W. I. R. editor until the "Trotskyism" charges were investigated, a demand it did not make when Pollack was accused of being a police agent.

The national committee of the League therefore declares the scurrilous statement of the Party Control Commission to be a disgraceful attempt at a frame-up to discredit the Opposition as a whole and comrade Pollack as an individual militant. His membership in the Opposition, now of a year's standing, remains unaffected, and he is entitled to the full confidence of revolutionists.

We append here a statement on the simple facts in the case, made before our committee by comrade Pollack.

National Committee of the Communist League of America (Opposition).

COMRADE POLLACK'S STATEMENT

The Control Commission charges that I led the police to the rooming house of Slinger and Little. On whose say so are these charges made? At the hearing held in Scranton on July 12, when we were held for the Grand Jury, the Deputy Sheriffs who arrested us without warrants so testified. The word of the police is believed in preference to a communist.

It came about this way: The defense attorney had made the police witnesses admit that the arrests were made without a warrant. To justify their actions the police stated they did not need any warrants because when Joe Tash, was arrested the night before the rest of us, he gave them the key to the headquarters where I was taken into custody when I came there the following morning about 8 o'clock. If Tash, gave them the key, they were his "guest", was their argument. To continue their line of reasoning I was hustled into the police car and forced to accompany the police when they went to the rooming house and arrested Slinger and Little. Here they claimed that they were my "guest" and did not need any warrant. At the Control Commission hearing, in an effort to prove that I told the police where the rooming house was located, I was asked what conversation, if any, took place between the police and myself when driving from the office to the rooming house, which is only a distance of about three blocks. I told the C. C. that the only conversation that took place was that one of the deputy sheriffs asked me if I wanted a cigarette and I refused. In the C. C. statement, in an attempt to show that I was friendly with the police it is turned around and made to read that I offered the cigarettes to the police.

After my arrival in Scranton in July to take over the post as International Labor Defense district organizer, I found out for the first time that before my arrival Frankfeld, district organizer of the Party, had the local Party Bureau pass a motion against my being given that position. This was sent to the national bureau of the I. L. D., which refused to give it any consideration. When I arrived in Scranton, Frankfeld was antagonistic from the start, the local functionaries of the Party and Union all being resentful that their protest was not acted upon favorably. Frankfeld has had a personal dislike for me since 1925 when I was an active supporter of the Ruthenberg group and he as now, a supporter for the Foster group. Therefore, when the arrests took place, Frankfeld saw an opportunity to get revenge. After we were arrested, Slinger, and Little were among the first released on bail. They got out the next morning while Tash and myself stayed in five days. On my release on bail I was informed by Frankfeld that the local Party Bureau, had, on his motion, gone on record that I should be brought up on charges. I went to New York and appeared before a meeting of the National Bureau of the I. L. D., and stated that due to the fact that the local comrades were antagonistic towards me I preferred not to continue to work in that field, especially if I was to be brought up on charges in the Party. Jakira and Darcy laughed at the charges and tried to persuade me to return to the anthracite as organizer. Little also attended this meeting and told of the charges, as representative of the Scranton Party Bureau. He was not taken seriously. This was quite logical. Then I was not known as a Trotskyist.

The next week comrade Gibarti, international representative of the W. I. R., persuaded me to become the agit-prop director of the W. I. R., and in that position I continued until I was brought up on the charges of "Trotskyism."

If it were not that I wish to limit this statement to a simple declaration of the facts in my case, it would be instructive to describe the conduct in this whole affair of such comrades as Freeman Thompson and Dan Slinger, and it would not rebound to their credit. However, this can be reserved for some future and more appropriate date.

urgently needed machinery here, but, by setting a number of industries in motion and thereby providing jobs, will clearly establish the direct community of interests of the jobless workers and the proletarian state.

Finally, we are totally at variance with Weisbord's views on relations with the Lovestone group, stated in his original declaration, and repeated in the articles in question. His insistent demand for a bloc with the Right wing vitiates all his claims of adherence to the tested standpoint of the Communist Opposition. The fact that this demand is carried out in practice by him (bloc with Lovestone in the liquidationist "textile committee") only makes the matter worse. This proposal will continue to meet with as intransigent opposition from us as any attempt to establish it as a platform, or part of a platform, for the Marxist section of the movement.

A DANCE IN CHICAGO

The Chicago branch of the League has arranged a proletarian entertainment and dance to be held Saturday night, December 13, at 1118 W. Madison St. Among the features on the program will be a reading of his poetry by Ralph Chaplin, piano and violin selections by Ernest Moeller and David H. T. Kahn, singing by Miss Edna Kunin, recitals, dancing, etc., etc. It will be, say the Chicago comrades, one of the best entertainments held in the city for long time. In addition, there will be music and dancing, and refreshments for all. Admission is twenty-five cents and all friends and comrades are cordially invited to be present on time so that a full evening's comradely entertainment may be had.

CHICAGO STUDY CLASS

Chicago workers interested in the study of Marxism are urged to attend the class in that subject conducted by the Communist League branch. It meets every Wednesday, at 8 p. m., at 1214 Washtenaw, with comrade Hugo Oehler as director of the class. The question method is the one followed. All are invited.

STALIN AS A THEORETICIAN - : - by LEON TROTSKY

ther development of economy on the very foundation of the contradictions between city and village, upon which capitalism reached an immeasurably higher level. In America, gigantic industrial trusts develop even today, side by side with the farmer regime in agriculture. The farmer economy created the foundation of American industry. It is precisely on the American type, by the way, that our bureaucrats, with Stalin at their head, orientated themselves openly until yesterday: the powerful farmer at the bottom centralized industry at the top.

The ideal equivalent of exchange is the basic premise of the abstract formulae of the second volume. Nevertheless, planned economy of the transition period, even though based upon the law of value, violates it at every step and creates mutual relations between different branches of industry and primarily between industry and agriculture on the basis of unequal exchange. The decisive lever of compulsory accumulation and planned distribution is the government budget. With a further development, its role will have to grow. Financial credits regulate the mutual relations between compulsory accumulation of the budget and the processes of the market in so far as they retain their force. Not only the budgetary, but also the planned or semi-planned credit financing which insures the extension of reproduction in the U.S.S.R., can in no way be summed up in the formulae of the second volume, the whole force of which lies in the fact that they ignore budgets or plans or tariffs, and in general, all forms of governmentally planned influence that establish the necessary regulations over the play of blind forces of the market, which are disciplined by the law of value. No sooner would we "free" the internal Soviet market and abolish the monopoly of foreign trade, than the exchange between the city and village would become incomparably more equalized, accumulation in the village—it is understood, Kulak, farmer-capitalist accumulation—would take its course and it would soon reveal that Marx' formulae apply also to agriculture. On this road, Russia would in a brief period be transformed into a colony upon which the industrial development of other countries would be based.

In order to motivate this same complete collectivization, the school of Stalin (there is such a thing) has made use of the stark comparisons between the tempo of development in industry and agriculture. Crudely of all, this operation is performed, as usual, by Molotov. In February 1929, Molotov spoke at the Moscow district conference of the Party: "Agriculture in recent years has noticeably lagged behind industry in the tempo of development. . . . For the last three years, industrial production increased in value by more than fifty percent and the products of agriculture—all in all—by seven percent." The comparison of these two tempos is economic illiteracy. By peasant economy they include, in reality, all branches of economy. The development of industry has always, and in all branches, taken place at the expense of the reduction of the specific gravity of agriculture. It is sufficient to recall that metallurgical production in the United States is almost equal to the production of farmer economy at a time when, with us, it is one-eighteenth of agricultural production. This shows that in spite of the high tempos of recent years, our industry has not yet emerged from the period of infancy. In order to eliminate the contradictions between city and village created by bourgeois development, Soviet industry must first surpass the village to an incomparably greater degree than bourgeois Russia did. The present breach between state industry and peasant economy did not proceed from the fact that industry surpassed agriculture too greatly—the advanced position of industry is an internationally historical fact and a necessary condition for progress—but from the fact that our industry is too weak, that is, it has gone ahead too little to have the possibility to raise agriculture to the necessary level. The aim, of course, is the elimination of the contradictions between the city and the village. But the roads and methods of this elimination have nothing in common with the equalization of tempos of agriculture and industry. The mechanization of agriculture and the industrialization of a series of its branches will be accompanied, on the contrary, by the reduction of the specific gravity of agriculture as such. The tempo of the mechanization we can accomplish, is determined by the productive power of industry. What is decisive for collectivization is not the fact that metallurgy rose in recent years by a few score percent, but the fact that our metal per capita is negligible. The growth of collectivization is only of equal significance to the growth of agriculture itself in so far as the first is based on the technical revolution of agricultural production. But the tempo of such a revolution is limited by the percent specific gravity of industry. The tempo of collectivization must be combined with the material resources of the latter and not at all with abstract statistical tempos.

"Capital" and Socialist Reproduction

In the interests of theoretical clarity, it should be added to what has been said, that the elimination of the contradictions between city and village that is, the raising of agricultural production to a scientific-industrial level, will mean the triumph not of Marx' formulae in agriculture, as Stalin imagines but on the contrary, the elimination of their triumph in industry. Because socialist extended reproduction will not at all take place according to the formulae of "Capital", the central point of which is the pursuit of profits. But all this is too complicated for Stalin and Molotov.

Let us repeat in the conclusion of this chapter that collectivization is the practical task of eliminating capitalism and not the theoretical task of its development. That is why the Marxian formulae are not applicable here from any point of view. The practical possibilities of collectivization are determined by the productive-technical resources at hand for large scale agriculture and the degree of readiness of the peasantry to pass from individual to collective economy. In the long run, this subjective analysis is determined by the very same material-productive factor: the peasant can be attracted to socialism only by the advantage of collective economy, supported by advanced technique. But instead of a tractor, Stalin wants to present the peasant with the formulae of the second volume. But the peasant is honest and does not want to deliberate over what he does not understand.
